Austrian Crisis Hundreds Killed by Anti-Labor Drive Now Under Way and Communism Marines in Haiti

By L. D. Trotsky

The Austrian crisis is a partial manifestation of the crisis of democracy, the fundamental form of bourgeois rule. The too high tension of the international, as well as the class, struggle leads to the short circuit of dictatorship in which the safeguards of democracy are burned up one after the other. The process began at the European periphery, in the most backward countries, at the weakest links in the capitalist chain. But the process goes even further. What is called the crisis of parliamentarism is the political expression for the crisis of the entire system of bourgeois society. Democracy stands and falls with capitalism. The social democracy defends democracy which is being ruined and thereby drives social development into the blind alley of fascism.

The Strength of the Social Democracy

The great weakness of the Austrian bourgeoisie after the war and the revolution, combined with the economic and political dependence of Austria, became the most important sources for the strength of the Austrian social democracy. While the Austrian social democracy fulfilled its office of savior and consolidator of the bourgeois regime, it had the opportunity, in its agitation, to repel either the national or the foreign bourgeoisie (English and American). In the first period of the stabilization of the bourgeois regime after the revolution, the social democracy was the direct agent of foreign capital. This permitted it not only to throw the responsibility for all evil upon the national bourgeoisie, but it could also adopt—at least, in appearances—a more independent, a more critical position towards this bourgeoisie than was accessible to the social democracy in other countries, not even excluding Germany. The further the consolidation of the bourgeois regime progressed, the more frequently did the social democracy accuse the national bourgeoisie that it merely executed the commands of Anglo-Saxon capital. For the workers, however, it kept one argument ready, which excused the inviolability of private property: "Naturally, we would be able to finish off with our bourgeoisie, but it isn't a question of them, but of the bourgeoisie of England and America."

The bourgeois parties of Austria lost their distinctiveness all the more easily because they were compelled to hang on the lips of the Anglo-Saxon host. The social democracy, in essence, played the same role, but it is compelled to come forward as an Opposition to the bloc of the bourgeois parties, because it bases itself upon the workers. This "Opposition" alone permits it to save the bourgeoisie. We see similar processes and phenomena in Germany too. They have contributed in an extraordinary manner to the self-preservation of the German social democracy. But since the German bourgeoisie is much stronger and more independent, the German social democracy had to make agreements with it more plainly and openly, and assume the direct responsibility for it before the working masses. This circumstance created great possibilities of development for the German Communist Party.

Austria is a small body with a big head. The capital city is in the hands of the social democracy, which has, however, less than half the votes in the national parliament (43 percent). This unstable

NEW YORK—Not five but hundreds of Haitians were killed in the uprising of Haitian peasants at Aux Cayes recently, states the Amsterdam News, Harlem Negro weekly on the authority of a letter smuggled out of Haiti to Capt. N. P. Marshall, head of the Save Haiti League. The writer of the letter said he did not dare sign his name for fear of reprisals from the marine-controlled Haitian government.

"Hundreds of Haitian peasants," reads the letter, "who were coming into Aux Cayes to protest, without arms, simply with their usual small canes, against the way alcohol, tobacco and coffee are taxed, have been slaughtered. Women and children were killed. Officially they acknowledge 12 dead and 40 wounded but there are hundreds."

Illinois Miners Urgently Need Relief

After having encountered the gun-point terrorism of the operators' thugs and the state militia during the strike, the Illinois miners who responded to the call of the National Miners Union are being met with a vicious blacklisting campaign by the operators, calculated to drive the militants in the field either to starvation or out of the mining territory.

The men who went on strike include some of the most courageous fighters in the mining industry and to have them driven out of the field would involve a great setback for the progressive and Left wing movement and leave the workers exposed to the machinations of the Lewis and Fishwick machines and their employers the coal operators. The workers who fought so militantly and who ready to fight with even greater sacrifices deserve the support of the whole labor movement. The operators are not only trying to starve

The obscure pages of the capitalist press are giving part of the picture of growing industrial decline in the United States which all the optimistic declarations by 'experts', printed on the front pages, cannot conceal. As the weeks go by since the colossal stock market collapse, it becomes all the clearer that the blow at the industrial and financial structure of American capitalism was neither accidental nor just an episode.

The far-reaching significance of the growing industrial decline in the country for the working class, which is the one most bitterly affected, may be gathered from the figures just made public by the spokesman for American big business, the New York Times (12-29-1929):

"Iron and steel operations are at a low ebb. The ratio is now the lowest of the year and for the industry as a whole will not top the fifty percent figure. . . . Merchandise shipments, as measured by car loadings figures, are slower, emphasizing the let-down which has occurred generally. . . . Business generally is quiet as the year ends, especially in manufacturing and wholesale and jobbing lines. New purchasing is characterized by cautiousness and the disposition to buy only for immediate requirements. . . . Of the ninety-four lines of business in New York City reporting to Bradstreet's last week, five were better than, fifty equal to, and thirty-four below a year ago. No lines report collections better than a year ago, forty-six were equal to a year ago and forty-eight were below a year ago."

From the New England area, Times reports that textile mill operations are "still subnormal", with shoe production pretty light. "Building operations continue the smallest of the year." The Chicago district reports the steel output down to 55 percent for the area, with new business "light". Philadelphia reports the market for building materials, including timber, to be slow, with dwelling house construction out of sight. In the Ohio territory, iron and steel operations are down to about 50 percent, with prices reduced to the lowest level in more than a year. St. Louis acknowledges that "practically all industrial plants have reduced production and cut forces, which has aggravated the employment situation." With little change the same downward movement exists throughout the country.

The sharp slow-down in American industry is already having a telling effect on the working class. That unemployment is on the increase, is obvious. The employers are attempting as usual, to get out from under their difficulties by laying off as many men as possible and speeding up those who are left to the highest possible peak. A period of the most severe intensifying of labor "efficiency" and "rationalization"—at the expense of the workers' health and lives—has set in on a nation-wide scale. Bitter struggles of the workers against wage cuts, speed-up and unemployment are scheduled for the coming year in defense against the hammerblows of the bosses. Unless the labor movement begins immediately an intense and widespread drive to organize the millions of unorganized workers in the basic industries of the country, unless a break is made conclusively with the suicidal policy of collaborating with the capitalist class and a policy of militant combat substituted for it, the workers of the United States will face the coming struggles with a minimum of preparedness as against the maximum of determined ruthlessness, consolidated organization and governmental assistance that the bosses have at their command.

Exports Increase

What is especially significant about the present industrial situation in the country, is the increase of foreign exports. The National Chamber of Commerce has just announced that the American exports for the first 9 months of this year were more than 8 percent larger than for the corresponding period in 1928. This indicates with doubled emphasis that the home market of the U.S. has narrowed considerably, because industrial production has declined in spite of the increase in exports. It indicates further that the United States will make every effort to escape the consequences of its crisis by exerting the harshest possible pressure on its competitors in the world market.

The crisis in the United States, irrespective of its duration or depth, is a reflection of and at the same time an impetus to the crisis in world capitalism

Lost Fliers and Hoover Refuse 6-Hour Day

WASHINGTON—Why the Hoover administration failed, during five weeks of bitter winter weather, that followed its knowledge that two American fliers were lost on the ice of Arctic Siberia, to ask the Soviet government for help in rescuing them, is the central mystery in this grim story which the explorer Stefansson has brought into the light of publicity.

When at last a telegram from Stefansson to Secretary of the Interior Wilbur drove Wilbur to ask the Moscow Foreign Office for help, the fliers had been down on the ice seven weeks, and their original food supply was enough for only eight weeks. Temperatures of 70 below zero Fahrenheit are recorded in that region in December.

Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, attorney for the Airways Transport Co., employers of the fliers, appealed to Hoover, Borah, Wilbur and to Boris E. Skvirsky, unofficial representative in Washington for the Soviet government. Wilbur's request that Soviet ice-breakers be sent to rescue the fliers was sent to Moscow through Skvirsky. Borah cabled Foreign Secretary Litvinov direct.

Did non-recognition alone cause the Washington administration to stand inactive until the fliers had but one week's food supply left—with one chance in a hundred of their early rescue?

NEW YORK—(FP)—The five-day week in the building trades is not keeping pace with growing unemployment. That is evidenced in the appeal of Plasterers Local 60 for the 6-hour day for the months of January and February, to ease the tension of unemployment. One of the arguments leading to the adoption of the 5-day week was lack of jobs.

The boss plasterers have curtly rejected the appeal stating that it would increase building costs. An agreement for the 5-day, 40-hour week has three years to run.

CONCEDE CLEVELAND UNEMPLOYMENT

CLEVELAND—(FP)—The open shop American Plan Assn., basing its report on employment in member firms, states that 54,000 were on the payroll in 231 Cleveland plants in November, compared with 51,000 in November, 1928. The report admits however that unemployment is greater this year than last, many workers having come to Cleveland from Detroit and other cities where unemployment is bad.

HOOVER PROSPERITY

RALEIGH, N. C.—The Associated Charities has 142 "cases" on its hands this winter against 84 last winter. The greatest need is for fuel, for which the Charities has no money, because the Community Chest has had to cut its budget.

French Aim Blow at U. S.

Raise Tariff on American Autos

A stiff blow at American automobile competition in France is being contemplated by the French government in a project to be submitted to the parliament for the increase on tariff duties on foreign automobile and parts. While the raising of the tariff is formally directed against all foreign auto imports, it is the real aim of the project to strike at the United States, which does practically all of the importing in this field.

The extent to which the foreign market in France would be cut down for American automobile and parts manufacturers is indicated by the fact that the estimates made of American cars and trucks sold in France in 1919 runs to about $32,000,000—with about two-thirds of the cars being Fords.

Plan High Auto Tariff

The French project covers two laws, which American capitalists expect to drive them clear out of the market. The first would raise the duty on parts for assembly and replacement to three times the previous rates, or 125 percent of the sales value of the product. The second measure would raise the duty on complete cars from the present 45 per cent ad valorem to about 90 percent. It is said that the Ford plant, for instance, which is the only one assembling cars, would have its parts subjected to such a high duty as to make further operation at a profit virtually impossible.

American sales in France do not form a very large part of the total automobile sales, but what alarms the French is the fact that the share of the U. S. is steadily on the increase. The market equilibrium of any of the capitalist countries is so delicately "adjusted" nowadays that any larger increase of America's share in the French trade would undoubtedly have a serious effect upon the domestic industry, where the French bourgeoisie is priding itself upon the relative lack of unemployment. It is both the fear of losing a larger portion of its own market in France, and the radical consequences of increased unemployment in the country, that impels the French to attempt this severe blow to the American master.

That the American automobile interests will not stand by silently while this attack is consummated is quite apparent. Already the State Department and the Department of Commerce of the U. S. have received urgent appeals from the automobile manufacturers to "do something" about the French project. A difficulty, from the American capitalist view, arises at this point because the French have drawn the drafts of the laws so cleverly that formally there is no direct discrimination planned against the U. S., since the laws are to cover "all" foreign imports, although it is quite obvious that Italian and British auto trade being insignificant in France, the bills are in reality intended against the U. S.

U. S. Will Fight Back

Nevertheless there is every certainty that the American government, true to its role of faithful servitor to capitalist interests, will exert the heaviest pressure to prevent the project from becoming French law. Its passage would be an especially hard blow at the American producers because of the severe depression in which the industry is now found in the U. S. Thousands of workers are laid off every month; plants are either being shut down entirely or working part time; the prospects for the coming year are very poor and greater decline is freely predicted by practically everyone. The main hope of the American auto manufacturer does not lie in the maintenance of the domestic market, and certainly not in its increase in the coming period. That is universally acknowledged. Their eyes for the maintenance of production even at a moderate pace are pinned mainly on exports, not only to the Orient and in America, but also to Europe.

The growing resistance of European manufacturers, the persistent talk among them of a cartel or alliance to ward off the aggressive movements of the Americans, the steps being taken against U. S. competition all along the line and now manifesting in the planned acts of France—all these indicate that the export hopes of the Detroit industrial kings are not in such a cheerful position as they pretend. It also indicates that their promises to the auto workers that increased exports will mean a renewed wave of employment, are not founded on very substantial grounds.

These factors indicate that the most anxious resistance to the French project will be made by the American interests. If the French are under the impression that they will put through their plan without meeting the hardest opposition from the U. S., they will very quickly be disillusioned. The U. S. imperialists have more powerful and ruthless means of pressure at their command than mere diplomatic notes.

And the olive branches of peace that the god-fearing statesmen of the world have been handing to each other with so much publicity, what about them? They disappear, as always do all pacifist fantasies, in the living realities of the mad, cut-throat rush for profits, territory, spheres of influence, colonies, markets which is the foundation of modern imperialism.

Another Haymarket Cop Dead

By T. P. LEWIS

CHICAGO—Twice in 43 years Pat Nash made the first page. The first time was in 1886. He was one of the Haymarket cops. The papers marked him for special attention in those days of heroic policemen because bits of the Haymarket bomb wounded him.

The second time was Monday. Someone noticed the lights in Pat's squalid attic room on West Monroe St. burning in the afternoon. This time the papers intoned a half column paean of glory to the hero and grew sad at the thought that a noble defender of Chicago's good name should have died of want and inattention.

Boss Press Upholds Tradition

For the press of Chicago never misses a chance to call back to mind the march of 180 cops against what it invariably describes as a mob of 2,000 anarchists on May 4, 1886. There is never mention of the fact that this "mob" was a mass meeting of union men protesting against the murder of four strikers by police the previous day at the McCormick Reaper works.

SUPPRESS MOONEY REPORT

Young Hid Evidence Hound Trotsky's Kin

SAN LUIS OBISPO, Cal. (FP)—Murphy McHenry, San Luis Obispo editor, in an open letter to Governor Young, quotes Charles Whitmore, once Young's secretary and now state building and loan commissioner, as saying: "I don't understand why Gov. Young doesn't act in the Mooney case. Mooney deserves to be pardoned and I told him (Young) so." McHenry says in his letter that Young turned the case over to that he would make his decision from Whitmore's findings. Whitmore reported that Mooney and Billings were innocent, but the governor took no action. Young denies that this is so.

Both the state supreme court and the advisory pardon board are working on the two cases, but there is no probability of a decision in the near future. Both bodies are preparing for a long set of hearings, and are going over the whole transcript of testimony, which Young has had in his hands for several years before he passed the buck to the board and the court. Meanwhile Mooney spent Christmas working as a waiter in the guards' mess hall at San Quentin, and Billings spent his, not in his former healthful job of gardener to the warden of Folsom, but at work in the prison laundry.

Φ

FORD'S TREATMENT OF LABOR

Henry Ford, who says he likes older workers but whose Detroit plants throw them out without compunction, comes in for criticism from Sec. A. Epstein, of the American Assn for Old Age Security. Calling attention to Ford's recent utterances concerning the value of skill and steadiness of the older workers, Epstein points out that the U. S. labor department recently published a study showing Ford plants to be more ruthless in drawing the deadline against men over 40 than any other firm studied.

Φ

SWEDISH WORKERS PROTEST BARBARITY IN CAROLINA

NEW YORK (FP)—Informed of the course of "justice" in North Carolina which is sending labor men to the penitentiary and white-washing the slayers of strike leaders 500 workers meeting at Holmstad near Gothenburg, Sweden have sent resolutions of protest to Gov. O. Max Gardner of North Carolina. A collection netting 30 crowns, is being forwarded for strikers defense.

STALINIST REPRESSION

At the same time that he announces—once more—the final liquidation of Trotskyism, Stalin is redoubling the brutality towards the supporters of the Russian Opposition who do not capitulate.

News that we have just received from deportees inform us that the health of our comrade Rakovsky is seriously shaken. His heart especially is in a bad way and there is hardly any possibility of treating it at Barnaul, where he was recently exiled.

The repression is extended even to the children of Oppositionists. A month ago, the daughter of comrade Trotsky, who lives in Moscow, was suddenly imprisoned. She remained in prison a few days, then she was set at provisional liberty, under surveillance, so that she might take care of her three children. But then her husband was arrested... on the pretext of putting him through an examination: since then there has been no news. The agents of Stalin know full well that he is so seriously ill that any political activity on his part is impossible. They want to crush us Opposition at any cost for they are quite well aware that it is not liquidated. But their efforts will be in vain.

Φ

SAN FRANCISCO (FP)—Wallace D. Fogan, 55, was "too old to work". His money was gone. He turned on the gas in his two-room apartment, and when his wife came home she found his dead body and a note which began: "Dear Lottie: Please forgive me. I am leaving you all my money—13 cents and 6 cents in stamps." With this fortune Mrs Fogan must now face the world.

Open Forum of the New York Communist League

The coming semi-monthly Open Forum lectures announced by the New York branch of the Communist League of America (Opposition) include the following speakers and topics:

James P. Cannon, on "Gastonia and Marion", a comparison of the two historic labor struggles of the past year in the Southern textile fields and their significance to the Left wing. To be held Saturday, January 11.

Martin Abern, on "The Left Wing and the Labor Unions" a discussion of this much-disputed question from the point of view of the Communist Opposition. To be held Saturday, January 25.

Max Shachtman, on "Can Capitalism Disarm?", in which the results of the London Naval Conference will be dealt with and the standpoints of Communism and pacifism in the question contrasted. To be held Saturday, February 8.

Speakers for subsequent meetings will include S. M. Rose, Joseph Friedman, James Russell, and others. The Open Forum meetings begin at 8 p. m., are held at the Militant Hall, 25 Third Avenue, Room 4, (near 8th Street), and admission is free. All workers are cordially invited. Questions and discussion follow all lectures.

Mellon's Pa. Domain Rises

Workers Squeezed for Profits

By ARTHUR G. McDOWELL

PITTSBURGH (FP)—Control of this city by the Mellons' millions is soon to be visualized by another great shaft of steel and stone in the downtown section. The new Gulf Refining Co. building is to rise 37 stories above the street opposite the magnificent new Koppers Bldg., home of the "General Electric and Coal." Both Gulf Refining and Koppers are Mellon concerns, typifying their progress toward supremacy in the control of coal properties and a rapidly shaping monopoly of manufactured gas.

The symbolic domination of Pittsburgh by the castles of the mighty Mellons is every day matched by their actual march onward to unchallenged control of the industrial area of western Pennsylvania, with its wealth of unmined coal and huge steel mills. Dairy combines, chain store extensions and fuel monopoly are sidelines in the Mellons' financial sway. These latter ventures are financed through bond issues which free Mellon capital for further expansion while leaving actual control in the power-greedy hands of this grand ducal family.

Workers Make His Wealth

Gulf Refining Co. station workers, when they look at the new Mellon skyscraper downtown, will have cause to think of their contribution to their employers' wealth. They get only $75 a month, while Mellon truck drivers average $90, or half the union scale.

Station managers had their day lengthened by one of those interesting devices used alternately to cajole and coerce them. At a periodic "experience" meeting they were asked if they didn't think that "any manager who was truly interested in his station would stay on the job during the day's rush hour." All present agreed readily, whereupon it was announced that the rush hour was between 5 and 6. The managers' workday ends at 5.

Mellon Advances in New York

NEW YORK—Clever evasion of the New York state law preventing a holding company from acquiring more than 10% interest in a public utility corporation is noted in the current Annalist in recording the gobbling up of Brooklyn Union Gas by the Koppers-Mellon interests of Pittsburgh. The Mellon firm, which is fast becoming a gas monopoly in the east, organized 10 separate holding companies to acquire 100% of the Brooklyn gas company's stock.

These dummy companies are named Aden, Burma, Canton, Dover, Etna, Farley, Gorham, Hector, Irving and Java and according to Mellon's high-priced experts, cannot be challenged under the New York law, the purpose of which was to "prevent" a holding company controlling a public utility.

The Koppers monopoly is acquiring holdings in the Consolidated Gas Co., the gas and electric monopoly of Manhattan.

The possession of naval bases will play a tremendous role in the coming conflict of the seas. They serve as an intermediary point for supplies, refueling and ammunition. An examination of these naval bases

The most decisive factor in the event of war is the resources of the various contenders. Increased building and expenditures presents a problem to all of the powers with the exception of the United States. Her resources place her in a most favored position. This is indisputable. While France demands her share of extended naval construction she is at the same time in favor of a let-up because of lack of resources. Likewise Japan, and England feel the difficulties. America alone can continue with a steady building program and will maintain this position. In addition no other country has its industries so completely

The Defense of the Soviet Union and the Opposition

By L. D. Trotsky

That the present-day Martinovs conceal themselves in the shreds of Bolshevik quotations of the year 1905, the quotations with which Stalin, Kamenev, Rykov and others covered themselves in 1917 against Lenin, is a masquerade that can deceive only idiots or illiterates*. The Comintern, under the leadership of Martinov-Bucharin-Stalin, carried on in China with a furious howling against the permanent revolution. That is now the fundamental question for the countries of the East, and consequently also one of the essential questions for the West. Has comrade Urbahns an opinion in this question? No, he has none. He hides behind separate words, or what is worse yet, behind Radek's article, which he prints "at all events".

Thermidor or Party Rehearsal of Thermidor?

If things are in a bad way with comrade Urbahns with regard to the Chinese revolution, they are still worse, if that were possible, with regard to the Russian revolution. I mean primarily the question of the Thermidor and therefore also the question of the class character of the Soviet state. The formula of Thermidor, like every historical analogy, is naturally a conditional one. When I employed this formula for the first time against Zinoviev-Stalin, I immediately emphasized that it was conditional. Nevertheless it is entirely legitimate, in spite of the difference between the epochs and the class structures. Thermidor signals the first victorious stage of the counter-revolution, that is, the direct passage of power from one class to another, which is necessarily accompanied by civil war; but it remains concealed politically by the fact that the struggle is conducted between fractions of a yesterday still united party. In France, Thermidor was preceded by a period of reaction which developed while the Plebeians, the lowest section of the city, still held the power in their hands. The Thermidor completed this process of preparation of the reaction by a political catastrophe, in the course of which the plebeians lost the power. In this way, Thermidor does not signify a period of reaction in general, that is, of ebb, of running off the rails, of the weakening of the revolutionary positions, but it has a much more precise significance: it indicates the direct transfer of power from one class to another, after which the revolutionary class can reconquer power in no other way than an armed uprising. For the latter, again a new revolutionary situation is necessary, the appearance of which depends upon complicated internal and international uses.

In 1923, the Marxist Opposition already established the beginning of a new chapter in the revolution, a chapter of ideological and political recession which, in respective, could signify the Thermidor. It is then that we employed the word for the first time. Had the revolution triumphed in Germany at the end of 1923—which was entirely possible—the dictatorship of the proletariat in Russia would have been purified and consolidated without internal convulsions. But the German revolution ended with one of the most frightful capitulations in the history of the working class. The defeat of the German revolution gave a powerful impetus to all the processes of reaction in the Soviet republic. Thence the struggle in the Party against the "permanent revolution" and against "Trotskyism", the creation of the theory of socialism in a single country, etc. The ultra-Leftists in Germany did not understand this turn of events. With one hand they supported the reaction, in the Russian Communist Party, with the other they carried on a formally aggressive policy in Germany, ignoring the defeat of the German revolution and the beginning of its recession. Like the Centrists in the R. C. P., the ultra-Leftists in Germany Maslow, Fischer, Urbahns) concealed their erroneous policy behind the struggle against "Trotskyism" which they represented as "liquidationism", just because they considered the revolutionary situation not behind them but ahead of them. In this case, "Trotskyism" was called the ability to estimate the situation correctly distinguishing the periods. Be it said in passing that it would be very useful if Urbahns had finally drawn the theoretical balance of this whole struggle, for it is precisely this struggle that deadened the minds of the German workers and prepared the victory of the idealless officials, adventurers and careerists.

*Martinov was for twenty years long (1903-23) the principal theoretician of Menshevism. He joined the Bolshevik Party, when Lenin was already ill and the campaign against Trotskyism had begun. In 1923, Martinov accused the October revolution prior to the N.E.P. of Trotskyism. Now he is the principal theoretician of the Comintern. He remains what he was. But he covers his old, fundamental line with quotations from Lenin. For the selection and forging of such quotations there exist several factories.

The false "ultra-Left" course of 1924-25 still further weakened the positions of the European proletariat and thereby accelerated the reactionary down-sliding in the Soviet republic. The expulsion of the Opposition from the Party, the arrests, the deportations were only further stages in this process. They marked an ever greater weakening of the party and consequently also declining power of resistance of the proletariat in the Soviet republic. Nevertheless, it did not by far signify that the counter-revolutionary coup d'Etat had already been accomplished, that is, that power had passed from the hands of the proletariat into the hands of another class.

The fact that the Soviet proletariat was unable to prevent the organizational destruction of the Opposition was naturally a very alarming symptom. On the other hand, however, Stalin was compelled, simultaneously with the crushing of the Left Opposition, to commit plagiarisms from its Platform in every field, to direct the fire to the Right and to transform the inner-party maneuver into a sharp and prolonged zig-zag to the Left. In spite of everything this shows what powers of pressure the proletariat still possesses and how dependent upon it is the state apparatus. The Russian Opposition must continue to base its policy upon this fundamental fact, a policy which is one of reform and not of revolution.

Even before the organizational crushing of the Opposition, we said and wrote repeatedly that after the Left is cut off, the Right wing would present its bill to Stalin. The elements that supported Stalin in the struggle against us would exert a pressure with redoubled force as soon as the Left barriers were let down. That is just what we predicted. We formulated it as follows: "The Thermidorian tail will strike a blow at the Centrism head." This has already happened and will still be repeated. I do not mean Bucharin-Tomsky here, but the deep-going Thermidorian forces of which the Rights in the party are only the pale shadows.

In spite of the organizational demolition on the Opposition and the weakening of the proletariat, the pressure of its class interests together with the pressure of the ideas of the Opposition proved themselves sufficiently powerful to compel the Centrism apparatus to make a prolonged zig-zag that created the political pre-conditions for the latest capitulations. The composition of the capitulators is naturally very varied, but the leading role is played by those who formerly imagined the process of down-sliding as proceeding in a straight line and were prepared, at every new stage, to proclaim: Thermidor is completed. The Zinovievist, Sefarov, on the eve of our expulsion from the party, cried out, first in Berlin and then in Moscow: "It is five minutes to twelve!" that is, five minutes before Thermidor. Five minutes ticked off and Sefarov capitulated. Radek, before Sefarov, intended, on the occasion of Zinoviev's and my expulsion from the Central Committee, to proclaim that Thermidor was here. I tried to show him that this was only the Party rehearsal of Thermidor, perhaps not even the general rehearsal, at any rate it was not the Thermidor, that is, not the counter-revolutionary overthrow accomplished by the classes. Since 1926, Smilga was of the opinion that the then policy of Stalin-Bucharin ("enrich yourselves", the Anglo-Russian Committee) the Kuo Min Tang led only in one direction, to the Right, that the October revolution had exhausted its internal resources and that aid could come only from the outside, something upon which he based no hopes at all. He wrote theses on this theme. The possibility of a break between the Centrists and the Right, and of a swing of the Centrists towards the Left under the pressure of the internal forces, was entirely absent in his calculations. On the question of the Thermidor and two parties, Radek and Smilga represented the extreme "Left" position in the Opposition. And that is why events took them by surprise and why they capitulated so easily.

These brief particulars should make it clear to the reader that Urbahns' question as to whether "Trotsky goes far enough in the question of Thermidor" or "does not go far enough" (Urbahns' formulation), contains nothing new: we discussed this whole group of questions long ago and revised them at every new stage.

On May 26, 1928, I wrote from Alma-Ata to the exiled comrade Michail Okoudjava, one of the old Georgian Bolsheviks: "In so far as the new course of Stalin sets itself tasks, he undoubtedly endeavors to approach our position. In politics, however, what is decisive is not only the what but also the how and the who. The fundamental struggles that will decide the fate of the revolution are still before us. . . We were always of the opinion and we have said more than once that the process of political odwsliding of the leading faction could not be envisaged as a constantly descending curve. Even the down-sliding does not take place in a vacuum but in a class society with profound internal friction. The masses of the party are not a unit, rather they form, for the most part, the raw material of politics. Under the pressure of class blows from the Right and from the Left, processes of differentiation are inevitable. The grave events of the recent period in party history, whose consequences we suffer, are only the overture to the further development of events. Just as the overture of an opera anticipates the musical theme of the whole opera and gives a condensed expression of it, so our political "overtures" have anticipated the melodies that must develop to their full extent in the future, to the accompaniment of trumpets, double-basses, drums and other instruments of serious class music. The development of events confirms with unmistakable certainty the fact that we were correct not only as against the turncoats and weather vane of the type of Zinoviev, Kamenev, Platakov, etc., but also against our dear friends of the "Left", the ultra-Left muddle-heads, insofar as they are inclined to take the overture for the opera itself, that is to assume that the fundamental processes in the Party and the state are already at an end, and the Thermidor, which they heard about for the first time from us, is an accomplished fact. . ."

Comrade Urbahns, does this not hit the nail on the head?

Urbahns' Mistake in the Question of Thermidor

The source of a whole series of false conclusions of comrade Urbahns lies in the fact that he considers Thermidor an accomplished fact. It is true that he does not draw all the conclusions from this, but the few that he has already drawn, in the event that they were definitely affirmed, are enough to ruin the cause of the Leninbund.

In an article devoted to my expulsion from the U. S. S. R., Die Fahne des Kommunismus wrote that the "Stalinist domination can no longer be considered the representative of the working class and must therefore be fought by all means." (February 1, 1929). The expulsion of Trotsky from the country was made equivalent in this article, to the guillotining of Robespierre and his companions. In other words, Thermidor was declared to be an accomplished fact. Were this declaration dictated only by the heat of the moment, it would not be worth while dwelling upon it. The political struggle is inconceivable without exaggerations, isolated mistakes in perspective, etc. What must be considered is not the details, but the basic line. Unfortunately, the leadership of the Leninbund persistently attempts to transform the mistake into a basic line. Volkswille of February 11 prints a resolution on the situation in Russia in connection with my expulsion. The resolution says plainly: "That is the Thermidor" (Das ist der Thermidor) and the Stalinist regime for all liberties, so that it may find itself at the top in the approaching conflicts with the open counter-revolution." The editorial of Volkswille of February 13 says that "with the expulsion of Trotsky the final balance is drawn under the revolution of 1917." It is not astonishing that Urbahns, having adopted such a position, is ever more frequently obliged to declare that he is not "one hundred percent" in agreement with the Russian Opposition because it "does not go far enough". Alas! Urbahns himself continues to go far . . . along the road of his original mistake.

Of a very important analogy with Thermidor in the class sense, Urbahns (like Radek) has made a formal, and partially personal analogy. Radek said: The expulsion of the Opposition from the Central Committee is equivalent to the elimination of the Robespierist group from the government. The guillotine or exile to Alma-Ata is only a question of technique. Urbahns says: The smashing of the Opposition and the expulsion of Trotsky is equivalent to the guillotining of the group of Robespierre. The broad historical analogy is replaced here by an arbitrary and cheap comparison of a personal and episodic character.

The Russian revolution of the twentieth century is immeasurably broader and deeper than the French revolution of the eighteenth century. The revolutionary class on which the October revolution bases itself is infinitely larger, more homogeneous, more compact and more resolute than the plebeians of the French cities. The leadership of the October revolution, in all its currents, is more experienced and penetrating than the leading groups of the French revolution were or could be. Finally, the political, economic, social and cultural changes that the Bolshevik dictatorship has accomplished are incomparably profounder than the changes that the Jacobins made. If it was impossible to tear power from the hands of the plebeians without a civil war, although they were weakened by the growth of class antagonisms and the bureaucratization of the Jacobins—the Thermidor was a civil war in which the sans-culottes suffered defeat—how then can it be assumed or believed that power can pass from the Russian proletariat to the bourgeoisie in a peaceful tranquil, imperceptible, bureaucratic manner? Such a conception of Thermidor is nothing but an inverted reformism.

The means of production that formerly belonged to the capitalists are today still in the hands of the Soviet state. The land is nationalized. The exploiting elements are still excluded from the Soviets and the army. The monopoly of foreign trade still exists for protection against the economic intervention of capitalism. These are not small matters. Still more: By the power of its attack, the Opposition has compelled the Centrists to deliver blows against the Thermidorian class forces and the expression of their tendencies in the Party—even if they were not mortal blows and naturally not decisive ones. One must not close his eyes to this. In general, the policy of the ostrich is a bad policy.

The Stalinist zig-zag to the Left is just as little a "final balance" under the Thermidorian danger as the expulsion of the Oppositionists was the "final balance" drawn under the October revolution. The struggle goes on, the classes have not yet spoken their final word. Centrism remains. Bolsheviks must remain Bolsheviks. Capitulators merit only contempt. And the ultra-Left muddleheads must be called to order.

On May 1, 1928, Arbeiterstimme, organ of the Austrian Communist Opposition (comrade Frey's group), developed the following thoughts in an article entitled "In Spite of Stalin Soviet Russia is a Proletarian State":

"There are political questions that act as inflexible touchstones. For the Left Communist Oppositions, which appear today in all possible groupings and shadings, there is also such a touchstone: the question of the proletarian character of Soviet Russia. . . There are Left Communist Opposition elements who, indignant at the policy of Stalin in all its forms, throw out the baby with the bath. In certain minds, for example, the idea is beginning to take form that should the policy of Stalin persist, then Soviet Russia will be transformed in a purely evolutionary manner into a bourgeois state. . . All the degeneration in Soviet Russia is the result of the undermining work with which the bourgeoisie is occupied with in which it is seconded, objectively speaking, by the Stalinist course. In this manner, the bourgeoisie seeks to prepare the overthrow of the

The Leninbund on the Wrong Road

The misfortune of the Leninbund consists in the fact that it wants to play the role of an independent party when in reality it is only a weak faction. I do not doubt for a instant that if you persist in the present way, you will lead the organization to a catastrophe in a few months.

—Letter of comrade Trotsky to the leadership of the Leninbund, October 13, 1929.

Eighteen months ago the Leninbund received 40,000 workers' votes in Prussia, 8,374 of them in Berlin alone. During these eighteen months it has not been able to consolidate the positions gained, extend its influence into new fields and thus strengthen its ranks. For some time, comrades have tried to demonstrate that the absence of a clear political line, the perpetual floating between Korsch and Brandler could have nothing but disastrous consequences for the Leninbund. The facts have justified their predictions. At the last municipal elections, the Leninbund lost more than half the votes it had in 1928. In Berlin, where its paper, Volksstimme, appears, it fell from 8,374 votes to 3,784.

The comrades of the minority asked that lists of candidates should not be presented everywhere, on principle—which would be the act of a second party—but that we should limit ourselves to presenting them only in those places where we have a strong position and where we represent the party in the mind of the masses. That is the case at Neulissenburg, for example, where we were not only able to get all the Communist votes, but even to carry four mandates from the social democrats. That is a real success. Unfortunately, at other points in the Reich, the act of presenting candidates served the social democracy and thereby discredited communism in the eyes of the masses.

The presentation of independent tickets at all costs and on principle was serious enough, but the methods employed in the electoral campaign were often such as could only make the Leninbund ridiculous. One of the members of the national committee did not hesitate to issue a leaflet which is a model of opportunism and could be claimed by any sort of social democrat at all.

These are the manifestations of an extremely grave nature, which must engage the attention of all the members of the Leninbund if they wish to hold back their organization from the dangerous declivity down which it is slipping.

The masses still have reformist illusions that must be taken into account. It is precisely a question of carrying out a policy which in the hard daily struggle, leads the masses by means of their own experience to the limits of democracy and proves to them practically that only the overstepping of bourgeois democracy by revolutionary action can really improve their situation.

Instead of undertaking this serious and fruitful work, it is imagined that these illusions can be destroyed by decrees and hollow phrases which are based on no concrete experience. That is how the working class is left without direction in the decisive moments and lives without being capable of drawing any profit from events, as was the case in Germany in October, 1923, at the last First of May, and as is the case at present in Austria.

Soviet power. But to overthrow the proletarian dictatorship, really to seize power for itself—this can be done by the bourgeoisie only by a violent overthrow . . . We are fighting the Stalinist course. But Soviet Russia is something else than Stalin. In spite of all the degeneration which we fight and will continue to fight most resolutely, so long as the class-conscious workers are armed, Soviet Russia is a proletarian state to us, which we defend unreservedly in our own interests, in peace as in war, in spite of Stalin and in order to defeat Stalin, who is incapable of defending it with his policy. Whoever is not absolutely firm in the question of the proletarian character of Soviet Russia, hurts the proletariat, hurts the revolution, hurts the Left Communist Opposition."

This formulation is theoretically entirely irreproachable. Comrade Urbahn would have done better to reprint it in the organ of the Leninbund than to publish Korschist and semi-Korschist articles.

On November 30, the congress of the revolutionary elements who form the trade union opposition, was held in Berlin. The representatives of the opposition existing in a certain number of trade unions, those of the red factory councils, and those of the unemployed, assembled to deliberate on the organization of a vast front of defense against the offensive of capital.

The reformists are attacking this congress ferociously, and particularly the Communist Party of Germany which they denounce, as "the organizer of the trade union split". But all the revolutionary workers will support this initiative, for the congress can give a new and powerful impetus to the exploited masses on the condition, it is understood, that it is conscious of its tasks, that it appreciates correctly the situation in Germany and that it elaborates a program of revolutionary struggle capable of drawing the workers together and assuring their defense.

It is to be feared, unfortunately, that the German Communist Party is failing once more in its role and does not know how to give effective aid to the assembled delegates. On the eve of the congress it had done nothing, studied nothing and prepared nothing serious.

What will it bring to the congress in order to group together the millions of German proletarians into a powerful front of defense? Everything indicates that it will seek to cover the absence of a maturely considered policy by the customary petty methods concerning organization exclusively: they will speak of creating new committees! And they will repeat the mistakes that have so often been committed. What account will the central committee of the German Communist Party take of the systematic splitting offensive of the reformists? Continue to allow itself to be isolated until there is no longer a single Communist left in the trade unions? Until the reformists will have succeeded, without even having to fight, in demoralizing the millions of trade union workers?

And how does the party think of acting practically in order to lead the enormous mass of unemployed workers into the struggle, so as to avoid that misery does not discourage them and throw them into the arms of fascism? It is hardly permitted to hope that the present leadership will show itself capable of tackling these problems seriously.

Finally, it is inconceivable that the Leninbund, which wants to be and should be the organization of the Communist advance guard, has not yet taken a position towards this congress, that it makes no efforts to send delegates to it, and does not occupy itself with problems that it has to solve.

The Betrayal in Austria

On Saturday, the national council made the constitution reform that gives dictatorial powers to Chancellor Schober a law after an eight-hour session.

Since noon today the Austrian parliament has been meeting under a strong police guard in order to push through the fascist constitutional bill in all three readings at once. Since firm agreements have been made on all important points between the government and the social democrats, the adoption of the bill is assured.

About nine in the evening, the second reading was ended. The bill was adopted in the draft of the sub-committee. Various amendments, including social democratic ones, were rejected. The third reading begins about 10 o'clock. The last vote is still expected today.

The reporter on the bill was Schuschnigg, the Tyrolean Christian-socialist supporter of the Heimwehr leader Steidle. After him spoke Schober, who announced the extension of the constitutional reform, and thereby joined in with the proclamations of the Heimwehr and bourgeoisie press that the present bill should only be an installment, the first stage.

Schober declared, among other things, that he thanks (!) the parliament for the great work (!) it accomplished so swiftly.

The "popular movement conducted by the Heimwehr" must now recognize the constitution after the change, and there is already a "plainly visible pacification", so that the hope exists that Austria can finally proceed upon the upward grade. "Much good" was attained through the conversations with the opposition (!) Now it is necessary to fill the changed constitution "with real life".

On the unity with the social democracy, Schober declared that the government did not surrender a single point of its program and the "Opposition" participated much more positively in the completion of the work on the constitution (!)

The social democratic deputy Eisner declared that his party had voted for the constitutional bill "in order not to keep the parliament from the more important questions of Austrian economy." (!)

The whole region around the parliament is occupied by a strong police reserve. A large number of fascists with sticks and blackjacks has marched up to the support of the police. In spite of this, a few hundred revolutionary workers succeeded in penetrating the parliament on the steps of which a speaker was arrested after a few words by a large number of policemen.

Protest demonstrations also took place in the provinces. A protest meeting in front of the Rohrbach spinning mill, near the industrial center of Neunkirchen in Lower Austria was violently dispersed by the gendarmes.

The Austrian social democrats have brought their treason to a crowning point. In a "legal" way, they have put the fascist dictatorship in the saddle; they are delivering the Austrian proletariat to fascism.

The revolutionary crisis in Austria is by no means "solved" by the vote in the national council. Fascism, which has temporarily found a cover under the Schober constitution, is determined to go the whole way. It will not shrink from civil war and terror.

Various bourgeois papers are emphasizing the provisional character of this "constitutional reform." The Austro-Marxists are not doing the slightest thing to organize the defense front of the proletariat. The difficult task of organizing the masses for the counter-offensive against the further plans of the Austrian reaction lies before the Communist Party of Austria.

In France: A la Americaine

A l'Americaine is the slogan of the Tardieu bourgeoisie. It has launched its good fellow like a new moving picture is launched, with the most modern methods of commercial advertising. All over the front pages of the newspapers, in shop fronts, across the screen of passing events is displayed the optimistic smile of Tardieu, succeeding the surly countenance of Poincare. Big posters on all the walls of Paris vaunt the merits of the new product and rail at the unhappy rivalry of Daladier and company. The citizen standardized by advertising has let the new popular heroes be imposed upon him like Cadum soap. Scientific methods are being tested for manufacturing popularity. A l'Americaine, the new government is making interchangeable parts, without worrying about the old party labels, which put the old, outmoded and slow machines on the scrapheap in order to set the traditional political parties in motion. Tardieu is beating the speed record in establishing his government. He does not spare expense to get a better and quicker yield. He takes men from here, from there, from the Right and the Left, in the largest possible number in order to satisfy the largest possible amount of appetites and to assure himself of the largest clientele.

The old political parties of democracy are indignant at these new methods of competition which disarm and beat them on a ground that isn't their own, like the petty tradesmen protests against the methods of big stores. This ministry of confusion, composed of anomalous and unprincipled personages, is gravely denounced. It is gravely demonstrated that it cannot last because it violates the traditional rules of the game of the parties in a democracy. It is predicted that the unprincipled ministry will not last, that it will succumb to the joint assault of the Right, discontented with the foreign policy, and the Left, discontented with the domestic policy, and then they will see how they deluded themselves.

The success of Tardieu is stirring up a fever of political Americanism. The Right wing of the Socialist Party has not borne the torment of Tantalus inflicted upon it for many weeks in order to lead it to the final deception—it also hoists the banner of political rationalization inside the Party, of autonomy for the parliamentary group, of the revision of the statutes, of the struggle of the young against the old. Like Tardieu speaks to the "country" above the heads of the deputies, it threatens to speak to the voters over the heads of the militants and the regularly constituted organs. The struggle between the Right and the Left in the S. P. appears more and more as the struggle between the modernizers and the mossbacks. While the Left remains attached to the old revolutionary forms, devoid of all content, which petrify and demobilize it into a grandiloquent dogmatism, the Right wants to arm itself with the methods of the most modern political technique so as to make its way along the new pathways of the bankers' democracy.

With American methods, American results. Prosperity! Tardieu cries after Hoover. Optimism is on the order of the day. After the period of the 'san kine, the period of the fat; after the days of penitence, great merriment. The economy of the speculator succeeds that of the father of the family. New days, new people. The countenance of Poincare, draped in "the old honesty of a republican in the days of the empire", watching at the bedside of his sick mother, the bourgeoisie, and his little franc, has given way to the broad smile of the cynical and corrupted Tardieu, the man of N'Goko Sangha and Homs Bagdad, who is leading the dance of the five billions and the reduction of taxes. Poincare and the other republicans are in the discard, Tardieu triumphs with the methods of efficiency. And the political parties beaten in the competition, like the radical party and the socialist party, raise a loud outcry by accusing him of having stolen their program. But Tardieu moves fast and well. . . This proves only one thing: all the bourgeois political parties (including the S. P.) are in accord on the general policy to be carried out. Their estimations of the kind of merchandise fit to pour upon the political market, converge for the moment but they are more or less well stocked up for the competition and all of them have let themselves be outdone by the "unprincipled" crew of Tardieu.

This fever of Americanism, of rationalization and of efficiency in every field, is not peculiar to France. It reaches right into the U. S. S. R. where the International Press Correspondence informs us of the manufacture in series of young "Soviet Americans" (sic!). And that is normal, inasmuch as American capitalism is the firmest, the best equipped with the most modern methods. But wait! The moment that Tardieu chooses to tire our ears with his standardized screechings about prosperity, is the same time that the colossal crash in New York bares the underside of this renowned prosperity. We learn of the formidable inflation of credit that lay at its base and which, all of a sudden, gives way, reducing it to its real and doubtless respectable proportions. The electoral myth of Hoover gives way before the reality of the crisis that they sought to hold back. It is the law of the capitalist regime that all prosperity is unstable. By the American reality can be judged the value of Tardieu's American myths!

In the language of the coarse mountebank, Tardieu promises prosperity precisely at the moment when events make the very possibility of this prosperity questionable, at the moment when the Bourse, in spite of the flattery and encouragement of power, is seriously weakening.

To be sure, French capitalism no longer suffers from post-war agonies; it lives and grows. But the harbingers of the international crisis which it will have to undergo are already apparent. The workers must take cognizance of them and gather together their forces. No decade will pass before Tardieu's prosperity shows its real face: the furious efforts of capitalism to assure a stable rule, which allow of nothing, ruins everything, and which the workers will batter down.

equilibrium, which is maintained thanks only to the conservative-conciliatory policy of the social democracy, extraordinarily facilitates the position of the Austro-Marxism. What it does in the Vienna city council is enough to distinguish it from the bourgeois parties in the eyes of the workers. And what it does not do—that is, the most important things—it can always put to the responsibility of the bourgeois parties. While Austro-Marxism exposes the bourgeoisie in articles and speeches, it very skillfully utilizes, as we have already said the international dependence of Austria in order to prevent the workers from rising against class enemy. "In Vienna we are strong, but in the country we are still weak. Besides we have a master over us. We must retain our positions within the democracy and—wait." That is what the most important idea of Austro-Marxist policy looks like. All this made it possible up to now for Austro-Marxism to play the role of the "Left" wing in the Second International and to retain all its positions against the Communist Party, which continues to heap mistake upon mistake.

An Important Instrument of Capitalism

The Austrian social democracy helped the Entente make an end of the Hungarian revolution, helped its bourgeoisie to issue from the post-war crisis, and created a democratic asylum for unstable private property. Thus, it was the most important instrument for the domination of the bourgeoisie over the working class.

But this instrument is an independent organization, with an independent, numerous bureaucracy and a labor aristocracy which has its own interests and its own pretensions. This bureaucracy, flesh of the petty bourgeoisie, bases itself, according to its ideas, manners and customs upon the working class and constantly fears its dissatisfaction. This circumstance is the main source of friction and conflicts between the bourgeoisie and the social democracy, that is, between the master and the servant.

No matter how tightly the Austrian social democracy has enmeshed the working class in its net of political, trade union municipal, cultural and sport institutions, it is nevertheless plain—and the July 1927 days showed this especially clearly—that the reformists-pacifist methods alone do not give the bourgeoisie the necessary guarantees.

What has been said explains the social functions of Austrian fascism. It is the second servant of the bourgeoisie, distinguishable from the first and standing opposed to it. The lower ranks of the social democracy are impelled forward by a proletarian instinct, even if a falsified one. The lower ranks of fascism feed upon the hopelessness of the petty bourgeoisie and declassed elements, in whom Austria is so rich. The leaders of the social democracy weigh down upon the class instinct of the proletariat with the aid of the slogans and institutions of democracy. The leaders of fascism show the despair of the rotting petty bourgeoisie a way out in the perspective of a saving overthrow, after which the "Marxists" will no longer be able to hinder the good headway of agriculture, of handwork and trade.

Fascism, Bolshevism and Social Democracy

We thus have in Austria the classic refutation of the philistine theory that fascism is born out of revolutionary Bolshevism. Fascism begins to play an all the bigger role in a country, the more plainly, the more revolting and intolerable becomes the contradiction between the policy of the masses, and the unpostponable requirement of historical development. In Austria, as everywhere else, fascism appears as the necessary supplement to the social democracy, feeds upon it and comes to power with its aid.

Fascism is the legitimate son of the formal democracy of the epoch of collapse. The principles of democracy are carried through in Austria, with special crassness, to absurdity. The social democracy lacks a few percent for a majority. It can however be said—and that is no paradox, but the naked truth—that the political stubbornness of the Austrian social democracy is based not upon the 43 percent of the votes it has, but upon the 7 percent which it lacks for a majority. The foundations of capitalism would remain inviolable were the Austrian social democracy to conquer the majority. But such a conquest is by no means guaranteed. It is idiosyncrasy to believe that all questions will be settled by propaganda.

If one proceeds from the premise that the life of Austria will continue to develop within the limits of democracy, then one can absolutely not believe that in the course of the next 25 to 50 years the Austrian social democracy will positively attain a majority. The economic life of all capitalist Europe stands before a great danger coming from the United States and other overseas countries. The economic decline of Austria, which is inevitable with a perspective of peaceful development, would sooner bring a loss of votes to the social democracy than a gain. Consequently, according to the logic of democracy, in spite of the fact that a further domination of the bourgeoisie dooms the nation to decay and cultural decline, in spite of the readiness of the overwhelming mass of the proletariat—this backbone of the nation—to take a step towards socialism,—this step cannot be taken because a few percent of the voters, the darkest, the most backward, the most depraved, stand aside from the struggle, vegetate in the dark, and are ready at the decisive moment to give their votes and fists to fascism.

Democracy has reached absurdity. In the epoch of the organic and planned development of capitalism, which was combined with a systematic class differentiation of the country, democracy played a historical role, including that of the education of the proletariat. Its greatest role it played in Europe. But in the epoch of imperialism, which primarily in Europe, is the epoch of decaying capitalism, democracy has landed in a blind alley. That is why we see in Austria, where the constitution invented by the social democracy, where the social democracy occupies a big place, holds the capital city, and where, consequently, we should be seeing the democratic forms of the transition from democracy to socialism in the most perfect manner—we see in reality that politics is regulated on one side by attacking bands of fascists and on the other by retreating troops of half-armed social democratic workers, and as the orchestral director of the democracy there comes forward an old police agent of the Hapsburg school!

The Question of Unity

To the proposal of the Opposition to reestablish the unity of the party upon Leninist bases, Yaroslavsky slavishly repeats the reply that the social democrats make to the Communists when the latter attempt to establish the united front of struggle against the bourgeoisie. The leaders of the social democracy, we know, invariably affirm that the Communists do not desire the united front, their aim being, on the contrary, the division of the working class, and that in proposing a united front they are doing nothing but deceiving the working masses. In order to do this, the social democrats do not refer to confiscated (and distorted) personal letters, but to the articles and speeches of the leaders of Communism. The indignation of the social democrats feeds in this case on the knowledge of its impotence in the struggle. The Communists, know, however, that we cannot and do not want to struggle against the bourgeoisie,—why do they offer us the united front? You are deceiving the masses!" —No, reply the Communists, it is you who, by passing yourselves off as fighters, deceive the masses and we are unmasking you before them. If you do not want to be unmasked, prepare to fight!

It is by representing the faction of Stalin as the guardian of the unity of the party that Yaroslavsky receives the party. Not only the Communist Party of the Soviet Union but all the parties of the International are divided into three parts. All the organizers and directors of the Comintern in the epoch of Lenin have been removed, and, in overwhelming numbers excluded from the party. The prestige of world Communism continues to fall: he who says the contrary deceives the party. The five year industrial plan, the statistical draft for economic development—that does not settle the question. The party is the historical and fundamental arm of the proletariat. In its present state, with its present orientation of principle, its present regime and direction the party cannot succeed in its task.

In the Soviet Republic, the facade of the government apparatus, heritage of the October revolution, conceals the real situation of the party. This concealment does not exist in capitalist countries. International Communism is suffering losses all along the line and continues to fall back. And without a well-directed International, no five year plan will lead to socialism.

Under these conditions, the Opposition has once attempted to reestablish unity of the party. Naturally, we never doubted for a minute that this attempt would be repulsed. Now it has happened. The reply is given. The light necessary for those who needed it is given. Many Oppositionists who signed Rakovsky's declaration will still separate themselves from their fundamental nucleus. Let them go their way! For this fundamental nucleus has been able, in these last months, to recover completely from the stab in the back from those who capitulated. The effect of this blow, for the moment, was inordinately strong because of the isolation of the Oppositionists. The worse moment was in June-July. Therefore, it is not for nothing that Yaroslavsky is obliged to quote the June letter. The editorial board of the Bulletin is now receiving dozens of letters indicating that the crisis of the Opposition is overcome. The reply of Yaroslavsky emphasizes a whole period. The Left Centrists who, out of necessity were a part of the Opposition up to the split of the Center-Right bloc, withdrew from it when official Centrism turn to the Right. That is in the nature of things.

The Leninist opposition closes its ranks again. We must regroup ourselves on a national as well as an international scale. Towards the U.S.S.R. and the C.P. S.U., as towards the International, our method remains as before the method of reforms. But we are not ready to fight for these reforms within the limits of legality which, in the struggle for their preservation, Stalin and his Yaroslavsky constantly narrow down. We esteem it necessary to double our efforts to organize the Bolshevik-Leninists as a faction within Communism, to publish systematically the Bulletin of the Opposition, to introduce it into the U.S.S.R., and to distribute it normally among the vanguard workers of the Soviet Republic. We call upon those who think as we do to determine to help us in this cause.

The Pot of Gold for Unemployed

By ROBERT L. CRUDEN

DETROIT-(FP)—While members of the mayor's committee on unemployment confess they can do nothing with the problem and a local poster company is putting up posters to the effect that "Business is good; Keep it good! Nothing can get ahead of the U.S.", the Volunteers of America has this to say:

THE POT OF GOLD!

A local manufacturer announces the placing of thousands of workmen on his payroll. Papers print a pleasing picture of prosperity. Everywhere the story is repeated. With extra enthusiastic exaggerations each time.

Debt-ridden, destitute, despairing husbands in hundreds of hamlets read the story with a ray of returning hope. Pitiful, personal belongings hastily heaped into a bundle. A wedding ring—a few last little luxuries pawned to pay the fare.

Hurry up, hurry on, to Detroit. That's where happiness is to be had. We long looked for Pot of Gold has been located! Its in Detroit....don't the papers say so?

The arrival; and then the slow sodden sinking in of the terrible truth. "They ain't takin' on men....just now!" ...So there's another destitute, down and out family here. Another hopeless husband. Another weary, work-worn woman with children hanging hungrily to the hem of darning dress.

Despair...and a final, piteous plea for help from the Volunteers of America. Is it any wonder we NEED and ASK you to help us handle our terrifying task? you to help us handle our terrifying tasks?

Convention of the Textile Workers Union

The delegates who gathered at Paterson to attend the second convention of the National Textile Workers Union had an enormous problem before them: the problem of organizing the hundreds of thousands of textile workers in the U. S., who are among the most miserably paid and unorganized in the country into the trade union movement. The extent to which this problem was tackled correctly is a reflection of the state of affairs both in the left wing movement in general and the labor movement as a whole.

Of the approximately one million textile workers in this country, only an insignificant handful are organized in the trade union movement. Those that are unionized, are divided in rival organizations, which at one time reached the number of sixteen but are now down to three important ones: the National Textile Workers Union, the Left wing organization under the influence and control of the Communist Party, the United Textile Workers Union, the A.F. of L. conservative organization, and the mildly progressive independent Associated Silk Workers. None of them has more than a few thousand members.

The Problem of the South

A big handicap in the work of organizing these largely unskilled workers is the fact that a large share of the industry is located in the reactionary South, with a working class that was only recently agricultural in customs and ideas, which has had practically no experience in struggles, and which, in its general outlook and as a general rule is far behind the northern workers.

Add to these conditions the fact that the textile barons are extremely powerful and arrogant that they never have had to work with unions as a recognized factor, that they resist the most modest proposals of their workers with a feudal ruthlessness and terror, and some conception of the hugeness of the problem can be gained.

But since the power of the capitalist class as a factor by itself, never been the only reason for the lack of organization, the causes must be sought elsewhere. One of them is the division of the labor movement itself. And that also, is as much or more an effect than a cause. Independent textile unions—outside the A. F. of L.—have arisen in the past because of the criminally neglectful policy of the well-fed bureaucrats, who have done as much and more for the textile barons as the government, its armies and police have done. Their role has been to prevent militant action by the workers wherever possible. And when it becomes impossible for them any longer to restrain the pressure of the workers, they have joined with and led strikes only to direct them into harmless channels, that is, harmless to the textile bosses.

The National Textile Workers Union was not born out of any academic decision to oppose the A. F. of L. union, but out of live and bitter struggles, out of the Passaic strike, out of the New Bedford strike, and out of the increasing need and desire to organize the hundreds of thousands of slaves in the industry.

That the N. T. W. had the wisdom, the foresight, the militancy and policy of struggle that were and are lacking in the leadership of the old unions is evident from even its brief period of history. It is inconceivable that the Wm. Greens or Wolls or McMahoos should ever have the initiative or desire to plunge into the dangerous, vast field of the South, or conduct such a strike as Gastonia, or show even the most pallid resemblance to the spirit of battle, self-sacrifice, courage shown by the N.T.W. union members and leaders in spite of all the errors they made. Nor can one imagine a convention of the McMahon controlled union to resemble the convention of the N. T. W. U.

A Workers Convention

The tendency so profoundly developed of late among the Stalinist "leadership" of the Communist Party, to hold fake, inflated conventions was reduced to a minimum in Paterson. The delegates represented workers and were themselves workers from the mills of New England and the new-born South of the working class. The Southern delegates in particular most of not all of them new recruits in the movement were the liveliest section of the convention and discussed the problems of the union with a confidence that does not promise well for the Southern bourbons.

In fact, so prominently a place did these Southern non-Communist and non-that they frequently took the C. P. fraction by surprise, so that hectic, anxious meetings of the fraction had to be held so as to push "the party face" more assertively to the fore in the sessions. Nevertheless, the activity of these workers is a healthy sign in two senses: it bodes well for their development as active, independent fighters in the class struggle and is a lively refutation of the new Stalinist theory that no trade union can make a step forward unless it is hugged in a mechanical, artificial, stifling embrace by the Communist Party. This is all the more true because these workers are not at all animated by any anti-Communist or anti-Communist Party motives.

Another step forward marked by the convention was the improvement of its directing staff. The chaotic conditions existing up to now in the national office of the Textile Workers' Union constantly worsened by the petty battles of the Lovestones and Fosterites, were partially alleviated. Unfortunately, there are far from adequate assurances that the new central office force will function as properly as the situation requires. The mediocre people who were put into the "office staff" were not chosen for their abilities as much as they were for their readiness to rubberstamp any decision made by the present party leadership.

The Stalinists were so frightened by their previous experiences with Weisbord, Dawson, Keller and others that they calculated upon avoiding any future "deviations from the line" by installing a hand-made, hand-picked committee distinguished by nothing except a vast capacity for obedience and an even drabness of ability. Worse yet, there is not a single non-party worker on the staff, although any number of them might have been chosen, much to the profit of the organization and its proper working, as compared to some of those who were selected by the party.

Shortcomings of Conference

Another, and more serious shortcoming of the conference, was the program of work and policy it adopted. The main resolution on the situation and tasks of the union was drawn in the style, tone and content of the political resolution at a Communist Party convention. There is no question of a technical distinction here, but of the documentary reflection of the position taken by the party for the creation of simon-pure Communist unions which result in the final analysis to narrowing down these organizations to party members and their sympathizers. Whoever fails to draw these lessons from the decline of the Left wing needle trade unions under that policy is riding for a fall in the textile union as well.

The main problem before the union—the organization of the textile workers into a militant class union—was not properly dealt with in the convention or the resolution. To read the latter, one would never imagine that it was adopted by a body incorporating approximately five to six thousand members out of about a million workers in the industry.

What the resolution particularly failed to consider adequately was the coming campaign of the A. F. of L. in the South. For analysis, it substituted denunciation. While all the attacks made upon the A. F. of L. bureaucracy are justified a thousand times over, it is insufficient simply to declare that "we must carry on a continual campaign of exposure and open struggle" against it. The fact remains that the bulk of the Southern textile workers do not yet distinguish between the militant Left wing unions and the reactionary A. F. of L. unions. To assert the contrary is self-deception and nothing else.

The workers learn to separate friend from foe by experience in the struggle and not by decree or thesis. The American workers particularly will yet go through a thousand betrayals and defeats before they take the path of revolutionary struggle. The task of the Communists and the Left wing is to hasten this process by exposing the labor lieutenants of capitalism in the very heat of the struggle, by diminishing and trying to eliminate the experiences of defeat and treason by guiding and teaching the workers while they are fighting.

In the United States at the present time the best means to this end is the tactic of the united front. For those who have conceived of the united front in the past as an alliance of leaders at the top, the proposal now may seem to be a "conservative" ed front as an instrument for uniting the advanced, revolutionary workers with the backward, conservative workers in a struggle not only against the capitalists but also against their labor agents, the proposal still holds good.

The tactic of the united front is the way in which the true role of the Greens, McMahoos, and Mustes of all varieties—who do not want to and will not unite with the militants for a common struggle because that is not their function in the labor movement—will be demonstrated even to the most backward worker. And they are the ones to consider in the South,

The Daily Worker Gasps for Arguments

At a complete loss to reply with any reasoned political arguments to the viewpoint and criticism given by us in the Militant, the Daily Worker has constantly been compelled to resort to the old, reliable but not very honest expedients of misrepresentation and slander. Throw a lot of mud—some of it must stick! The new experts in fighting Trotskyism calculate that Mark Twain was probably right when he remarked that a lie will travel all around the world while truth is pulling on its boots. One of the purest (in the chemical sense) examples of this method of argument can be found in the Daily Worker (12-30-1929) under the title "Economic Crisis and the Crisis Among the Opponents".

The section of that editorial devoted to Lovestone is too obvious and needs no particular comment. Nowadays, anyone, even the muddled Centrists of the Stalin school, is capable of politically and theoretically annihilating the national-reformist and petty bourgeois ideology of the Right wing throughout the International. All the Centrists have to do—and that is what they actually do—is to look up the articles and documents of the Opposition written years ago and borrow their arguments wholesale from this inexhaustible arsenal. The veriest pop-gun from this store of weapons, even when it is held in the unskilled and trembling hand of the Centrists, is heavy enough against the primitive defense of the Right wingers.

Centrism Out of Its Element

But when the Centrist turn to attack the Communist Opposition, he finds himself gasping out of his element. He dares not, and does not any longer pretend, to discuss the fundamental questions of principle and strategy that divide the Communist movement: national reformism (socialism in one country) versus revolutionary internationalism; subordination of the proletariat to the colonial bourgeoisie (Chinese revolution) or the socialist path in the colonial countries; workers and peasants versus proletarian parties; etc., etc., etc. The same holds true in virtually every important issue of the day in the class struggle, be it in the trade union field where the Centrists hop from one position to another without the slightest knowledge of where they are going, or in any other. The only thing left, then, is misrepresentation, insinuation and slander. The above-mentioned editorial is a classic example. It says:

"The Trotskyite opportunists waited more than two months before they could pick up courage to utter a word of analysis of the crisis... But finally they have decided they simply must speak, even without the long-awaited directives from Constantinople." As for the "blistering" sarcasm about the "long-awaited directives", it is to laugh considerably. But before you laugh, bear in mind that the people who write so "ironically" about directives from afar are precisely the same ones who did not know for many long months whether American capitalism had reached its apex or its Victorian age, and finally had to be told in the "long-awaited directives from Moscow" that they were all wrong on everything but their mutual charges of unprincipledness. They are the very same people who cannot sleep, eat, drink, think, white, act or do anything at all without first inquiring from Stalin whether it is in accordance with the latest "line". They are the people who make "analyses" and work out "lines" yesterday only to repudiate and condemn them today where they predominate. They are the ones who will at present follow the A. F. of L. if it arrives first on the scene and shows the necessary initiative and they will follow the National Textile Workers Union if it is the one that gets to the workers first. It is to show the workers that the Left wing holds the banner of unity in struggle, that it is ready to unite its forces with every worker, no matter if he still has some faith in the Greens for the moment, that the N. T. W. must adopt the tactic of the united front. That this was neither done nor considered at the Paterson convention marks a weakness in the union's position traceable to the present line of the Communist Party leadership. But the course of the struggle will convince the militants in the organization of the right path to pursue.

discarded—by command—tomorrow. Their political life is the survival of the fittest—stomach, i. e., the stomach that can digest or give forth any and every policy rammed down its throat by the ruling regime in the Russian Party.

We already outlined and analyzed the character and the outcome of the American depression and crisis in the Platform adopted by our first national conference in Chicago seven months ago. Since our analyses were not made and remade to fit some fatcat emergency, our platform stands, and its predictions are steadily verified by the course of events. Anyone who reads the Militant, and certainly the avid readers of the D. W. knows that we have referred to this analysis and repeated it on numerous occasions in the recent past. Therefore, when the Daily Worker says, "In the Militant of December 28, we finally receive the first word of Trotskyist analyses of the economic crisis", it is stating a limping falsehood calculated to avoid the discomfort of arguing against our analysis.

Not satisfied with this, the D. W. needs resort to the shabby trick of yanking a sentence or two out of a news story and presenting it as though it were our first and last word on the economic situation. The scintillating facetiousness of the Daily Worker on the question of long skirts is merely unvarnished dishonesty: "The quotation it makes from the news story in the Militant refers exclusively to the dress industry and the factor played in it by the so-called 'long skirt models'. The upright Daily Worker 'overlooks' this 'little point' and makes it appear as though the Militant maintains that what is wrong with American industry today is the failure of the ladies to buy long skirts instead of short ones! Is this not profound? Is it not a conclusive proof of the renegacy of the Trotskyists? Does it not expose and annihilate them the thousandth time, annihilate them?"

Well, we can be even more "revolutionary" than the Daily Worker on the question of the crisis. It says for instance, in the same issue: "Crisis Becomes Severe in 50 years; 5,000,000 Jobs" and proceeds to remark that "no one mentioned a specific figure of national employment of the working class. Daily Worker has placed the number, excess of 5,000,000!" We think that to a genuine revolutionist in these momentous days of the Third Period and the New Line, the Daily Worker should have written "Crisis is worst in world history. American capitalism on the brink of collapse. Communists ready for power. Trotskyists shamelessly announce 5,000,000 unemployed. Daily Worker places number higher than 10,000,000. We are twice as radical as Trotskyists."

As it hobbles painfully to the conclusion of its "arguments", the Daily Worker announces that "pending their formal amalgamation", and "while the Right wing (Lovestone) and the Trotskyites are formally separated at the top, they already have a practical amalgamation of the machinery of distribution of their papers at the bottom." (This penetrating wisdom flows from the fact that the Militant and Revolutionary Age are sold at the Rand School news stand). As for our "formal amalgamation", the D. W. has probably confused us with the recent amalgamation of Stalin and Bucharin. Nevertheless, we would be very much obliged to the D. W. if it would answer a question:

Why not fix the final date for our amalgamation with the Right wing thereby getting the matter off your mind and laying the suspense of your new nerves

LETTERS FROM THE MILITANTS

The NEW YORK BUILDING TRADES

New York, N. Y.

Dear Comrades:

Marching the sidewalks of New York looking for employment, one is reminded of the advice by that good fellow known as Prosperity Hoover who suggests that the salvation of the unemployed is to...find employment. Simple as it sounds, it is not quite so simple in its application.

As is known, there is a vast army of workless seeking work not only in New York but throughout the country. It is no exaggeration when we say that the number runs well over 4,000,000 and is still going strong.

Among the industries that have been hard hit is the building trades. In "good" times we always had a few thousands out of work in the industry, but of late the number has soared pretty high. Bricklayers, iron workers, steam fitters, plumbers, painters, tile layers, etc.—about one-third of them are unemployed right now, not to speak of their helpers, laborers, and men who are engaged in the manufacture of building material.

Well, some explanation of this can be found in the report of the Chamber of Commerce that in the year 1929 there was $360,000,000 less building work done than in the year 1928—a normal year. That is how it looks in general, let us examine the particular trades.

Take the bricklayers, for instance. Today there are concrete buildings coming. It requires less material, less labor to pour in buildings than to lay single bricks. The framework of a building or the iron structure, as we know, is all made and patterned according to the architect's plan. That is also the case with fixtures, window and door frames which are done in shops and put in according to the plans of the building. Such methods have existed in these lines of work for quite some time.

Take the plumbing trade, where practically 100 percent, or at least 90 percent of the pipe work was cut and threaded on the job by union mechanics. It is today cut to sketch, brought on the job and then put together by lead and screwing the fittings together, thus eliminating about 40 percent of the work. Well, if 40 percent of the work is done on the outside, in open shops, how about getting the unemployed plumbers, whose job it is, to demand that this work be given to them? Didn't they get the 40 hour week? What does it matter if union or non-union material comes in?

One of the biggest plumbing bosses in the city, who formerly had about 35 jobs on the go, has now about 10 jobs and not small ones either, but jobs ranging from 48 stories down. On a big job, such as 48 stories, the Durham system is applied or, simply, a screw pipe job. That means that all the piping has to be cut and threaded. In such a structure 12 inch to 3 inch pipe is used. Generally, pipe up to 4 inches or even 6 inches used to be cut on the job, but since 1927, when the plumbers lost their strike, all pipe ranging from 2 inches upward is done to sketch on the outside. This boss has a shop with three machines running two shifts. Employed at this work are young workers or plumbers' helpers who get 50 and 55 cents an hour. One machine alone replaces about 10 sets, that is, ten plumbers and ten helpers. Not only do the labor bureaucrats refrain from getting these machines run by union men but they won't even organize the workers who run them.

In the steamfitting trade it is known that all pipe work ranging from 3-8 inch up is cut to sketch in an open shop. Yet there is new mechanization taking place. The welding of large pipe is beginning to appear in buildings and more and more men are replaced. Where formerly it took 4 sets to do the work, one set can do it more simply and quickly.

That is how it runs in the other trades. The army of unemployed being on the increase, the cutting of wages will take place, hours of work made longer, the unions smashed, etc. However, the building trade proletarian will see all the glorious "prosperity" he enjoyed for a while, gradually fading away. After all it will not be so easy for the building trade worker, after having such a relatively good standard of living, to let it pass by so lightly. He will fight and fight desperately to maintain a standard of living for himself and his family.

The Communists must be on the alert in the growing radicalization of these workers in the forefront of their struggle. No matter how reactionary the old unions may be, we must get into them and fight with the workers for real militancy, connecting their economic struggle with the political fight for the working class. In the bulk of the building trades today, it is absolutely ridiculous to keep yelling at the workers to break their unions and form new ones at the present time. It is by working as Communist workers with these workers who are not yet conscious of their tasks that we will win them for the cause.

JACK SPRAGUE

TWO KINDS OF CORRUPTED PRESS

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Comrades:

I was extremely pleased in reading your article in reply to the falsifications published in the Daily Worker by Browder that we are in a united front with the Love-tonites. We thought that only the capitalists, with their corrupted press, were capable of misrepresenting and distorting whatever was against their own interests, but we see that these malicious tactics are finding their place in the Stalinist press.

Because they have no concrete arguments to present against us, in the great ideological (?) struggle against Trotskyism, they use such methods only in order to prejudice and blind the members. The only thing they know about Trotskyism is that we are "renegades" and "counter-revolutionaries". They willingly accept any discussion with members of the S. P., the S. L. P., the I. W. W. (even with the Fascists!), but not with the Trotskyists. As for the Militant, not only don't they dare to read it, but even do not touch it for fear of being contaminated. And how they dare to call renegades such comrades as Trotsky and Rakovsky! I knew the latter personally in Rumania when he was secretary of the Socialist Party and one of the most prominent figures in the labor movement of that country.

For these reasons, I think it necessary that the Militant not only unmask such calumnies as are published in the Daily Worker, but also begin publishing regularly, in a fixed space on the front page, our political platform so that the revolutionary workers will know what is the real position of our Communist group.

We indeed realize the great difficulties and obstacles which confront us. History teaches us that in every new movement the masses—the multitude, do not think rightly. Their minds are mainly dominated by a certain ruling class. We also know that such great struggles require self-sacrifice and persistence until our final triumph and victory.

Therefore we are determined to work consistently with unshakable confidence in building a movement based on the revolutionary experience of history as taught by Marx and Lenin. Let us then devote all our efforts, energy and honest Leninist determination to our ideological struggle.

JAMES ECONOMOU

MERRY CHRISTMAS IN YOUNGSTOWN

Youngstown, Ohio.

Dear Comrades:

"Merry Christmas and Happy New Year," say the bosses of the mills of this Valley of Iron and Steel. This hackneyed expression, bulging with irony, is nothing less than insult added to injury at a time like this.

The mills have been idle since the first week in November. Some departments are working a few days each week and others are not working at all. Many workers had not a dollar coming on last pay day, which was supposed to be our Christmas pay.

They wish us "Merry Christmas" and invite us to church to sing Glory, Glory, Hall-a-lula, and to commemorate the birth of Jerusalem Slim. But the willingness to sing and the desire to commemorate cannot emanate from the body which carries an empty stomach.

How can we be merry, how can we be happy when we are walking the streets from place to place, begging some master's leave to let us toil for him, while poverty and starvation stare us in the face?

When the mills are going at their best we receive nothing more than a sustenance wage. For this wage we are the victims of a diabolical speed-up system. The speed-up system, the twin baby of capitalism, has filled the bosses' warehouses, has precipitated the present industrial slump and has thrown us out on the streets as slaves without the means of existence.

Our only chance of fighting this speed-up system is through organization. "In union there is strength." A considerable number of the mill workers are ready and hoping for organization, industrially at least. But they cannot so easily see how their working conditions can be improved by joining a political party which issues a bulletin once in a while, telling them lies about the job on which they are working.

These workers cannot be blamed for their views on the "Workers Party". When they attend a public meeting called by the official party, they can see at first glance that the Youngstown branch of the party is not run by workers, but is dominated, steered and warped by second hand shoe peddlers, storekeepers, by the lowest grade of petty bourgeoisie. And of course they go home from such a meeting with feelings of disappointment, disgust and contempt.

We were amused, in addition to being assured of our correct political line, by the Daily Worker outburst of Mr. Chiang Kai-Shek Browder, the present day Wolfe. Well, what's the use of a watchdog if he doesn't bark? And how can one play the role of a Wolfe without howling?

We do not forget that Browder was Stalin's Yankee priest in China, and that he carried out the orders of pope Stalin. Even though Chiang Kai-Shek was murdering the workers of China, Browder aided him until such time as Chiang thumbed his nose at Stalin.

It is preposterous; and if one did not know the recent role of the C.I. leadership, it would seem impossible to imagine a character like Browder having cheek enough to open his mouth. He may or may not (I don't know which) be competent to play the role of a Wolfe, but if he had the conscience of a mongrel he would forever see the blood of the Chinese working class looking him in the eyes. He would not consider himself absolved from the sin of helping Chiang Kai-Shek just because he has since done penance by denouncing Chiang, the Chinese hangman, his former idol. If this man Browder had any sense of decency left he would go behind the curtain where he could keep his eyes and ears open and his mouth shut.

With revolutionary greetings,

CHARLIE BYRNE

NATIONALISM vs. INTERNATIONALISM

New York, N. Y.

Dear Comrades:

I think it is pertinent that the Militant give voice to the subject: Nationalism versus Internationalism in the labor movement. The time is ripe for every worker to understand the full meaning of Marx' saying: "Workers of the world, unite!"

We all know that skilled labor, the aristocracy of labor, and its trade unions are essentially nationalistic in their outlook. Their heads are puffed up with nationalistic prejudices. Hence they are enemies of internationalism, enemies of workers' unity.

One reason why the millions of auto workers, textile workers, etc., have not been organized into trade unions is because the average aristocrat of labor looks with contempt upon an unskilled worker. Unskilled laborers to him are "rabble", an "undesirable", "disloyal" element.

But we have arrived at a stage of capitalist development where trade unionism is being sorely tried. Through improved machinery, thousands upon thousands of skilled workers are being pushed down the ladder into the "gutter" among the unskilled. The circle of trade union aristocrats is getting smaller and smaller, while the circle of the unskilled, semi-skilled and those workers who have lost their trade through the machine, grows larger and larger. It falls upon the shoulders of the Communist movement to gather and organize the unskilled, semi-skilled and all those workers disinherited by the machine, under the banner of internationalism. The time is here to bring home to every worker the incomparable words: "Workers of the world, unite!"

KARL LIEBKNECHT DAY

A.F. of L. Opens Up in the South

As we go to press (Monday) the American Federation of Labor opens its long proclaimed conference in Charlotte, N. C., "to map out a plan for organizing the wage earners of the South". It is composed exclusively of A. F. of L. officials, coming largely from the United Textile Workers and its affiliated groups.

The whole record of the leaders of the A. F. of L., from William Green to Thomas McMahon, president of the U. T. W., is a living refutation of the statement that they will organize the Southern workers for a genuine struggle against their Bourbon masters. One need go no further than the textile field to evaluate the "work" that the fat boys of the A. F. of L. will do in the South.

Remember Passaic!

About two years ago, the A. F. of L. leaders entered the Passaic strike, after the Left wing had led one of the most spirited struggles in American history, took over the union created by the Communists and the Left wing, offered the workers up to the bosses on a silver platter, and then strangled what was left of the union. In the New Bedford strike, the leaders of the A. F. of L. organized the skilled workers, kept them separated from the unskilled who formed the mass of textile operatives, and then worked their fingers to the bone in order to break the strike.

In the more recent Elizabethton, Tennessee, strike, the sellout by the U. T. W. leaders was so raw that many of the workers struck over again spontaneously, in spite of the lid that had been put on the union by the imported bureaucrats. The same story can be told in Marion and elsewhere.

What is most significant of the A.F. of L.'s entry into the South at the present time is that it only comes after the work accomplished by the Left wing particularly in the Gastonia strike. As the press announces, without an attempt at concealment, the A. F. of L. is going into the South in order to wipe out the Left wing and its union, the N. T. W. This is precisely the aim the bosses have set themselves. The latter understand their William Green very well. While he is not needed by them in ordinary peaceful times he comes in very handy when the problem arises of fighting the militant Left wing and its union. It is clear from the whole situation in the South today that: 1. The bosses will use the services of the A. F. of L. to displace the Left wing union or to ward off the danger of the Left wing; when the Left wing menace is removed for the time being, the bosses know how easy it is to handle the accommodating Greens. 2. The bosses will fight against the A. F. of L.'s mildest attempt at unionization in those places where it is not needed to head off into harmless channels an existing or impending struggle.

The coming of Green and McMahon to the South is not "a step forward" for them, but a sinister move against the Left wing, and therefore against the textile workers. The blunders made by the Left wing, under the direction of the present leadership of the Communist Party, will only facilitate Green's work. Instead of intensifying its activity in the South, the Left wing has had its most capable and experienced people withdrawn until only a skeleton of the forces required is left there. Besides this, the Left wing still persists in its policy of self-satisfied isolation and sensational ultra-Leftism. Its present course only doubles and trebles the difficulties with which it is confronted by the latest A. F. of L. move in the South.

KARL LIEBKNECHT

At the Martyr's Grave-side

By Karl Radek

With your tears you have bathed his dead body, whose wounds cry to the heavens against the socialist betrayers; with the red banner of the proletarian world revolution you have covered him and placed him in your hearts so that he may rest there forever. Millions of you know no more of him than that, in the black night, illuminated only by the flash of cannon, he broke out of the trenches with a small force to fight for peace; that cast into prison by the mighty, he stoically endured every torment and hardly liberated from his chains raised anew the banner of struggle and fell with it in his hands, fell on the threshold of a new life.

But I want every proletarian to know about Liebknecht, to love him, not only as the blood-bedecked symbol of a martyr, but as he was in life, with his faults and merits, not as a "puzzled-out book" but as a man with his "contradiction". The man Liebknecht should be our great model, a model for our youth who should learn to fight, a model for our women who should not let themselves be oppressed by life, a model for our weather-beaten men who are haunted by doubts. The time has not yet come to proceed to a detailed biography of Karl Liebknecht. In his house of mourning the soldiers of the German counter-revolution still rule, and as I write these words, an inspection of the papers he left behind is impossible, yes, myself illegally in hiding, I cannot even gather the printed documents. But I believe that I see at a glance his rich life in its peculiarity and I want to describe it here.

At Liebknecht's Cradle

...Songs of heroes were sung at Liebknecht's cradle... The first impressions that the boy received were the persecutions of the Socialist Law. The German bourgeoisie and the Hohenzollerns sought to stifle the first socialist stirrings of the German proletariat. For him who spread the criminal teaching: "the putrid belly shall not waste what diligent hands have earned", who aroused the poor and disfranchised, there was no peaceful working place; he had to wander, persecuted, from place to place nowhere secure from police spies.

Wilhelm Liebknecht remained at his post and did not suspend the struggle for socialism even when it was again necessary to show by suffering that we live for the liberation of humanity. Karl may often have asked himself as a child what the strange men were ferreting for in the house of his father, why people came into the house secretly at night, whispering quietly like thieves: good people they must have been, for warmly welcomed by his parents, they would stroke his little black head. Thus he grew up in the years of persecution as the son of the soldier of the revolution. To be a soldier, a warrior of the revolution, that was the gift conferred upon him in his cradle.

The Socialist Law fell. The growing, strengthening capitalism simultaneously also strengthened the working class numerically, and with the growth of the working class, the German social democracy grew in spite of all the persecution. There began the "new course", the endeavor to win the working class through social concessions, and although it apparently retreated immediately to a new sharp course, yet the spirit of the epoch was such that, while strengthening capitalism accorded the

Velvet Words Conceal U. S. Arms Growth

By SCOTT NEARING

Velvet words, hiding the growing claws of naval and military power: thus might be summarized the position of the American Empire during recent years. Coolidge followed this policy. Hoover has adopted it. Both have talked persuasively about peace. Both have been preparing the country for war.

Recently the London Economist published a detailed report on the 1929 cost of war to the various nations. The United States leads the list with 4,553 million gold francs. Great Britain, second on the list, spends only 2,800 million gold francs on war. If, to the figures of Great Britain are added the figures of arms expenditures for the remainder of the British Empire, the result shows the American Empire and the British Empire together are spending more than two-fifths the total for the entire world.

Military costs are greater in the United States than they are in any other single country. These costs, with some modification for the increase in the cost of living show very clearly the direction in which the country is moving.

As lately as 1926 United States expenditures on the army and navy totalled only $580 million. They were $685 million in 1929, and the 1932 budget calls for $891 million.

Even clearer, as indices of military preparations, are the figures showing the actual fighting machine of the United States.

Begin with the army. Up to the time of the Spanish-American war the United States army numbered about 27,000 regulars and 113,000 members of the national guard, or a total of some 140,000. In 1910 the total strength of the regular army was 80,000 and the national guard, 120,000, making a total of 200,000.

In 1927, the regular army numbered 133,000 and the national guard 181,000. In addition to these two branches of the army, however, there were 110,000 in the officers' reserve. These, with some incidental figures, make the total army strength of 1927, 430,000, or more than twice the figure for 1910, and more than three times the figure for the period immediately preceding the Spanish-American war.

There were 276 vessels in the United States navy in 1906, having a total displacement of 693,000 tons. For 1927 the number of vessels was 734—nearly three times the figure for 1906. The tonnage had more than trebled—2,225,000 tons.

Whatever Hoover, or any of his subordinates may say, the fact remains that the American Empire is spending more for military purposes than any other nation in the world, and that these expenditures, and the military machine which they are building up, are growing rapidly, year after year.

1930 to Be «Lean Tough» Year

NEW YORK (FP)—Nineteen-thirty will be a "lean, hard, tough" year according to Business Week, published by McGraw Hill, which also sponsors the leading industrial and trade magazines. Intense competition, with disaster for weaker firms, is foretold. Workers can interpret for themselves the meaning of this competition in speed-up, low wages and unemployment.

Economists, statisticians, and the glorified soothsayers employed to shed prestige on big corporations have been filling the business press with their usual prognostications. Usually these oracles stress the inherent "soundness of business", namely people must eat and live and therefore will not cease all buying. Sec. of the Treasury Mellon typifies their viewpoint when he says that "I see nothing in the present situation that is either menacing or warrants pessimism. During the winter months there may be some slackness or unemployment, but hardly more than is usual at this season of the year." In this jaunty manner does the great Pittsburgh magnate toss off the plight of millions of wretched workers.

What About the Workers?

In the deluge of words published concerning the industrial depression whose beginning was seen last summer, hardly any consideration is given the workers who bear the brunt of hard times. Statisticians bend their brains to the task of estimating whether profits will decline 15% or 25% in 1930, but no attention is paid to workers' income and hardly any more as to whether he is to have a chance to make a living.

Construction and automobiles are considered the leading forces in depression and recovery. The auto slump that started last fall continues unabated, and the industry looks to the production of 1,000,000 fewer cars in 1930. That means a smaller demand for steel, textiles, electrical equipment and all the products that go into auto building. In construction no marked recovery is expected.

Profits Rise

Workers' attention is called to the prospect that many employers will attempt to justify wage cuts with stories of falling profits. But the net income available for dividends for 1929 is estimated at $3,500,000,000 for 550 leading industrial firms. This is an increase of 17.6% over the previous year.

Poverty Spreads in St. Louis

ST. LOUIS (FP)—With more than 1,000 workers' families applying for charity during the first 17 days of the month, December, 1929, has seen destitution establish new records in this city unequalled during the history of organized charity.

These facts are revealed by the official journal of the St. Louis Provident Assn. family case work agency, which says that "district superintendents report unemployment the major cause of the flood of applications".

Joblessness shows the greatest increase says the report, in foundries, shoe factories, paper box factories, automobile assembly plants and construction companies. Workers over 40 years old are hardest hit. The survey takes account only of able-bodied unemployed.

Thirty-one cents of every dollar spent for relief during December, the report estimates, will go to families where unemployment is responsible for the need. This is the largest proportion of relief chargeable to any one cause. When it is considered that a family case work agency must also care for families where the wage-earner is dead, incapacitated, too old to work, non-supporting, or where earnings are insufficient for the family's support, the seriousness of the situation is apparent.

N. C. WANTS ANTI-LABOR LAW, TOO

NEW YORK—Condemnation of three Ohio workers to long terms in the penitentiary for anti-militarist agitation has suggested to the Gastonia, N. C. Gazette and the Charlotte, N. C. Observer the desirability of such a law in North Carolina to curb the union agitators.

WASHINGTON (FP)—Information received at the U. S. Department of Commerce and at the Chamber of Commerce of the United States shows that the coming six months will witness nationwide unemployment in the industries which supply the foreign export trade. Due to the severe business depression in South America and Cuba, caused by a drop of 35 to 55 percent in prices of coffee and sugar, and due to the steady drift of many European countries toward hard times, American export trade faces the worse crisis since the war. Millions of American wage workers may suffer between now and July, from the collapse of foreign buying.

The Department of Commerce expert on Latin America, writing in the Commerce Reports for January 6, predicts serious political unrest in Brazil, Colombia and other countries of South America as a result of the present business disaster.

Pullman Co. Absorbs Notorious Union Foe

PITTSBURG (FP)—Standard Car Corp., ruthless and conscienceless foe of unionism in western Pennsylvania, has been absorbed by the Pullman Co., whose own record against labor is unparalleled.

Typical of western Pennsylvania feudalism is Standard Steel Car's plant at Butler, near Pittsburgh. Fearful evidently of the results of its anti-union policy among workers, the company had one of the five state police barracks placed in Butler when the plant was built. The company donated the ground and many facilities.

A Company Town

The inevitable company town was built at Lyndora, inhabited chiefly by immigrant workers and their families. It was through streets lined by miserable company sheds that the police patrolled its force during the steel strike of 1919. Often these sheds had barn doors for the entrance of what the company considered its human cattle. On occasion the figure of the mounted cossack bent on mowing "guineas" and "wops", sent women and children fleeing through the doors into their sheds.

Across the street car tracks was the city of Butler inhabited by native born workers and bosses. Here the Mellon car company domination was more polite but just as effective. Years ago an old pioneer land owner and county judge controlled Butler, today his sons are in charge of the Republican city and county machines, and are physician and attorney for the car company.

Boy Scout Movement Anti-Strike

Standard Steel Car benignly fathers all civic affairs from the Salvation Army and the Community Chest to the Boy Scouts. The Boy Scout secretary once told the Federated Press correspondent that car company officials hoped to decrease the possibilities of strikes through careful fostering of the Boy Scout movement in Lyndora.

Decline in the demand for steel cars led to perpetual unemployment in Butler, as the plant alone could have cared for the entire national demand in 1927. Orders were shuffled between the Butler and Hammond, Ind. plants as well as Osgood-Bradley at Worcester, Mass., involved in the latest merger.

In 1926 part of the idle car plant was made into a modern rolling mill unit of the Columbia Steel Co., unit of the American Rolling Mills Co. (Armco) which recently crushed a steel workers' strike in Middletown, Ohio.

This year the Austin Automobile Co., a British concern, took over another idle section of Standard Steel Car plant on the understanding that common labor was not to be paid above 36 cents an hour, the rate prevailing for such labor in all Butler industry.

Racketeer is Pal of Matty Woll

By Harvey O'Connor

NEW YORK (FP)—Pres. Paul Vaccarella of the Loyal Labor Legion is back on the first pages of the metropolitan press again. This time it is because of the inclusion of his name on a telephone list kept by a drug ring raided by federal authorities.

Matty Woll's Pal

Vaccarella, alias Kelly, is best known in the labor world as the sole owner and proprietor of the Loyal Labor Legion, a racket which fetes prominent labor men on Labor Day. Its performance on last Labor Day was held at a Long Island resort, where Mathew Woll, a featured guest, pinned a medal on Edward F. McGrady, of the A. F. of L. as the outstanding labor man of the year.

Vaccarella also burst into the public prints recently in connection with charges by Maj. F. H. LaGuardia, Republican candidate for mayor of New York in the recent election, that the labor racketeer headed a gang of gunmen who terrorized Italian voters in the Bronx. His latest appearance in print is in connection with the sensational disclosures concerning City Magistrate Albert Vitale, whose connections with the New York underworld and the dope ring in particular are now under closest scrutiny by the federal government, the Bronx grand jury and the Bar Assn.

The Loyal Labor Legion was organized in war time to break strikes on the New York waterfront and assure loyalty to the government. Vaccarella was later closely associated with Czar Brindell of the Building Trades Council, who rounded out his career in Sing Sing. Then he preyed on his fellow-countrymen, organizing them into municipal service unions, exacting tribute from them in turn for deals with Tammany Hall. One racket was the publication of a magazine for which 18,000 members of New York Laborers Union had to subscribe at $2 a year.

Notorious Gangster

Vaccarella was described in the American Mercury recently by Herbert Asbury as perhaps New York's outstanding racketeer and gangster and owner, in his heyday, of the "flashiest palace of sin in New York City." He was kicked out of the Longshoremen's Union by T. V. O'Connor then president, but later held a lucrative job in the New York District Council.

The Loyal Labor Legion's only apparent activity is social and is concentrated on the Labor Day affair, at which liquor and oratory are the "pieces de resistance". The culmination of the affair is the award of a medal to the "most outstanding labor man of the year." McGrady was rewarded last Labor Day for his efforts in "smashing the Left wing in the New York Needle trades."

NEW YORK (FP)—Twelve known lynchings were reported for 1929 by the Natl. Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People. Not a single lyncher was punished during the year.

Among those lynched were four whites, including a white woman, Ella May Wiggins, Gastonia union organizer, who was shot to death on a highway in broad daylight.

One of the Negro victims, reported the N. A. A. C. P., was a 72-year-old man, who was brutally beaten, his hands severed, and then thrown into the Sewanee River to drown.

masses of skilled workers more endurable conditions of living, it thereby restrained them from sharp revolutionary struggle. In appearance, socialism became "red-cheeked". The party organizations grew, the trade unions bloomed. Revolutionary resolutions were adopted at branch meetings and the party conventions. But in practice the struggle was carried on only for small improvements in material conditions of the workers, not for the revolutionary overthrow. And since deeds are as decisive in the character of a party as they are in determining the character of a man, the social democracy became a party of reform and not of revolution, no matter how revolutionary were the words it employed.

Imbued with Revolutionary Traditions

Karl Liebknecht, who grew to his youth in the period of this moderation and petrification, who followed political and social events with the greatest concern, even if he had not yet then put his hand actively to politics, was in a way already insured by heredity against this bourgeoisification and mechanization of the revolutionary spirit. In the house of Wilhelm Liebknecht lived the traditions of 1848, the traditions of the revolution and the struggle for the republic.

Ten years ago it had already struck me, when I had the opportunity to become acquainted for the first time with the German party leadership, that Karl Liebknecht was the only one of the "permanent" leaders for whom republicanism was no purely theoretical creed, but a practical burning question. And, secondly, what caught one's eye was the fact of how little petrified he was in the conception that the evolution would be slow, that neither the state nor social relations would be set into motion before long. In this connection, it was for him no question at all of the theoretical weighing of forces, that would soon bring quiet, "peaceful" Europe into rebellion. The situation was not yet revolutionary, it was necessary to go to the masses in order to arouse them. And here another characteristic feature of Liebknecht comes to light. Before the war he was frequently reproached because he was very "broad" in his conceptions, that every form of activity was dear to him, even if it were not of much importance "in principle". The basis of this accusation was formed by the, for Germany, unusual animation of Liebknecht which did not allow him to give up any method of influencing the workers on the ground of some doctrinaire considerations. This also explains his intervention in the movement for withdrawal from the church. He had a good eye for new requirements, for new movements opening a road.

When he entered politics, the first signs of the imperialism that was growing stronger in Germany also, began to be marked, the strides of capital beyond the "fatherland's frontiers" for new sources of profit. The party divined the dangers of war arising from it, but only Liebknecht saw it in real life as the Moloch that stretched out its arm for millions of proletarian youth. That is how he was one of the few who hurried to the threatened youth to summon them against these dangers. The party forbade special anti-militarist agitation. It declared that the education of the proletarian youth must by itself arm them against the militaristic spirit and that the whole struggle of the proletariat against capitalism was at the same time a struggle against militarism. But Liebknecht felt the falseness of these objections "in principle". He saw that the "education" of the proletarian youth alone did not suffice, but that the youth must be stirred up specifically against militarism. He knew very well that militarism could only be smashed together with capitalism by the proletarian revolution, but he understood how important it is for the revolution to make it clear to the young proletarians forced into a uniform that their liberation from militarism could only be part of the general political struggle for freedom. The party leaders shook their heads over the special actions of this "hot-head" but the young Liebknecht stuck tenaciously to his cause. His revolutionary feelings drove him to it inexorably.

The consciousness of the threatening international danger fortified the inherited feelings of internationalism in Liebknecht. He was one of the few in Germany who had the most ardent desire to know how things stood in the brother parties, not only in France and Russia but in any small Balkan party.

His trips to America and France, his close relations with the Russian comrades sprang from the consciousness of how immeasurably important it is to keep up international relations. And how thoroughly, how tirelessly he had himself enlightened on the complicated Russian questions during the trip to the International Congress in Copenhagen we made together with Leon Trotsky from Berlin: We know that for Liebknecht the International is no formal alliance of various parties, but it is his real fatherland as the principles of the Spartakusbund later said. The most precious political qualities of Liebknecht, even before the war, had to make him unpopular among a section of the leaders, while they created popularity for him in the working masses and in the International. He sprang too far beyond the limits of the German party not to be accused by the small minds of being ambitious. To this are still added his human qualities by which he also diverged from the prescribed type of a worthy party leader. He loved life; unrestrained and unconcerned, he clutched at it wherever it called. There was so little philistinism in this youthful Absalom, so little hypocrisy, so much of the childish joy of life, that because of them many overlooked the deep seriousness, the mildness and graciousness of his nature. I will never forget how we once came to Peer Gynt in a conversation during a walk. He knew the drama in the translation by Passarge and I told him of the gracefulness of Morgenstern's translation. He came to me and for three hours—it was already long past midnight—read Morgenstern's translation. When he came to the scene in which Peer Gynt hears the song he did not sing, the tears he did not weep, the battle he did not fight, lament in the rustling of the leaves, lament a life that was not whole, the features in Liebknecht's face tightened and he said: "That confounded half time, and in spite of it we can, and must lead a full life." Thus he was before the war, a fiery agitator, an energetic politician, a hothead, animated and jovial, a favorite of the women, a man good—as the Poles say—for fighting and drinking. In every gesture he was the son of his father, of the great leader of the people, of the great, lively man who could laugh like a child.

There came the war and its fire forged out of all these elements of the Liebknecht temperament the hero of the German working class.

The Imperialist War Comes

The war came. With the first reports the rumor reached the outside that Liebknecht together with Rosa Luxemburg, had been shot. The report over-anticipated the reality, but it showed that outside of Germany friend and foe knew from whom the struggle against the powers of war might be expected. Liebknecht was stirred by these precipitate events. On the threshold of the heroic period of his life he paid his last obligation to the party whose revolutionary power was his vanishing dream. The belief that August 4 would remain only a dismal episode caused him to maintain discipline and to abandon an open protest against the war on August 4. After a few days he saw that he had committed a great mistake. He drew closer to Rosa Luxemburg, whose strictly laid-down theoretical line was foreign to his broad, questioning nature and there arose between them, in spite of all differences in their natures, a life and death alliance.

In the first weeks of the war, they seek to go to the working masses; the government prohibits public meetings. Liebknecht is determined to raise the banner of rebellion at the second voting of credits. He endeavors to arrive at a concerted action by the fourteen deputies who voted against the granting of war credits in the Reichstag fraction. They refuse. Liebknecht, whom the cravens later accused of acting only out of conceit so as to shine as the only one, fought to the last moment in order to draw with him, out of the troop of hesitant colleagues, at least two, or even one, into the path of the joint struggle. It was miserable to see how, although he employed every means of intellectual and moral suasion, he was nevertheless unable to shake a single one in a fraction of over a hundred men, to make it clear to one of them that it was necessary to break with all putrid compromises. It showed how much, in the final analysis, the collapse of leadership was a moral problem. Liebknecht remained alone. His features hardened, a bitter line was drawn around his lips. He determined to proceed by himself, despite the dissuasions of his friends. In that hour I saw how the last doubt vanished in Liebknecht, the last softness, how the great moral power was released that did not depart from him until death: the iron determination to open the road of the reawakening of socialism even if it were necessary to parry every spear with his own breast.

Workers Stand By Liebknecht

The struggle for the mud-trampled banner of socialism was taken up entirely in the open. The entire press sought to suppress Liebknecht, in part by calumniation, in part by making a bagatelle of his deed. He was to be terrorized by threats and by the suggestion that his sacrifice was futile. Yet thousands stood up for him. The declaration on his motive for his separate vote was copied and mimeographed by thousands of workers; it passed from hand to hand, aroused a feeling of responsibility and united men and women in struggle. Liebknecht became the storm center of the decisive opposition. Towards the end of December, 1914, when I arrived in Switzerland, it became clear to me to the full extent how fruitfully his deed had taken effect internationally. It was the first sign visible from afar that there were revolutionary forces in Germany. Lenin, that man devoid of all phrase, who probably measured most deeply the collapse of the International immediately understood that the decision to raise the banner of rebellion against the whole fraction was a decision that gave the signal for imperishable deeds. Liebknecht's name became one of the best beloved in the growing vanguard of the Russian proletariat, and it was no different in France, in Italy. In his Le Feu, Barbusse erected a monument to him as the only German, who illuminated the last point of French socialism like a star in the dark night... In October 1915, when the dispersed parts of the militant remnants of the old international gathered in Zimmerwald, and Ledebour, answering attacks from the Left, declared in the name of his partisans (later the Independents) that there was no Liebknecht fraction, Trotsky shouted out to him, amid the lively acclaim of the French and Italians: "For us there is only the fraction of Liebknecht."

When the report arrived of his arrest on Potsdamerplatz, many friends outside of Germany asked why one in his exposed position participated in the demonstration. Many saw in it a sign of a great internal agitation that must be capable of dominating a leader. What drove him to the streets was however, also consciousness of duty. Confidence in the social democratic phrase had, thanks to the betrayal of the social democracy, sunk so low that whoever wanted to form a new revolutionary power could not limit himself to intellectual general staff service behind the battle-front. Liebknecht's "recklessness" was profound wisdom and his prison martyrdom did more for the revolution than all the "cautious" endeavors of a whole party could do. The nucleus of Karl Liebknecht became a center of a radiating moral power that no measures of isolation could dam. The "I dare it!" reverberated throughout the world, stirring up imitation.

The Russian revolution broke out, the first army of imperialism mutinied, the first army of socialism began to be formed. As we sat in Brest-Litovsk around the conference table with Count Mirbach and General Hoffmann, we spoke over their heads to the prison convict and his people. The German proletariat responded to our call. The January strike broke out. None of us assumed that this was the victory, that German imperialism would yield, and in spite of it Trotsky rejected every compromise. It was necessary, despite the greatest danger, to show the German proletariat that we had confidence in it. It was necessary to show the world proletariat that German imperialism might smash us but that we make no voluntary compromises with it. Later, when we were nevertheless compelled to conclude the peace, to take the cross of Brest upon us and to retreat, we often asked ourselves uneasily: Do Liebknecht and his comrades understand our position and tactics? And Liebknecht told me later of the torments he suffered in prison when he thought that all our sacrifices might be futile, that the German working class might not rebel in time so as to unite with us. He feared that we would go too far with our concessions, and summoned his friends from prison to act so that we would be spared the last bitter ter cup.

Fearful of the impending revolution, he was released by the government of German imperialism, which stood on the brink of bankruptcy. His first steps were to the Russian embassy. On the night of his release Bucharin let us know by telegraph that Liebknecht was in full accord with us. The joy of the Russian workers at Liebknecht's liberation cannot be expressed. Could he have come to us at that time no king was ever welcomed as Liebknecht would have been welcomed by the Russian workers.

When I came to Germany towards the end of December and could press his hands again after four years, he said calmly, without the slightest disappointment: "We are only at the beginning, the road is still long." And we agreed with Rosa Luxemburg and him that the distance to the end could only be shortened by tireless agitation, propaganda and action. Whoever saw how both of them worked from early morning to late at night, how resolutely they cut the last ties that still bound them to the world of half-heartedness by founding the Communist Party of Germany, whoever was there to see how they warned their own supporters against exaggerations in the midst of the revolutionary ecstasy, could grasp their profound confidence in the Communist movement of Germany.

Fallen in Battle

Liebknecht was not alive to see the new times. The first wave of the proletarian revolution bore him further than he wanted, tore him with it. In the storm he did not see the distance far enough. When the January uprising was suppressed and the social-patriotic government pursued him, no one dared urge upon him the thought of flight, even though it was clear that his imprisonment contained the danger of death. He wanted to fling himself against the pogrom incitement. On the day the assassin's bullet struck him, he brought up the idea of calling public meetings in the next few days. Then he fell into the hands of the executioners who wanted to strike in him and Rosa Luxemburg the German, the International revolution. He fell in the first phase of the struggle, full of confidence and the consciousness of victory. He fell as he lived: captured at the battle position. And we, who knew him intimately with his merits and weaknesses, we who understand the immeasurable loss the revolution suffered when this iron warrior was torn from its ranks, we say at his grave: "For us he will be a model of loyalty to socialism, of devotion and courage without which the revolution cannot triumph."

Liebknecht was not only inspired by a deep insight into the objective necessity of Communism but the still deeper personal yearning for the completely harmonious life that is possible only on the basis of Communism, and this yearning sprang from an infinite love and kindness a sympathy for every suffering creature, a readiness to give assistance without which socialism is a delusion. The world knows only Liebknecht the heroic warrior. Broad sections of proletarians, who applied to him as an attorney, received humane assistance from him, loved him as a man. Liebknecht's courage was the union of his love for every man and his discernment that in the period we live in, individual suffering cannot be helped without beginning the life and death struggle for socialism. He fell in the raging struggle. And thousands will follow him to the martyr's death until naked, hungering, wound-bedecked humanity will have the leisure to remember its martyrs with love. Soldier of the Revolution his father called himself. To Karl Liebknecht fell the honor of earning this title with death in the struggle. The Soviet republic has created the insignia of the "Red Star" for its most valiant son. Lay it on Liebknecht's grave, and may all of our friends know no greater honor than, through the achievement of this insignia, to approach the spirit of Karl Liebknecht who went the road that we want to tread to the end, even should each of us win the Red Star only at the bier. Berlin, January 18, 1919.

Not Centrist in General, but a Certain Kind of Centrist

The article in the organ of the Leninbund, analyzed by us, endeavors to attack our standpoint from another side. "While Centrist," the author objects, "is a current and a tendency inside the working class it differs only in degree from the other current and tendency in the working class reformism. Both serve, even if differently, the class enemy." (Fahne des Kommunismus, No. 31, page 246.)

This sounds very convincing. In reality, however, the Marxist truth has been transformed here into an abstraction, and consequently, into a falsehood. It is not enough to say that Centrist in general or reformism in general constitute currents with the working class. One must investigate what functions are fulfilled by a certain Centrist in a certain working class in a certain country and at a certain epoch. Truth is always concrete.

In Russia, Centrist is in power. In England, it is reformism that now governs. Both of them—Urbahns teaches us—are currents within the working class that differ only in degree (graduell); both serve, even if differently, the class enemy. Very well, let us take note of that. What tactic follows from this, for example, in case of war? Must the Communists in Russia be defeatists like the Communists in England? Or should they be partisans of national defense in both countries, not unconditionally, to be sure but with certain reservations? Defeatism and defense of the fatherland are lines of class policy and cannot be influenced by "secondary differences" between Russian Centrist and English reformism. But here, perhaps, a number of things will occur to comrade Urbahns himself and alarm him... In England, the factories, railroads, the land belong to the exploiters; the State owns colonies, that is, it is a slave-holding state; the reformists there consequently defend the existing bourgeois state—defend it not very skillfully nor very cleverly; the bourgeoisie regards them half distrustfully, half contemptuously keeps them under a jealous surveillance, hoots at them and is ready to run them off at any moment. But at any rate the English reformists who are in power defend the domestic and foreign interests of capital. The same holds true of course, for the German social democracy.

Now, what does Centrist in the Soviet Union defend? It defends a social order produced by the political and economic expropriation of the bourgeoisie. It defends it very badly, very unskillfully, arousing distrust and disappointment in the proletariat (which does not, unfortunately, possess the experience of the British bourgeoisie), weakens the dictatorship, helps the forces of Thermidor, but as a result of the objective situation, Stalinist Centrist nevertheless represents a proletarian and not imperialist regime. That is not, comrade Urbahns, a difference of "degree", it is a difference between two class orders. They are the two sides of the historical barricade. Whoever loses sight of this fundamental difference is lost to the revolution.

«A Kerenskyism Upside Down»

Then what is the meaning, Urbahns replies, to your own words, according to which the Stalin period is a Kerensky period upside down? Improbable as it may seem, it is nevertheless precisely out of this formula that Urbahns endeavors to draw the conclusion that the Thermidor is already an accomplished fact. In reality, it is precisely the contrary that flows quite clearly from my formula. The Kerensky period was a form of bourgeois domination in the period of the impending proletarian revolution. It was a vacillating, irresolute, uncertain form of domination, but domination of the bourgeoisie nevertheless. For the proletariat to attain power, neither more nor less than armed insurrection, than the October revolution, was required.

If Stalinism is a Kerenskyism upside down, it means that ruling Centrist, on the road to Thermidor, constitutes the last form of the domination of the proletariat weakened by internal and external contradictions, by mistakes of its leadership, by lack of its own activity. But it is nevertheless a form of proletarian domination. The centrists can be replaced only by the Bolsheviks or Thermidorians. Is any other interpretation possible?

Still I recall that one is conceivable. From my formula: "a Kerensky period upside down", the Stalinists drew the conclusion that the Opposition is preparing an armed insurrection against domination of the Centrists, just as, in days gone by, we prepared the uprising against the Kerensky. But this is an obvious knavish interpretation, not dictated by Marxism but by the needs of the G. P. U., and it has not the faintest connection with criticism. Precisely because Centrist is a Kerensky period upside down, it is the bourgeoisie and not the proletariat that needs an armed uprising for the seizure of power. Precisely because the Thermidor is not yet accomplished, the proletariat can still realize its tasks by deep-going internal reforms in the Soviet state, in the trade unions and above all in the party.

Proletarian or Bourgeois State?

It must be acknowledged that in the article on Thermidor examined by us a half-step backward is made. But this does not improve matters much. Is Soviet Russia a bourgeois state? The article answers: no. "Have we still a proletarian dictatorship in Russia?" The article again answers: no. Then what have we? A classless state? A government above classes? To this, the article replies: In Russia we have a government which "apparently mediates between the classes, but in reality represents the interests of the economically stronger class." (No. 32, page 246. My emphasis (L.T.)) Without saying directly which class it considers the "stronger" the article nevertheless leaves no doubt that it refers to the bourgeoisie. But a government that apparently mediates between the classes and in reality embodies the interests of the bourgeoisie, is a bourgeois government. Instead of declaring this openly, the author has recourse to circumlocutions which do not bespeak intellectual frankness. There are no governments standing above the classes. With regard to the proletarian revolution, Thermidor marks the passage of power from the hands of the proletariat to the hands of the bourgeoisie. It can signify nothing else. If Thermidor is accomplished then Russia is a bourgeois state.

Is it true, however, that the bourgeoisie is the "economically stronger class" in the Soviet Republic? No, that is a plain absurdity. The author of the article evidently does not consider that in making this contention, he burles, not Stalin, but the October revolution. If the bourgeoisie is already economically stronger than the proletariat, if the relation of forces shifts in its favor "with gigantic strides" (mit riesenschritten), as the article contends, then it is absurd to speak of the maintenance of the proletarian dictatorship, even if it has lasted as a survival up to this day. Fortunately, however, the presentation of the Soviet bourgeoisie as the economically stronger class is nothing but a phantom.

Urbahns will reply to us that the article refers not only to the Russian but to the international bourgeoisie. That does not improve the matter at all. The international bourgeoisie is economically incomparably stronger than the Soviet state—that is incontestable. That is why the theory of socialism in one country is a vulgar, national-reformist utopia. But we pose the question quite differently. The role of the world proletariat in production and politics constitutes one of the most important factors in the relation of forces. The struggle develops on a world scale and it is in this struggle that the fate of the October Revolution is decided. Do the ultra-Leftists think this struggle is hopeless? Let them say so! The extent to which the relation of forces in the world will change depends, to a certain degree, upon us also. By declaring, openly or covertly, that present-day Soviet Russia is a bourgeois state, and refusing, entirely or three-quarters, to support it against world imperialism, the ultra-Leftists bring grist to the mill of the bourgeoisie.

What distinguishes the Soviet Republic of Stalin from that of Lenin is neither a bourgeois power nor a power above classes but the elements of dual power. The analysis of the situation was long ago presented by the Russian Opposition. By its policy, the Centrist power has given tremendous aid to the bourgeoisie to define itself and create the unofficial levers of its power, its channels of influence. But as in every serious class struggle, the dispute is over the ownership of the means of production. Has this problem already been settled in favor of the bourgeoisie? To make such contentions, one must either have lost his head entirely or never have had one. The ultra-Leftists simply "abstract" the social-economic content of the revolution. They are absorbed with the shell and ignore the kernel. Of course, if the shell is damaged, and it is, the kernel is also threatened. The whole activity of the Opposition is imbued with this idea. But between this and closing one's eyes to the social-economic kernel of the Soviet republic, there is a deep abyss. The most important means of production that were conquered by the proletariat on November 7, 1917, still remain in the hands of the workers' state. Ultra-Leftists, this must not be forgotten!

What Would the Policy Have to Be if Thermidor Were Now Accomplished?

If Thermidor is accomplished, if the bourgeoisie is already the "economically stronger class", it means that economic development has finally been switched from the socialist to the capitalist rails. But then one must have the courage to draw the corresponding tactical conclusions.

What significance can restrictive laws against land leasing, hiring of labor, etc., have if economic development in its entirety is on the path of capitalism? These restrictions are only a petty bourgeois, reactionary utopia, an absurd hindrance to the development of productive forces. A Marxist must call things by their name and recognize the necessity of an abolition of reactionary restrictions.

What significance has the monopoly of foreign trade from the viewpoint of capitalist development? A purely reactionary one. It hampers the free influx of goods and capital and prevents Russia from becoming a part of the system of blood circulation of world economy. A Marxist must recognize the necessity of abolishing the monopoly of foreign trade.

The same can be said of the method of planned economy in general. They have the right of existence only from the standpoint of a socialist perspective.

The Russian Opposition, however, demanded and still demands more systematic restrictive measures against capitalist enrichment; it wants the maintenance and strengthening of the foreign trade monopoly and the greatest possible development of planned economy. This economic platform has a sense only in connection with the struggle against the degeneration of the party and other organizations of the proletariat. But it is enough to assume that Thermidor is accomplished for the very bases of the Opposition to become nonsense. Urbahns is silent on all this. He does not reckon for a moment with the interdependence of the essential elements of the problem. But for that he consoles himself and others by declaring that he is not in "one hundred percent" agreement with the Russian Opposition. A poor consolation!

For Proletarian or for Bourgeois Democracy?

If Urbahns and his partisans do not draw all the conclusions from the "accomplished" Thermidor, they do draw some of them. We have already read above that they believe the Russian proletariat must reconquer "all liberties". But here also, the ultra-Leftists stop irresolutely before the threshold. They do not explain what liberties are involved and in general, they touch upon the theme only in passing. Why?

In the struggle against Stalinist bureaucracy which reflects and facilitates the pressure of the enemy classes, the Russian Opposition demands democracy in the party, trade unions and the Soviets on a proletarian basis. It mercilessly exposes the execrable falsification of democracy which, under the name of "self-criticism", corrodes and decays the very bases of the revolutionary consciousness of the proletarian vanguard. But for the Opposition, the struggle for party democracy has a meaning only on the basis of a recognition of the proletarian dictatorship. It would be Don Quixoterie, not to say idiocy, to fight for democracy in a party that is realizing the power of an enemy class. In such a case, one could speak not of a class democracy in the party and the Soviets, but of "general" (that is, bourgeois) democracy in the country—against the ruling party and its dictatorship. The Mensheviks have repeatedly accused the Opposition of "not going far enough", because it does not demand democracy in the country. But the Mensheviks and we stand on different sides of the barricade, and at the present time—in view of the Thermidorian danger—more irreconcilable and hostile than ever. We are fighting for proletarian democracy in order to protect the land of the October revolution from the "liberties" of bourgeois democracy, that is, from capitalism.

It is only from this point of view that the question of the secret ballot should be considered. This demand of the Russian Opposition has as its aim to give the proletarian nucleus the possibility of gaining prevalence first in the party and then in the trade unions, so as, with the aid of these two levers to insure its class position in the Soviets. Comrade Urbahns and a few of his closest partisans, however, sought to interpret the demand of the Opposition, which remains entirely within the framework of the dictatorship regime, as a general democratic slogan. A monstrous error! These two positions have nothing in common with each other and are mortally counter-posed.

Speaking indefinitely of "liberties" in general, Urbahns called one of these liberties by name, and it was freedom of organization. In the opinion of the ultra-Left, the Soviet proletariat must win "freedom of organization". It is incontestable that Stalinist bureaucracy holds the trade unions by the throat, now—with the zig-zag to the Left—more firmly than ever. That the trade union organizations must have the possibility to defend the interests of the workers against the growing adulterations of the regime of the dictatorship, this the Opposition long ago declared both in words and deeds. But one must take into exact account the aims and methods of struggle against the Centrist bureaucracy. It is not a question here of conquering the "freedom of organization" against a hostile class state, but of the struggle for such a regime under which the trade unions—inside the framework of the dictatorship—will enjoy the necessary freedom to improve in words and deeds, their own state. In other words, it is a matter of the "liberty" enjoyed for example, by the powerful alliances of industrialists and agrarians in their capitalist state, upon which they exert pressure with all means, and, as is known, not without success; but it is not at all a matter of "liberty" that the proletarian organizations have or strive to get in the bourgeois state. That is far from the same thing!

Freedom of organization signifies the "freedom" (we know which) to carry on the class struggle in a society whose economy is founded upon capitalist anarchy, while its politics are squeezed into the framework of so-called democracy. Socialism, on the other hand, is not only conceivable without a planned economy in the narrow sense of the word but also without the systemizing of all social relations. One of the most important elements of socialist economy is the regulation of wages, and in general, the relations of the worker to production and the state. The role that must be played by the trade unions in this regulation we have pointed out above. But this role has nothing in common with the role of the trade unions in the bourgeois states, where the "freedom of organization" is not only a reflection but also an active element of capitalist anarchy. It is enough to recall the economic role of the strike of the English coal miners in 1926. It is not for nothing that the capitalists, together with the reformists, are now carrying on a desperate and hopeless struggle for industrial peace.

The Split Danger in the French C. G. T. U.

The battle that took place at the last congress of the C. G. T. U.* involved an inevitable sequel. Only a few weeks have passed and already it is clear what it must end in. In the Parisian trade unions, the struggle between the minoritaires and majoritaires is intense, the latter contesting the most certain votes, demanding extraordinary conventions, and when they are defeated, sounding the call for factions—but without much success. The turmoil is complete and the restlessness lively. The struggle is taking place between the most active and earnest elements; most frequently it passes above the masses of trade unionists who stay at home discouraged. What will happen in January when union cards are renewed? How many will remain members of the C. G. T. U.?

The splits is in the air. At first it was merely talked about. Now it is beginning to enter into reality. A few isolated cases. But that is how things begin. One has never seen trade union splitters saying frankly that they want the split—except for a few ultra-Leftists who understand nothing of the trade union movement and imagine that it is easy to create new trade unions and even a new confederation. The tactic of the majoritaires is everywhere the same: it consists primarily in maneuvering adroitly so as to throw the responsibility for the split back upon the minoritaires. French experience is quite recent and it must look back upon it at the moment when history seems compelled to begin all over again.

Jouhaux never declared openly that the split was necessary and that he was going to carry it out. Quite the contrary. He did not cease repeating that it was Moscow that wanted it, even when he capped his maneuver by having the first expulsions executed. He did not precipitate the operation until the minority became so strong that the normal course of trade union democracy would have sufficed to drive him from leadership.

He had no lack of advisors—strange to the trade union movement—to push him onto the road of split. They even found that he was delaying too long and sermonized him publicly, asking whether he would foolishly allow the leadership to be taken away from him.

The leaders of the C. G. T. U. are in a similar position. Even though the votes of the confederal congress appear to leave them a wide margin and consequently permit them to wait not to press events needlessly they know well enough that this position is insecure and may change very rapidly. In the present organization, they no longer have a solid basis. They know that there are still many "panic-mongers" among those who voted for them at the congress and that as a result they run the risk of seeing their majority give away abruptly. The trade unions are not the party—something they have completely forgotten—and a leadership that practises a supposedly revolutionary gymnastic which is only incoherence, stupidity and incompetence, cannot be imposed from above for long, for each trade unionist measures the consequences of it. A Communist nucleus can be a fiction and exist only on paper—there are more than one of them—but in a trade union there must be members, and when it is deprived of them, it is not easy to rebuild it.

Besides, the Confederation leaders have seen what happened in Czecho-Slovakia not so long ago, where, all of a sudden, the minority found itself the majority and turned the leadership out of doors.

Also, events are proceeding with an accelerated rhythm. Where three years were necessarily in Jouhaux's time, not even three months are needed now. The Confederal congress was held the middle of September. At the beginning of December, the decisive move is already begun. There are sharp conflicts, actual splits. At Tourcoing, two unions are cut off from their federations which have established new organizations against them. It is around them that the struggle will be concentrated.

*Confederation Generale du Travail, the Left Wing trade union federation under leadership and control of the Communist Party, against whose mechanical, arbitrary and erroneous policies a growing minority has rebelled—ED.

From the day after the confederal congress, we pointed out the intention of the confederal leadership to split. Comrades reproached us for it. They did not believe it themselves and told us: "Why speak so soon about a split?" Experience shows how difficult it is to defend oneself in such a case and how the majority triumphs precisely because it alone knows well what it wants, because it takes the offensive and systematically conducts the fight to attain its aim. By constant provocation it seeks to drive the minoritaires into blind alleys, it pushes them to commit mistakes which it thereupon does not fail to exploit to the full.

The defence against the trade union directing center's intention to split demands above all an exact policy which alone makes it possible to pursue the battle as a whole. It is possible that for some trade unions life is possible, for a time, only in autonomy. The minority must be able to judge. It must be able to decide the necessary retreats, to give up, for example, trade union leadership, when the forces are substantially equal and there are always a thousand ways to contest a vote, rather than to sanction a partial split. We know what weight the position of the railwaymen had at the time of the time of the first split; the break among them was made precisely under these conditions. But all this is impossible unless the minority is given a solid basis at the outset.

We are convinced that the minority has weakened itself by the position it has taken; it has shown itself primarily anxious about numbers, as was demonstrated by its publicly affirmed solidarity with the "six" municipal councillors of Paris*, a strange political action on the part of men who make use of the name of revolutionary syndicalism. But whatever may be the mistakes committed by the minority and those it will be led to commit tomorrow it would none the less hold true that the responsibility for the split would devolve entirely upon the confederal leadership and that it would be the result of the incoherent and pernicious policy of the last few years. That there should be "Right wingers" in a trade union organization, even of the type of the C. G. T. U., is inevitable; a trade union is not the party and even the Communist parties find it hard enough to eliminate their Right wingers. The right policy for the C. G. T. U. consists precisely in educating and winning progressively the timorous and too-prudent elements, and to increase constantly the number of trade unionists fully conscious of the revolutionary task they must accomplish. Its present leaders have believed that they can lead the trade unions as they lead the party. The resistance did not take long in making itself felt, and in order to save themselves, they now want to break up the C. G. T. U. But that is what they must be prevented from doing.

New Turn in German Trade Union Tactics

The convention of the revolutionary trade union opposition met in Berlin on November 30 and December 1.

This convention, which the German Communist Party prepared for many months, had at the beginning, a very specific aim. It was that of creating in Germany a sort of minority movement in the trade unions, of reuniting into a red bloc the opposition existing in the various organizations and thus to establish the first condition for the creation of new trade unions in Germany.

But in the course of the preparations for the convention, a series of experiences showed the German C. P. the contrast that existed between its theses on "the radicalization of the masses" and the reality.

A series of strikes led by the party and the revolutionary trade union opposition remained isolated and were concluded with heavy defeats. The hope of arousing a chain of solidarity strikes by simply starting strikes at certain points, collapsed lamentably, and had to collapse because—without even considering all the tactical errors committed—the radicalization had not attained, in the German proletariat, the degree that presupposes the leadership of the party.

The leadership was incapable of drawing this lesson from the experiences of recent months but it nevertheless had to recognize that experiences such as that of the pipe-layers do not strengthen the influence of the party on the masses, but on the contrary reduce this influence substantially. It should then have had to adopt a different policy at the convention of the revolutionary trade union opposition, which ought to be the beginning of the elimination of new organizations; but the leadership maintained its estimate of the situation and its false evaluation of the processes of regroupment in the masses; in this way it only increased the prevailing confusion.

There were 1122 delegates at the convention, of whom 27 were from enterprises employing from three to ten thousand workers, and 25 delegates from big factories of more than ten thousand workers. But the great majority of the delegates had not been elected by genuine workers' meetings but merely chosen in small meetings of the opposition where, in most of the instances, only a fraction of the workers in the factory were present. It is therefore a great exaggeration to say that these delegates represented two million workers.

Nevertheless, the convention although entirely dominated by the party, could have marked the beginning of a broad front of proletarian defense against the serious offensive of capital, on the condition that the situation were correctly estimated. The principal report was made by the famous trade union strategist, Merker, member of the Central Committee of the C. P. G. He duly outlined the progress of rationalization, the brutal offensive of the bosses but he had nothing to say of "the revolutionary wave", of the powerful proletarian counter-offensive, of the "storming battles" of the working class that the Wedding Congress of the Party still announced in June. The delegates had still less to say about it. Their speeches indicated a profound fury against the reformists, the terrible consequences of the brutal employers' dictatorship, they showed everything save the impetuous drive of the masses of which the leadership of the party speaks daily.

The attitude of the English delegate representing the Red International of Labor Unions who, at the beginning of the congress was not yet acquainted with the tactical reversal, proved very well how surprising was the sharp turn and consequently, how disconcerting; the new zig-zag of the Executive Committee of the Communist International came so brusquely as to thwart the plans of Losovsky who had first intended to come to the convention himself. Under these conditions, the turn that has just been acknowledged was not a renunciation of the false tactic of the C. I. and of the C. C. of the German Party. Added to the wrong estimate of the situation, which is not abandoned, pinned on a system of erroneous methods that prevent the mobilization of the masses, this reversal leaves the door open to any kind of an interpretation and to all adventurist and opportunist digressions.

The 11th Congress of the British Communist Party

The British Communist Party held its XI Congress at Leeds. One might think that the debate would be rather animated, in view of the incidents that preceded its convocation. But there was nothing of the sort. It is true that the most important things took place behind the scenes and that the public part of the congress was very limited. The Right was of course denounced, but the Right wingers were not named. It is a peculiarity of the English party. The Right is always spoken of there as an abstraction; no one knows or rather no one wishes to say who represents it.

The chiefs of the party, who did not have a brilliant accounting to present, recognized their mistakes and delivered speeches in conformity with the orthodoxy of the day. Pollitt, who remains national enough, did not announce that England is at present before an immediately revolutionary situation; after having discoursed on the first, the second and the third period, he finished his speech as follows: "If we are asked whether this country must follow the example of Russia, we will reply without hesitation: Yes! It is only by the social revolution and armed insurrection that the workers can secure power."

The little palace revolutions that had agitated the summits of the party for the last few months were terminated by the return of Gallacher to the political bureau where he will again find Campbell, Horner, Pollitt, Bell and Cox who had kicked him out.

It is not, of course, the kind of a congress that could give the party a new spirit, and it is very significant to note that in a situation as favorable as the present—as a result of the general discontent provoked among the workers by the policy of the Laborite government—it does not succeed in growing. Even the bourgeois journals are not sparing in their raillery towards the British party and even the Communist International. One of them under the title "A Starving Credo", writes:

"Three years ago the British Communist Party boasted of having more than 10,000 members. It no longer has even a quarter of them today, and what remains is rent by internal dissension, personal and political. The final disaster, over which there was so much lament at Leeds, coincided with the new policy imposed by Moscow . . . It is really time that the Communist International stopped discoursing and discussing on the decline of capitalism and took note of the fact that what is really declining in the world is Communism."

These journals are burying Communism too soon. But it is certain that the incoherent policy of the Communist International has been disastrous to it. Now it discovers that what is needed is a daily paper. When one knows what an enormous enterprise a daily paper is here, the huge sums it requires, one is stupefied by this new folly. What is needed to bring the party out of its atrophy, is a deepgoing examination of the situation and the policy followed since 1925. But such an examination would show that if the British Communists have made mistakes, the ones principally responsible are not they but the leaders of the Communist International, and naturally this will not be done.

At a by-election held in Scotland, the Communists presented a candidate, Isabel Brown, who received 1,448 votes, the elected Laborite having 18,465 and the conservative 13,270. The figure of the Communist vote is relatively respectable if one considers that it was the first time the Communists faced the struggle in this district. However, it should be remembered that Scotland is now the "reddest" part of the United Kingdom and that in the other districts the Communist candidates in the general elections received far from similar votes. Nevertheless, the deposit of 150 pounds sterling (about $730.00) was lost, the number of Communist voters being less than one-eighth of the votes cast. The new electoral tactic, which should be studied as a whole, thus remains pretty expensive.

The Austrian Crisis and Communism

Fascism is the second proxy of the bourgeoisie. Like the social democracy, and on an even greater scale, fascism has its own army, its interests and its logic of movement. We know that in Italy, fascism in order to save and strengthen bourgeois society, was compelled to be violently antagonistic not only to the social democracy but also to the traditional parties of the bourgeoisie. The same can be observed in Poland too. It should not be imagined that all the political organs of the bourgeoisie act in perfect harmony. Fortunately, it is not so. Economic anarchy is supplemented by political anarchy. Fascism, fed by the social democracy, is compelled to split the latter's skull in order to get to power. The Austrian social democracy does all it can to facilitate this surgical operation for fascism.

It is hard to imagine more concentrated nonsense than the reasoning of Otto Bauer which consists in saying that violence is admissible only for the defense of existing democracy. If this reasoning is translated into the language of the classes, it means: Violence is permitted to guarantee the interests of the bourgeoisie organized as a state, but it is inadmissible for the establishment of a proletarian state.

Bauer's Juridical Formula

A juridical formula is appended to this theory. Bauer chews over again the old formulae of Lassalle on law and revolution. But Lassalle spoke before a court. There his arguments were in place. The attempt to transform a juridical duel with the state attorney into a philosophy of historical evolution is nothing but the subterfuge of cowardice. According to Bauer, the application of violence is permissible only as a reply to an already accomplished coup d'Etat, when the foundations of "law" have already disappeared, but it is inadmissible twenty-four hours before, when it is a matter of preventing the coup. Along this conception, Bauer traces the line of demarcation between Austro-Marxism and Bolshevism as if it were a question of two schools of criminal law. In reality, the difference lies in the fact that Bolshevism strives to overthrow the domination of the bourgeoisie while social democracy strives to eternalize it. There can be no doubt that if a coup d'Etat were carried through, Bauer would declare: If we did not call upon the workers, when we had powerful organizations, a legal press, forty-three percent of the deputies, the Vienna municipality, to rise against the fascists who formed anti-constitutional bands attacking law and order, then at the present time, when the fascists have the state apparatus and base themselves upon a new law created by them, when we are deprived of everything, made outlaws, when we have no legal connections with the masses who are, moreover, manifestly disillusioned, oppressed and are passing over to fascism in increasing numbers—the proposal for an armed insurrection at the present time under such circumstances could be made only by adventurists or Bolsheviks. By turning their philosophy around 180 degrees in this manner, the Austro-Marxists remain entirely true to themselves.

The slogan of domestic disarmament surpasses by its reactionary baseness everything that we have heard up to now about the social democracy. These gentlemen beg the workers to disarm in face of the armed bourgeois state. The fascist bands are after all only auxiliary detachments of the bourgeoisie; dissolved today; they can be called to life again at any moment and armed twice as strongly as at present. As for the workers, no one will give them arms if the social democracy disarms them with the hands of the bourgeois state. The social democracy naturally fears the arms of the fascists. But far more does it fear the arms in the hands of the workers. Today, the bourgeoisie is still afraid of a civil war: first, because it is not yet certain how it will turn out, and second, because it wants no economic convulsions. The disarmament of the workers insures the bourgeoisie against civil war and consequently raises the chances of a fascist coup d'Etat to the maximum.

The demands for the domestic disarmament of Austria is a demand of the Entente countries, of France in the first place, and England in the second. The semi-official French journal, Le Temps, explains severely to Schober that domestic disarmament is necessary in the interests of external peace as well as in the interests of private property. In his speech in the House of Commons, Henderson developed the same theme. In defending the Austrian democracy, Henderson defended the treaties of Versailles and Saint-Germain. Here, as in important questions generally, the Austrian social democracy is only the transmitting apparatus of the bourgeoisie of the victorious countries.

The social democracy is incapable of taking power and it does not want to take it. The bourgeoisie finds, however, that the disciplined organization of the workers by the social democracy, involves it in too much of an expense. The bourgeoisie as a whole needs fascism to hold the social democracy in check, and when necessary, to throw it on the scrap heap. Fascism wants to take power and is capable of seizing it. As soon as it seizes power, it will put it completely at the disposal of finance capital. But that is the road of social convulsions; it also involves a great expense. That is what explains the hesitations of the bourgeoisie, the internal struggle of its various social layers, and determines its most probable policy in the next period: with the aid of fascism to compel the social democracy to help the bourgeoisie reorganize the constitution in such a way as to combine the advantages of democracy and fascism,—of fascism for its essence and of democracy for its form—with the avoidance of the expenses for democratic reforms and, if possible, the expense of a fascist coup d'Etat.

Will the bourgeoisie succeed in this way? To the very end and for a long time, it cannot succeed. In other words: the bourgeoisie cannot create such a regime as will permit it to base itself peacefully upon the workers as well as upon the ruined petty bourgeoisie, without being involved in expenditures either for social reforms or the convulsions of civil war. The antagonisms are too great, they must find a way out either in one direction or another.

Austrian "Democracy" Condemned

In one way or another—the Austrian "democracy" is condemned. After the last attack of apoplexy, it can of course still recover and live on for a while its feet dragging behind it and its tongue barely mumbling. It is possible that a second attack will be necessary to put an end to it. But its fate is decided in advance. Austro-Marxism is entering a period of expiation for its political sins. The social democracy that saved the bourgeoisie from Bolshevism is now facilitating the saving of the bourgeoisie from the social democracy itself. It would be absurd to close one's eyes to the fact that the victory of fascism would involve not only the physical extermination of the handful of Communists, but also the pitiless crushing of all the organizations and all the points of support of the social democracy. In this regard, as in many others, the social democracy only reproduces the history of liberalism, whose belated child it is. More than once did the liberals help feudal reaction triumph over the popular masses only to be liquidated in turn by the reaction.

History has, so to speak, set itself a special task: to refute, in the crassest form, the prognoses and directives of the Comintern since 1923. That is how it was with the evaluation of the revolutionary situation in Germany in 1923; with the evaluation of the world role of America and the Anglo-American antagonism; with the course set for a revolutionary wave in 1924-25; with the estimation of the driving forces and the perspectives of the Chinese revolution (1925-27); with the estimation of British trade unionism (1925-27); with industrialization and the Kulak in the U. S. S. R., and so on without end. The same thing is happening now with the estimation of the "third period" and social-fascism. Molotov discovered that "France is in the first ranks of the revolutionary wave." While in reality, the revolutionary situation is at hand in Austria, where—and this is the most significant part of it—the point of departure of possible revolutionary development is not constituted by the struggle of Communism with "social fascism," but of the clash of the social democracy with fascism. In the face of this compact, the unfortunate Austrian Communist Party has landed completely in a blind alley.

Yes, the collision between the social democracy and fascism is now the most important fact in Austrian politics. The social democracy takes one step backward after another, makes one concession after the other, crawls on its belly supplicates, and surrenders one position after the other. But the clash has a real character, it is a question of the head of the social democracy. A further advance of the fascists can—must—push the workers and even a part of the social democratic apparatus far behind the limits marked out in advance by Seitz, Otto Bauer and others. Just as revolutionary situations developed more than once out of the conflict between liberalism and the monarchy, which later went over the heads of both opponents, so a revolutionary situation can develop out of the clash between the social democracy and fascism—two antagonistic proxies of the bourgeoisie—which will pass over the heads of both of them.

The proletarian revolutionist would be worthless if he did not understand, in the epoch of the bourgeois revolution, how to estimate the conflict between the liberals and the monarchy, and instead of utilizing the struggle in a revolutionary manner, throw the two opponents into one pot. The Communist is not worth a copper who, in face of the collisions between Fascism and the social democracy, shouts down this conflict with the naked formula of social fascism, which has no content at all.

Such a position—the policy of a shouting and empty Leftism—closes the road for the Communist party to the social democratic workers in advance and gives rich nourishment to the Right wingers in the Communist camp. One of the reasons for the strengthening of the Right wing is that in its criticism it touches the open and indubitable wounds of official Communism. Weak as the party is in making its way to the social democratic workers, just so is the Right opposition strong in making its way to the social democratic apparatus.

The ignoring or incomprehension of the order of revolutionary crisis, political minimalism, the perspectives of eternal preparations—these are the principal features of the policy of the Right wing. They make themselves felt most strongly when the leadership of the Comintern seeks to create a revolutionary situation artificially in an administrative manner. In such cases, the criticism of the Right wing has something convincing in it. But it has nothing in common with revolutionary strategy. The Right wing supported the opportunist policy in the most revolutionary moments (Germany, China, England). They improve their reputation with the criticism of bureaucratic adventurism, so as later to play over again the role of a brake at the decisive moment.

What Is Social-Fascism?

The policy of the Centrists not only nourishes the Right wing but brings grist to the mill of the Austro-Marxists. Nothing can save the Austrian social democracy in the next period—nothing but the wrong policy of official Communism.

What does "social fascism" really mean? No matter how shrewd the honest "theoreticians" make themselves look, they can reply to this question with nothing but the statement that the social democracy is ready to defend the foundations of the bourgeois regime and its own positions in the bourgeois regime with the aid of armed power against the workers. But isn't this the general characteristic of all "democratic" parties without exception? Did not Kerensky and Tseretelli smash the peasants and the workers in the honeymoon days of the democratic revolution? Did not the French Radicals employ armed might against strikers before and after the war? Is not the history of the rule of the republican and democratic parties in the United States at the same time the history of sanguinary clashes with strikers? If all this is fascism, then the history of class society is the history of fascism; then there are as many fascisms in the world as there are bourgeois parties: liberal fascists, radical fascists, national-fascists, etc., etc. Then what meaning is there in the appellation? None at all. It is only a noisy symptom for class violence.

In August 1914, we named democratic socialism—social imperialism. With this we said that the social democracy is a special kind of imperialism adapted to the working class. Imperialism unites the social democracy with all the parties of the bourgeoisie without exception. "Socialism" distinguishes it from these parties. Social-imperialism defines it as a whole.

But socialism, unless one wishes to play a senseless game with words, is not the general characteristic of bourgeois parties, but constitutes a specific bourgeois party, which has specific conditions and tasks that are opposed to the other bourgeois parties.

One can answer to this that the hostility of the bourgeois parties among themselves is only relative. That is not only correct, but it is a truism which does not, however bring us one step forward. The fact that all the bourgeois parties, from fascism to the social democracy, put the defense of the bourgeois rule above their programmatic differences, eliminates neither the differences between these parties, their struggle among themselves, nor our duty to utilize this struggle.

The Austrian social democracy, more than any party in the Second International, is intertwined with the working class. For this reason alone, the development of the revolutionary crisis in the country presupposes a series of deep-going internal crises in the social democracy. In Austria especially, where the differentiation is belated, it is not out of the question that an "independent" party should split off from the official party and at one blow, as was the case in Germany, make it possible to give the Communist Party a mass foundation. This is no absolute road, but, according to circumstances, quite possible. The perspective of a possible split of the social democracy under the pressure of the revolutionary crisis can in no case lead to a more moderate attitude of the Communist Party to the future "Independents" or the candidates for the "Independents". The need for implacable exposure of the Left of the Max Adler type or of a newer type requires no demonstration. But it would be wrong if, in the course of the struggle against Fascism, one did not see the need for an approach of the Communist Party to the broad masses of the social democratic workers who still feel themselves to be social democrats and count themselves as such. It is the direct duty of the Communist Party to criticize the bourgeois character of the social democracy to these workers, to show them that to make the policy of the social democrats equivalent to that of fascism when the social democratic workers mortally hate fascism and their leaders fear it just as mortally, means to act in contradiction to real political relations, means to infuse these masses with distrust to Communism, means to strengthen the union of these workers with their leaders.

The Danger in the Stalinist Theory

It is not difficult to foresee that the throwing of the social democracy and fascism into one pot brings forward the danger of idealizing the Left social democracy, when the latter comes to a serious clash with fascism. That has already been demonstrated by experiences in history. It must be remembered that the equalization of social democracy and fascism, proclaimed for the first time by the luckless Fifth Congress, found its necessary antithesis in the capitulation before Purcell, before Pilsudski, before Chiang Kai-Shek, before Raditch and before LaFollette. That is entirely legitimate. Whoever makes the extreme Left of bourgeois society equal to its extreme Right, that is, Austro-Marxism and Fascism, is inevitably preparing the capitulation of the Communist Party before the Left social democracy in the critical moment.

This question is very closely connected with the slogans in perspective for the Austrian working class: Soviets of deputies and dictatorship of the proletariat. Generally speaking, these two slogans are closely connected with each other. The formation of Soviets is conceivable only under the conditions of a revolutionary situation, an aroused movement of the masses, under the condition of a great and growing role of the Communist Party, that is, under the conditions that precede or accompany the conquest of power by the proletariat.

But in Austria, more than in any other country, there is an open possibility that the slogan of Soviets will not coincide with the slogan of the dictatorship of the proletariat, yes, will even stand directly opposed to it, that is, by the transformation of the Soviets into a weapon against the dictatorship of the proletariat. It is all the more important to understand and foresee this because of the fact that the epigones (Zinoviev, Stalin and others) have made a vulgar fetch of the slogan of Soviets, in which they substituted the or-

Church Reports Marion Hell

But All that Preachers Offer Are Empty Promises and Pious Prayers

NEW YORK-(FP)—The department of research and education of the Federal Council of Churches starts the New Year with an extensive report on the strikes at Marion, N. C. which in the main upholds union contentions. For background a survey of the economic status of the industry is added.

Statements of Pres. R. W. Baldwin of the Marion mill and Pres. Mabry Hart of the Clinchfield mill regarding hours and wages the Federal Council investigator found to be at odds with the story told by strikers themselves. Against the mill owners' claim that the state 60-hour law was observed, it was found that many worked up to 67 hours a week. Against the $14 average wage said to exist in Marion, the investigator discovered four workers getting more and at least 15 less. Torn from the Federal Council's report are these specimens:

Worked More Than 64 Hours a Week

Woman, spooling room, worked 12 hours a day, 64 1-2 hours a week, earning $7.50 a week.

Woman, spooling, worked 12 hours and 20 minutes a day, earned $8-$9 a week.

Man, spinning room, worked 15 years for Marion mill, earned $18 a week, 11 hours a day.

Woman, weaver worked 7 years for company, averaged $17.15 a week, worked 11 hours and 10 minutes a day.

Girl, 15, has worked one and a half years, spinning room, averaged $5 a week—made $6.50 one week, the highest she ever made—worked 11 hours and 15 minutes a day, said about 40 girls in her department, on same hours, most of them 14 or 15 years old. Her sister, working through the noon hour, a 12 hour day, sometimes made $11.50 a week at the very highest.

Man, oiler, $11 a week. Man, sweeper, $11 a week.

These workers told the churchman of the "almost deafening noise of the looms, the high temperature, the humidity, the dust and lint in the air" as creating extreme fatigue. In the Marion mill there was no ventilating system, the workers were not allowed to open the windows, no spittoons were provided, toilets sometimes overflowed and drinking water fountains were installed in the toilets.

The Federal Council report deals fully with the causes of the two strikes, the events preceding the massacre of Oct. 2 and union activity. Passing to the relief need, now being met by church bodies and administered by the Quakers, the report tells of this case:

Workers Shun Church

Mrs. Her oldest son, 18 years old, one of the strikers killed by the sheriff's forces. Her husband died last year. Has five children still living—boy, 16, girls 14, 9, 7, 3. Mrs. herself has worked in the East Marion mill for two years in the spool room, averaging about $7 a week. Hours 6 a. m. to 6 p. m. Question: Have you any milk for the children? Answer: No, we have to just give them anything we got—sometimes some oatmeal, occasionally a little sugar—mostly just flour, pork and lard. Asked county for school books for two children as she could not buy them County refused. So girls go to school without books. "Teacher keeps threatening to whip them, if they don't bring books, and that keeps the children all tore up, but I just can't do anything about it." Mrs. said, "They say they're going to put us out of our houses and it's sort of worrisome and I would like to get plans made for the children." Mrs. attended the Methodist mill village church, but the pastor "talked against the union since before the strike. Said it was the wrong thing and people ought not to join. Got so he wouldn't speak to us union people. So nobody goes to that church except a few non-union people.

Pontiac Has «Novel» Way to Cut Wages

PONTIAC, Mich.-(FP)—Workers in Pontiac plants of the Fisher Body Co., General Motors subsidiary, are getting a free college course in political economy, right on the job. They are learning how GMC keeps its promise not to cut wages, made to the nation through Pres. Hoover.

"Here's the way they work it", an experienced Fisher worker told Federated Press. He has been employed by Fisher Body for several years.

"Last year at this time I was doing the same work I do now—stamping out body panels on a punch press. Saturdays we worked five hours. I put a new die in my machine, got it adjusted and running right—that took about 3 hours. In the remaining 2 hours I would run out about 500 panels at 40 cents a hundred—that's $2. I received that amount, plus 3 hours' day work at 60 cents an hour for the time spent in make ready—that's $3.60. For the morning's work I got $5.60.

No Pay for Make Ready

"This year I go to work Saturdays on the same job for the same five hours. I spend 3 hours on make ready—work far more difficult than the actual running. I spend 2 hours running panels at 40 cents an hour. But I am paid nothing for the three hours' make ready, and for my morning work I just get the piece rate for the panels—that's $2. So I average 40 cents an hour, or 20 cents an hour less than my day rate.

"I put in a kick the other day, and the boss says: 'Go on home if you don't like it; there's thousands of men outside waiting for your job.' If I go home that means out of Pontiac, as this town is owned by General Motors.

Unemployment Raises Mortgage Shut-downs

By Joseph Hutter

PHILADELPHIA-(FP)—In this "city of homes", foreclosures on workers' house mortgages have mounted to such an alarming number that the real estate board is appealing for a moratorium. Three months after the mortgage payment has become overdue, the worker can expect the sheriff at the door.

In 1920, 402,000 Philadelphians were buying their homes, usually a section of rooms in monotonous rows of tenements. High rents were an incentive then to home-owning. Now unemployment is forcing home-buyers to lapse on mortgage payments. Fore-closures in the last two years were:

February	627	1200
July	792	1150
October	989	1200

Lumber Camps Aren't Hit by Prosperity

By Harold R. Johnson

IRONWOOD, Mich.-(FP)—While Pres. Hoover is making "prosperity" appeals to the big employers the lumber barons of northern Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota are severely reducing the living standards of the woodsmen.

In the Hines camps of Wisconsin, loggers were cut from a previous wage of $40-$45 a month to $35-$40 with another $5 cut promised after the first of the year. The big Backus and Brooks firm (Intl. Lumber Co. of Minnesota) was paying only $35 a month for general woodsmen on Nov. 1 and has since dropped them to $30. Other Minnesota outfits are paying $35-$40. All wages include board and lodging, but not compulsory hospital fees.

Michigan wages have not yet been slashed generally from their $45-$50 level

A Bit of Olgin's Infamy

In the Jewish organ of the Communist Party, the Freiheit of Saturday, January 4, 1930, we read a story which we translate accurately for word and reprint, headline and content:

TROTSKY STILL HOPES FOR A CZAR IN RUSSIA

"In yesterday's 'Sun' there is printed a special cable from Berlin about an interview that the renowned German writer Emil Ludwig, had with Leon Trotsky on the island near Constantinople where he is now located.

"According to the correspondent of the 'Sun', Trotsky declared that there is a possibility that a czar may again rule in Russia. Only—even the czar will not be able to wipe out the gains of the revolution.

"Trotsky repeated his old arguments that the Soviet Union is going downhill and—he still hopes..."

It is hardly necessary to say that a reference to the dispatch in the New York Sun (1-3-30), whatever may be the truth or falsehood in what it says as a whole, will show that it does not contain the slightest word that might lead anyone with half a good eye to write and publish the headline over the reprint in the Freiheit. It is a piece of knavishness, pure and simple, fished out of the venomous sewers from which come most of the stories against Trotsky published in the Stalinist press. Whoever may have been the pitiful scribbler that headlined the Freiheit story, the responsibility for it rests with the editor of the paper, Moissaye Olgin. Like Minor, his colleague in charge of the Daily Worker, Olgin is experienced in the struggle against Trotsky; he fought him and Lenin both before and after November 7, 1917. But at that time he did it as the feature writer of the Jewish Daily Forward. Then as now there was no infamy too nauseating for him, no falsehood too repulsive, and the pits of his dishonesty were bottomless. He learned 10 or 12 years ago, to grub in the garbage of the bourgeois press for some bit of filth to fling at Lenin, Trotsky and the Bolshevik revolution from the columns of the respectable "socialist" organ of Abraham Cahan. He even reprinted and commented favorably upon the calumnious Sisson "documents" that "proved" Lenin and Trotsky to be German spies in the pay of the Kaiser.

Later Olgin changed from a "socialist" to a "Communist" with the ease of the man-about-town who changes linen for a new social function, but his congenital hatred of true Bolsheviks did not change. It now has an opportunity for expression in the attacks on Trotsky, which fall into line with his pre-"Bolshevization" day attacks. So little has changed! Trotsky remains a Bolshevik; Olgin remains the poseur and dilettante, the dandy who is the darling of Greenwich Village salons and the East Side cafes, the dabbler in Communist politics who sniffs the journalistic gutters for filth to throw at Trotsky and the Bolshevik Opposition.

Is Olgin so vain as to believe that any worker with a spark of the rebel in him will do anything else but turn sick to the stomach upon reading that headline? No, every proletarian, even he who does not believe with the Opposition, will stop and reflect that the case for the Stalinists must be weak indeed when they must resort to such proclamations, (so entirely typical of all the "arguments" against Trotsky) as that Trotsky, the lion of the Russian revolution, is still (!) hoping (!!) for the return of a czar in Russia.

But we cannot believe that it was written either by a worker or for workers to read. It was undoubtedly meant for the edification of Olgin's circle of decadent friends and admirers who fawn before the distinguished litterateur and cry: Bravo, Moissaye! A Hit! Yes, bravo, Moissaye! On to further infamies!

In the northern lumber district.

Michigan loggers average, from camp to return, 9 1-2 hours a day. Food is barely edible and many camps have no bath-houses and poor sanitary facilities. Body lice, bawdy houses, bed-bugs, bad bosses and booze are among the handicaps to a decent life. About a third of the loggers are unemployed. Job hunters sleep on the floors in the camps and likewise in town booze joints, often in the way of the thirsty

It is by no means out of the question that, if not in the present then in the subsequent stages of the struggle, the Austrian social democracy will see itself forced to proclaim the general strike (as the British General Council of Trade Unions did in 1926) and even to sanction the creation of Soviets so that the leadership may remain all the more securely in its hands. Naturally, this will be bound up with a greater and lesser crisis in the party. Friedrich Adler will have to be dragged out of reserve, and others besides. Max Adler, or some one even more to the "Left" will again show that Soviets plus democracy give the combined state and liberate us from the necessity of seizing power and the dictatorship. Not only the social democratic workers, but also the worker-Communists, who are accustomed to hear day in and day out that the social democracy and fascism are one and the same thing, will be taken by surprise by such a stage in the development of the struggle between the social democracy and fascism. And yet this stage would be more complicated, a more integrated system of betrayal of the interests of the proletariat by the social democracy. For under the leadership of the Austro-Marxists, the Soviets would not only not be the organs of struggle of the proletariat for power but the instrument for holding the proletariat back from an attempt at taking power.

In Germany, such an attempt, at least on a broad scale, would be impossible because the Communist Party there presents too great a force. But things are different in Austria. In the case of a rapid unfolding of events, the culminating point can be reached long before the Communist Party has awakened from its isolation and weakness. The Soviets in the hands of the Austro-Marxists can prove to be a mechanism that gives them the possibility of robbing the workers of the revolutionary situation for the second time, and thereby for the second time saving bourgeois society, and in this case, by the inevitable establishment of open fascism. It is needless to say that in such a case, the very ribs of the social democracy would be broken under the boots of fascism. Politics knows no gratitude.

The slogans of Soviets and the dictatorship of the proletariat have a purely propagandistic significance in Austria to day. Not because Austria is so far removed from a revolutionary situation but because the bourgeois regime is equipped means—the social democracy. Contrary to the babblers and phrase-mongers, the task of the Communist Party in Austria does not now consist in "arming"—with what?—"the masses"—which?—"and leading them to the final decisive struggle", but rather in "patiently enlightening" (Lenin in April 1917!) the masses. The success of this propagandistic work can be all the quicker and more powerful the better the Communist Party understands what is happening before its eyes.

Above all the stupid, empty, more than audacious equalization of the social democracy with fascism must be thrown into the discard.

The experiences of 1918-19 and the role of the social democracy in the Soviet system must be recalled to the Austrian Communists.

"Domestic disarmament" must be opposed by the slogan of arming the workers. This slogan is now much more immediate and important than the slogan of Soviets and the dictatorship of the proletariat. Put Bauer up as a fascist and the worker does not understand it. But when he is told that Bauer wants to disarm the worker in the end, and thereby deliver him to the fascists—the worker will understand, for this corresponds to his political experience.

One must not believe that one can replace one's lack of strength by roaring, howling and radical words. One must stop fitting the real course of events into the cheap schema of Stalin and Molotov. It must be made clear that neither of them understands anything. The first step toward a rebirth must be the reestablishment of the Left Opposition in the party. But in Austria, as in other countries, a few supplementary lessons of history are still needed before the Communists find the right road. It is the task of the Opposition to prepare this transition. No matter how weak in numbers the Left Opposition may be in Austria, even in comparison with the Communist Party, its functions are nevertheless the same: Propaganda, patient enlightenment. There remains only the wish that the Austrian Communist Opposition will succeed, in the next period, in issuing a regularly published organ, if possible—a weekly paper, which will carry on the propagandist work keeping pace with events.

The publication of such an organ requires great efforts. But it is a task that cannot be postponed. That is why it must be solved.

LETTERS FROM THE MILITANTS

ANOTHER "VICTORY" IN THE INDEPENDENT

Minneapolis, Minn.

Dear Comrades:

No doubt, by the time this appears in the Militant, the Freiheit will have reported another victory for the Party in the Minneapolis Independent Workmen's Circle, Branch 89. It seems that the more decisively the Party defeats itself in the mass organizations with its "barricade" policies the more triumphantly it proclaims victories.

The scene this time, was the election of a delegate to the special convention of the order to be held in Boston, January 12, 1930. After weeks of campaigning in the Freiheit, and caucusing with every element willing to negotiate, Moses was finally able to gather together a motley support for himself at the meeting.

In the front rank of the supporters of the Communist party policy and its candidate stood such gentry as H. Supak, well-known needle trades boss, S. Segal, proprietor of a men's garment shop, Shulberg novelty perfume manufacturer, and others of this ilk. This alliance is an excellent illustration of how extreme "Leftism" in theory goes hand in hand with open opportunism in practice. Moses is the same one we have many times exposed for the same practices while in the Party. This is the same Moses who shrieked for our expulsion as "renegades" and "counter-revolutionaries".

Now although the open support of the bosses contributed somewhat to the defeat of the Party, the outstanding honors in all justice, must be given to comrade Saltzman himself. Moses, it seems, was doing a fairly good job organizing his group in preparation for the elections, when the aforementioned strode upon the scene. First on learning, that I, Berg, secretary of the local branch was nominated in opposition to Moses, he launched a campaign of attack against him and all those who might support him as "Trotskyists," "renegades" and "counter-revolutionaries", although Friend Berg is quite innocent of the charge.

In reality, Berg is a typical Left wing I. W. O. worker of whom there are hundreds in the organization, loyal, painstaking and unalterably opposed to the policy of the party in the Independent, and to Moses, whom the party has entrusted with the execution of that policy. No factor contributed more towards crystallizing opposition to the party than the charge that all those who supported Berg as a delegate to the convention were "Trotskyites", "renegades" and counter-revolutionaries. Every self-respecting Left winger, not befuddled by the new phraseology (and many who were) rebelled against this schoolmaster threat and voted overwhelmingly for Berg, though normally their vote might have gone to the party.

It is regrettable that our own comrades did not clearly take the lead for the position of the Communist Opposition. No clear voice was raised in defence of Communism and the Communist party as against the distortions and hysteria of the present party misleadership. It is true that the provocations of the Party bring out passionate rebellion from honest proletarians; but a Leninist direction must be given to this healthy movement, or it will be lost in the swamp of reaction and may become anti-Communist in character. It is above all essential at present for the comrades of the Opposition to clearly define before the membership its policy on all questions pertaining to the future of the order. A means must be given the Left wing (now repulsed by the Party) of rallying around Left traditions and preserve them against the black hand of reaction now reaching out for control of the order.

And this raises the question of the immediate development of a definite Left wing group in the Independent, one which will openly, militantly and clearly speak and act for Communist principles, criticising the maneuvers and phrasemongering of the Party and resolutely fighting for the preservation of proletarian policies within the order.

BAKERSFIELD, Cal. — Arch-framer Charles M. Fickert, who sent Mooney and Billings to prison, is evidently getting nervous lest they be released. In a speech before the Bakersfield Kiwanis club he pleaded that he is not "persecuting" the two men; he is only fighting the "anarchistic" organizations that are trying to undermine the foundations of the government.

DIARY OF AN UNEMPLOYED PLUMBER

New York, N. Y.

Dear Comrades:

Inspired by the dazzling figures of projected construction that President Hoover and the lesser presidents of the railroads and business corporations have been announcing so repeatedly for the past few weeks; spurred on by the contentions of President Green in chorus with the whole capitalist press, that as a consequence of the stock market crash the speculative capital will be diverted to "legitimate" business, and primarily to building construction, I had set my alarm clock the previous night for an early morning hour. I had a feeling of confidence that with sufficient effort I would undoubtedly get a job.

Carried on the wings of my new ambition getting up was not difficult although it was still dark. I grabbed the World, and—to my great surprise—there was over a column of plumbers' ads. It flashed through my mind that only lunatics invented the myth about a depression in this country. My hand was itchy at the thought of my first pay envelope. I could see the happy face of my wife when at last I announce to her that she can have the money to pay back part of the grocer's bill. Right there and then I decided what creditor can wait longest for his money. But, alas, upon closer examination of the ads, I realized that I was looking at the "situation wanted" section. There were men stating their long experience, high qualities, great speed, excellent references, all around, knowing also steam, lead wiping, etc., etc. and offering themselves to the highest bidder.

Having realized my mistake, I quickly turned the page and without difficulty found the place where once ads for plumbers used to be. As an ugly monument to the prosperous boom days there was the following ad: "Plumber's helper wanted; three dollars a day; husky; one who can work alone; must have own tools. Call early...." They don't want a helper, they want a mechanic sufficiently starved to be willing to work for a helper's wage.

But this was not enough to discourage me this morning. I resolved to set out in search of a job, ads or no ads. I revisited all the contractors I worked for in the past, who for the last six months have been telling me in the same monotonous voice, "nothing doing". "Aren't you in on President Hoover's construction projects?" I asked one of them indignantly. They did not know what I was talking about; they thought me insane.

With every place I had been to, my spirit dropped lower, my confidence of the morning failed me more and more. I was growing desperate. Walking from one end of the city to another, from the Bronx to Manhattan, covering all the plumbing shops on the way, all kinds of thoughts entered my mind. I envied the shop and factory workers. Their industries are concentrated in definite localities, they have their "markets". Although the results might be the same, at least the process of looking for a job is not such a painful one.

Some argue that in the building trades it is impossible to divide the work equally. If the bosses were compelled to hire a new set of men for each building through a labor bureau controlled by the workers, every man in the trade would get his share of work.

As it is now, one must be related to the boss, or lick the boots of the union officialdom in order to be "fixed up". But what does the officialdom care about unemployment? Only a few weeks ago their salary was raised $25, making it a total of $125 a week, besides "extras".

This reminds me. I shall have to borrow some money to pay my dues. Work or no work, this must be paid for otherwise there is a fine imposed. I hope no plumbers died this month. Every dead plumber means an addition of fifty cents to the dues. They sure have been dying lately. Is it because of starvation? —P

WHO SUPPORTS THE STALINISTS?

Minneapolis, Minn.

Dear Comrades:

If I am to judge the role of the Communist Party today by the Minneapolis membership—especially the Jewish section—as well as its supporters, then I must assert that only a miracle can save the situation. As well believe in Stalin's theory of building socialism in one country.

Let us consider for a moment the standard-bearers of Communism, those who are "strengthening the position of the C.I. line" in the workers' movement.

First we have Supak, a manufacturer who exploits from 60-80 workers, and exploits them in the most refined manner, in whose shop the Amalgamated established the union. As soon as the "contract" was completed with the boss, this gentleman was established in the leading councils of the Party.

Then, take A. Sachs, boss plumber, another "comrade", who amassed enough wealth from workers' sweat to build a beautiful home in the fashionable Lake Harriet district.

And Mr. Sell. Every Jewish carpenter or building trades worker knows I. Sell. He is one of the worse exploiters and slave drivers of his men. Yet he also is a standard bearer of the Communist Party today.

Store keepers who donate $25 at a time to Talmud Torahs and other Jewish bourgeois institutions; sweatshop bosses like Segal; boss barbers like Wolk; American Legion members like Singer and Fink—all these types stand today in the front rank of the Jewish Communist movement in Minneapolis.

Worker-comrades of the Party! What does this mean? Does this not show a dangerous degeneration of the Party support and membership? Is it surprising that the Communist Party which bases itself on an overwhelmingly non-proletarian support, should conduct its bitterest struggles against the Leninist Opposition? It is the duty of all serious Communists, inside and outside the Party to mercilessly pick out and expose the petty-bourgeois elements in the Party and to fight against the wrong policies which allow them to develop in the movement.

Enlist yourself in the struggle to purify the movement from petty bourgeois influences!

PEONAGE ON HIGH SEAS

SAN FRANCISCO (FP)—A story of peonage on the high seas was told in the court of Judge St. Sure in San Francisco, when James Lamey, colored cook on a United Fruit Co. vessel, was awarded $500 damages. Lamey proved that Capt. George Eppelman had chained him to a stanchion in the forward peak of the ship for four days because he had refused to paint the mess room, since this was the mess boy's duty.

DAILY WORKER AND ILLINOIS STRIKE

(The Daily Worker recently printed a vicious attack upon the work of the Communist League and its supporters in the recent Illinois miners' strike. The following excerpt from a letter by comrade Joseph Angelo, member of the League and one of the best known militants in the National Miners Union speaks for itself.—Ed.)

Springfield, Ill.

Dear Comrades:

The Daily Worker is surely getting rambunctious when it stoops so blankety-blank low as to call me a "stool-pigeon, renegade, etc." in its columns. I did my share in this last strike, more than some C. P. members, as for instance, X, who would not go on a picket line because he might be arrested, or Y who would not address a mass meeting in Springfield because warrants were out for his arrest. I was on the picket line in Springfield and led the Taylorville miners to Auburn where we pulled that mine out on strike. I organized the first relief committee and went out and collected relief for the Taylorville marchers. I spoke at Taylorville and when I found out that although every mine was out on strike in that section, no strike committees were organized, I urged the miners immediately to organize strike committees, not only mine strike committees but committees of other workers as well, yet this was not done because X cannot see further than his nose....

ON TROTSKY

Writing apropos the articles of comrade Trotsky that have been appearing in the Militant, the Canadian One Big Union Bulletin (12-19-1929) remarks in its editorial entitled "The Growing Influence of Trotsky": "He (Trotsky) commands the respect of both friends and foes and yet he never compromises in the slightest degree. The same undaunted spirit reveals itself whether in conflict with Stalin or the capitalist world. For ourselves we can only say we have gleaned more from his works than from those of any other current Russian writer." We would like to suggest that the O. B. U. Bulletin reprint, therefore, the article by comrade Trotsky entitled "Syndicalism and Communism" which appeared in a recent issue of the Militant. It would be of particular interest to the readers of the Bulletin!

THE REAL SITUATION IN RUSSIA BY L. D. TROTSKY

After reading this book by Leon Trotsky, now available in three languages, the reader will have a clear picture of the viewpoint of the Russian Opposition and the origin of the present state of affairs in the Soviet Republic. This volume includes a detailed exposure of the campaign of misrepresentation and falsehood conducted against the Russian Opposition and its leader, Trotsky.

Mill Bosses Plan Company Unions To Counteract Trade Union Drive

Federated Press

While right and left wing unions plan further organization in the south, the A.F. of L. unions by a "spirit of cooperation and friendship" for the employers, the National Textile Workers Union by militant class conflict, boss morale in the textile industry is bolstered by a January ideological "inventory" taken by Textile World, trade paper of the McGraw-Hill chain.

Surveying the "guide posts" needed by employers in turning back A.F. of L. overtures, even of the meekest type, this employers' organ urges more employee representation—company unions—and suggests "sound 'labor-extention' systems."

"Selling" Labor New Chain

It advises employers to develop company unions such as now keep workers in bondage in the great Amoskeag mills and Pacific mills, the latter with southern branches. And by "sound" labor extention it means the kind that can be fastened on the workers without evoking spontaneous strikes such as developed in the Carolinas last spring. It means preparing the workers' minds in advance and properly "selling" them the new shackles.

A similar idea runs through an article on group insurance for textile workers appearing in the same issue. It suggests that this insurance should not be given workers as a gratuity but they should pay a little something for it, thus furthering "joint participation between employer and employee." The group insurance against sickness and disability, the textile organ declares, must be used to "create an entering wedge for real cooperation between employer and employee", in other words be the first step toward company unionism or "inside organization... useful from a social standpoint and also as a means of discussing labor problems and adjusting labor difficulties". The insurance plans are thus but a bait on the hook of the company union.

In order to get the worker to contribute "voluntarily" to other forms of inside insurance, Textile World advises that it may be necessary to have the company make a "gift of group life insurance to all employees who become members of the co-operative organization". And it is cheap at the price, it adds, being only $4 to $5 a year for a unit of $500 of insurance, or less than the worker in the average cotton mill is robbed out of his pay envelope in a single week. This bribe of $5 a year is expected to keep the spinner or weaver contented and loyal and efficient under the new stretch-out plans of operation. It is obvious from the article that by this small annual outlay the employee "indirectly benefits himself far more than he could by any other agency. The main object is to create greater productivity through establishing greater contentment."

"Moderization" Expected

Southern textile mill owners, who are specialists in the older forms of paternalism, such as cheap company shacks, controlled schools and subsidized parsons, are now expected to modernize their "employer employee relationships" by introducing the insurance features as more subtle but no less enslaving devices.

Insurance companies and powerful enemies of social insurance, state old age pensions and the like, are constantly pushing the company group insurance and more

1500 Unemployed Demonstrate in St. Louis Mayor Answers the Demand for Work or Relief by Arresting Two Leaders

By H. L. GOLDBERG

ST. LOUIS, Mo.—(By Telegram)—Under the leadership of the Communist League (Opposition), fifteen hundred unemployed workers marched through the downtown section of St. Louis to the City Hall. At a mass meeting there, demands were made upon the Mayor for work or relief. The answer of the mayor was the arrest of two of the leaders of the demonstration, Elmer McMillan, secretary of the local branch of the Communist League, and Ralph Martin.

The numbers of St. Louis unemployed continue to grow by leaps and bounds, and thousands of workers have already scraped through an extremely bitter winter with no prospects for relief in sight, but rather a worsening of conditions. The reply of the Mayor to the demands of the unemployed shows what aid they will get from that source.

Tear Gas is «Popular» Weapon against Labor

By Harvey O'Connor

(FP)—Tear gas is becoming quite popular among sheriffs to disperse union pickets. Sheriff John J. Snyder of Northampton county, Pennsylvania, testified he used tear gas gun of the same type used by Sheriff Adkins in Marion, N. C. when bystanders insisted on watching him arrest seven union pickets at the Kraemer scab mill at Nazareth. When the onlooking Nazis failed to move on at the sheriff's order, he fired pointblank at them.

In all 26 pickets have been arrested for ignoring a court order that only two pickets are to be permitted in front of the Kraemer mill. Announcing that they considered this a violation of their constitutional rights, the strikers picketed anyway, the sheriff arrested seven, became angry when he found bystanders interested, shot tear gas at them and proceeded to make more arrests. Josephine Kaczor, union organizer, has been arrested so many times she has lost count; her face has been mugged for the rogue's gallery and her fingers printed for the Bertillon bureau.

It is hard to put the seriousness of the unemployment situation in the east into words. Pictures would tell the story better however. An enterprising labor photographer should be on hand in front of newspaper offices when the first edition with classified ads comes off the press. In Newark, for example there is a mob of 1,500 men in front of the Evening News plant daily, waiting to snatch the first copies from the newsboys. Groups of 50 to 200 building tradesmen can be seen standing by the four construction jobs in Newark, hoping they may be called. About the Central market, the labor cameraman could get shots of men, women and children digging into barrels looking for scraps of food.

35 Electricians Will Burn to Death in 1930

NEW YORK—(FP)—Thirty-five union electrical workers will burn to death on job-giving, death-dealing wires during 1930. That is the prediction of the Electrical Workers Journal, backed by the unimpeachable figures of the Brotherhood's insurance figures. Each year since 1922 has seen 29 to 45 deaths of union men by electrocution. Insurance statistics reveal moreover thereby building a wall of defense against the demands for complete social insurance from the state that workers will make when they get organized. At the same time the adoption of these schemes is a part of the anti-union defense of the corporations throw up to meet the present crusades of the unions both north and south

Every Industry Reports Slump

ALBANY, N. Y.—(FP)—Not since 1920, the year of the severe panic, has any single month registered such sharp decline in employment in New York state factories as December, asserts the state labor department. The drop from November was 4% following an October-November decline of 2% in the number of jobs reported from 1,500 factories representative of all important industries.

Every industry reported the slump. All the metals showed general losses, with iron and steel mills cutting forces for the fourth successive month. Automobile plants were 15% under 1928. Machinery and electrical apparatus firms, all the clothing industries, and textiles reported workers dumped into the job market. Chemicals, glass, foods and even publishing and printing showed decline.

1929 as a whole marked an advance of four points in employment over 1928, due to the high level of industrial activity in the first three quarters of the year. The general index of employment was 98, based on the three year average of 1925-27. The average wage reached a top figure of $30.47 in October.

Massachusetts Building Trades Workers Severely Hit

BOSTON—(FP)—Twenty-six percent of the 48,000 union building trades mechanics included in state labor department figures were jobless on Dec. 2, according to a report just released. The percentage has been rising steadily from 17.8% in November and 15% in October. In December of 1928, also a bad season for building trades workers, 23.7% were jobless.

Unemployment is much worse now, recent estimates showing half of Boston's building tradesmen on the street. Even so state labor department statistics for early month of December showed 72% of union lathers jobless; 34% of painters; 32% of bricklayers; 26% of carpenters, and 26% of building laborers. These are the most important crafts.

In Lowell 57% of all building workers were out of jobs; in Holyoke, 49%; Springfield, 24%; Lynn, 38%; Lawrence, 31% and Salem, 31%.

5,000 FEWER JOBS IN BOSTON

BOSTON—(FP)—Despite New England Council ballyhoo that that section is not decadent and has no industrial depression from which to recover, the manufactures census of the state department of labor and industries paints another picture. Figures just tabulated for Boston show a decrease between 1926 and 1928 of 5,000 workers, of whom 2,000 were dropped in the second year. The boot and shoe industry is Boston's largest, with printing and publishing second.

POLICE CALLED OUT FOR JOBLESS

PHILADELPHIA—(FP)—Seven police were summoned when more than 300 job hunters flooded the employment office of the Edward Budd Corp., auto body builders. The crowd rushed over when word was passed through the district that several men had been employed the previous morning.

NEW ORLEANS—Standard Oil of Louisiana is spreading the company union of its parent organization, Standard Oil of New Jersey, into this region. A conference has just been held by 12 representathat 50% of the deaths in the union result from occupational disease. Last year pneumonia—aftermath of exposure on crippled wire systems—took a higher toll than electrocution, with tuberculosis a high third. Falls from poles killed 26. Tuberculosis, pneumonia and heart disease, the Journal points out, are occupational diseases, part of "labor's dividends". Louis I. Dublin, statistician for the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., is quoted as estimating that a worker pays eight years out of his life for the privilege of holding a job. His average span of life is eight years shorter than that of his employer, of bankers, brokers and white collar employees

Birmingham Big Open Shop Center

Unemployment Rife in South

By T. S. Rawlings

BIRMINGHAM, Ala.—(FP)—The city selected by the Charlotte A. F. of L. conference January 6 for campaign headquarters is the "Pittsburg of the South" and its main industrial center. Six million tons of iron ore were mined near Birmingham in 1929 and smelted in its great steel mills. Iron meets coal in this city to assure its industrial future. The textile industry, absolutely unimpeded by any laws restricting hours of labor for women and children thrives on the lowest wage scale in the country. One third of Birmingham's workers are Negroes, used extensively in the mines and steel mills.

Among the great industrial plants which line Jones Valley are Tennessee Coal and Iron, American Steel and Wire, Sloss-Sheffield, Republic Iron and Steel, Lehigh Portland Cement and Pullman.

Acute Unemployment

Acute unemployment prevails throughout Jones Valley. Of 125,000 workers in the district, 20 to 60% are jobless, according to various estimates. The Chamber of Commerce estimates 20% out of work; the Associated Industries, 33%; the Building Trades Council, 50%; and the Central Trades and Labor Council, 60%. The president of the Birmingham Building Trades Council told Federated Press that 90% of the union builders were idle.

Unemployment is spreading throughout the south, bringing wage cuts in its wake. The Piedmont mill in Gastonia, N.C. has reduced wages 20%, cutting the payroll $1,000 a week. The mill is owned by the Goldberg Bros., operators of several mills in Gaston county. Spinners suffered reductions from $14.30 to $10.75; card hands from $14.40 to $12. Spinners piece rates have been cut from 18 cents a hand to 16 cents. Creelers and spoolers who formerly got $15 now receive $12.

Sixty-Hour Week

The 60-hour week, with five 12-hour night shifts, and five 11-hour day shifts plus five hours on Saturday, is the rule in the Goldberg mills. Women work the night shift, never leaving their machines, even for lunch.

Open shop Chambers of Commerce in Dallas, Tex. and Oklahoma City have announced that they mean to fight the new labor drive to the last ditch. They have reaffirmed, in language as emphatic as was used 10 years ago, that the chambers will actively support and work for non-union conditions. Their statement followed requests from central labor unions within cities that the open shop divisions within the chambers be abolished.

Attempt New Frame-Up in Gastonia

CHARLOTTE, N. C.—North Carolina justice is out for another victim to appease its appetite for revenge in the killing of Police Chief Aderholt of Gastonia. C. D. Saylor, organizer for the Natl. Textile Workers Union, has been thrown into Mecklenburg county jail and is held for $10,000 cash bail, charged with Aderholt's murder, while the state seeks its only witness against him.

This witness is Robert Allen, a striker, who recently signed an affidavit that he had been forced to make a "confession" against Saylor, implicating him in the shooting on the night of June 7 when Aderholt and a crew of drunken police raided the strikers' tent colony in Gastonia. Saylor was nabbed when he appeared for trial on a perjury charge, brought against him because he swore that former Congressman Bulwinkle and County Prosecutor Carpenter were in the mob that kidnapped him and two other textile organizers in September.

Allen has disappeared. The flimsy murder frameup is expected to collapse.

Bishop Demands Catholic Unions in Canada

By John Robur

OTTAWA—(FP)—Archbishop Forbes of Ottawa has issued a pastoral letter calling upon Catholics in the Ottawa diocese to form national Catholic unions. These unions already exist in the province of Quebec but have very little strength elsewhere. In the same pastoral the Archbishop directs Catholic farmers to form cooperative organizations along religious lines.

Canada, it is officially stated by the Department of Labor, is the only British country where there are trade unions designed exclusively for adherents to the Roman Catholic Church. In England there are Catholic trade unions but they work within the larger non-sectarian trade unions.

The membership of the national Catholic unions in Canada is not now as great as it was some years ago. In 1919, the earliest date for which information is available, their membership was reported at 31,000. It reached its peak at 45,000 in 1921. In 1928 the membership reported by the Federation of Catholic Workers of Canada was 26,000.

Company Union Established in Elizabethton

ELIZABETHTON, Tenn.—(FP)—Company unionism is being fastened on the rayon workers of the Glantzstoff-Bemberg plants in this district through a "plant council plan". Details have been elaborated. Last summer workers, in two strikes defeated the Loyal Workers company union, and the big German firm promised to scrap the organization.

In the agreement ending the second strike however was a clause for the formation of workers' grievance committees in the various departments. These committees are the framework for the new company union scheme. The rayon plan has been widely used, the company said, by Bethlehem Steel, International Harvester, Standard Oil and other companies known for their anti-union stand.

The new substitute for unionism, the company candidly admits, was concocted in its own offices. It provides for a joint council in which employees and management have equal voice and vote in considering wages, hours and other matters. If deadlocked, they may by mutual consent submit the controversy to arbitration.

Cloaked with the appearance of fairness, such boards in other companies have effectively stemmed demands for better wages and shorter hours. The company usually manages to get foremen or lick-spittles elected as workers' representatives, while pressure, more or less subtle, is used to control the actions of the council.

Intl. Harvester uses its company union to put over wage cuts, break strikes and introduce speedup. Standard Oil swamps the "employee representatives" under a mass of statistics to prove that wage increases cannot be granted. At Bethlehem the wage question is bandied about between committees and usually is smothered under the same weight of statistics as at Standard. Unionless, workers lack the punch that puts over higher wages.

Chicago Opposition Active

CHICAGO—During the past two weeks, December 29 to January 12 comrades Swabeck and Glotzer addressed three meetings at largely attended forums.

On December 29, comrade Swabeck spoke at the I. W. W. Forum, 1618 W. Madison street on "Wall Street's Dominance over the American workers." Over two hundred workers present enthusiastically engaged in the discussion. Twenty-five copies of the Militant were sold.

Comrade Swabeck also addressed the Liberal Science Forum (formerly the Plebian Forum) 1118 W. Madison St. on "The Platform of the Russian Opposition". This meeting was likewise well attended, over 150 present, participating in the discussion.

On Thursday, January 9th comrade Glotzer took part in a debate that involved the Socialist Club of the University of Chicago. The subject was "Can War be Abolished Under Capitalism". The affirmative, upheld by the Socialist Youth, presented the usual position of the Pacifists, as against the Leninist position of our comrade. The discussion by those present showed a decided opposition to the affirmative.

Other meetings are being scheduled for comrades Swabeck and Glotzer at these Forums, which should attract hundreds of class conscious workers.

FEAR SOVIET INVASION IN ARIZONA

PHOENIX, Ariz.—(FP)—Capt. James M. Palmer, military training officer of the Phoenix Union High School has made a startling discovery—that the neighboring city of Los Angeles is in the throes of the "reds" and that Arizona and the rest of the union are in grave danger due to the spread of Communism—so he, together with Supt. Everett C. Driggs of the Los Angeles district of Pinkerton's national detective agency, threw a "red" scare into the recent state convention of the Arizona State Peace Officers Assn. which forthwith sends a resolution to Congress demanding that the Soviet invasion be stopped.

60 Hours a Week for Women in Kentucky

Negro Workers the Worst Off

"Kentucky's labor laws are liberal." So states the Louisville Industrial Foundation, Inc. in an expensively printed brochure aimed to entice manufacturers to the blue-grass industrial center. But let not enthusiasts for southern organization conclude from this optimistic statement that nothing remains to be done in labor legislation in Kentucky. The definition of "liberal" is in the hands of the Chamber of Commerce experts whose next sentence reads: "Women are permitted to work 60 hours per week."

Kentucky's 60-hour week working women are considered under the head of Manufacturing Economies. The manufacturer's Eden on the Ohio has "none of the disturbing influence provided by labor agitators" who might protest that 60 hours a week is too much for mothers. "Louisville is essentially open shop."

Louisville's Labor Budget

"Living conditions in Louisville are natural and conducive to contented labor. Wages cover all family expenses and leave a surplus", it is stated. What these open shoppers regard as adequate living expenses for a family is exactly $1,268.24 a year, or $1,000 less than the U. S. labor department's minimum health and decency budget. The Louisville industrialists brag that the average family income in their city is 12% less than the general average for the entire country.

The Industrial Foundationists mix the 60-hour week, low wages, "contented labor" and the chance for high profits in their wooing of outside manufacturers. "There is no state, county or city income tax in Kentucky", new industries are exempt from city taxes for five years and other taxes are low, while starved school boards and city welfare department struggle on as well as they can with crippled funds.

There is money enough in the school fund however to turn out young mechanics to squeeze older men out of jobs and to scab on union strikers. "The duPont Manual Training High School is fully equipped to teach modern shop practices in all lines", the booklet relates. The Theodore Ahrens Trades School accepts pupils, day and evening, for commercial training and instruction in electricity, cabinet making, printing, bookbinding, plumbing, machine shop work, sheet metal work, dressmaking and millinery. These trade schools, manned by officials hostile to unionism, implant open shop ideals in children's minds and provide a main obstacle to union organization when the youngsters, their heads crammed with prejudice, go into industry.

The Negro's lot is not a happy one in Louisville. The town prefers its white, Nordic, non-foreign population. On the other hand he is undeniably a cheap worker, the Foundation admits. "It is generally conceded", says the Foundation in its judicious manner, "that the availability of Negro labor has been a favorable factor in industrial development. For common labor and many kinds of semi-skilled labor, the Negro in Louisville is well adapted. He is a tractable, dependable worker who applies himself to the job and works faithfully and constantly." He is rewarded by Louisville with a 100 acre park on the river bank while whites have one 2,000 acre park and many others in the city's upland section.

PITTSBURG—Officials of the University of Pittsburgh, the steel and coal operators' "cathedral of learning", are subjected to a devastating criticism of their subservience to reaction in a report just released by the American Assn. of University Professors. "The university", says the report, "is believed to be subject to pressure from interests upon which it is dependent for endowment and appropriations". The U.P. chancellor has been waiting, hat in hand, in the ante-rooms of the big coal and steel magnates of Pittsburgh for money to finish the "cathedral of learning".

The report deals with the dismissal of Prof. F. E. Woltman and the expulsion of Arthur G. McDowell, and William Albertson, students, last year. The students were kicked out for maintaining a Liberal Club in defiance of the administration and billing Harry Elmer Barnes to speak on the Mooney case.

The Minnesota F. L. P.

Six Years of Confusion and Disappointment in a Two-Class Party

By Vincent R. Dunne

Three hundred thousand workers and farmers in Minnesota, who have by their support of the Farmer Labor Party in the campaigns of the past few years demonstrated a willingness to move politically against the bosses, face another barren year and new disappointments.

The party to which they have given so much, stumbles towards coalition with the Democratic machine for the state and congressional campaign of 1930. If full coalition is not reached this year it will not be for lack of work and will on the part of a large and influential section of the leadership, but rather because this leadership is unable to come to agreement upon individuals from the different camps to head the ticket.

F. L. P. Policy Benefits Officialdom

Even a brief and hurried review of past political campaigns of the F. L. P. will be enough to convince any intelligent workman that the party has been dominated by people who read history backward, in order to justify a policy which, by no stretch of imagination, can be considered beneficial to anyone except that coterie of officials, who use the offices given them by the party for petty bickering and personal advantage.

Shipstead is of course, the outstanding example. But he is by no means alone. During the course of the party's existence, dozens of men have been sent to the State house, many county and municipal officials have been elected, several U. S. congressmen and two U. S. senators have been sent to Washington. Out of this numerical array, not a SINGLE man has appeared who measures up to the standard of a workers' representative. Not ONE among them has had either the courage or the vision to propose any measure, which would call in question the existing order and place upon the order of the day a thoroughgoing change from the vicious system of class exploitation.

Not one among them has ever had the courage to use the tribune upon which they strut, (like their Republican and Democrat brothers) for the purpose of calling the working masses into action. Rather they have held in check the ferment in the ranks in various ways, especially by truckling in a hundred forms to the prejudices of the most backward. A good example of this, is the action of state Senator Lawson in voting for the Anti-Evolution Bill (to bar the teaching of the theory of evolution in public schools). Lawson is also editor of a F. L. daily paper at Wilmar.

It is true that most of the leaders are in disagreement with Lawson on this and it is just as true that these leaders do nothing to expose and remove him and others who, by actions of a piece with the one cited, live, mentally at least, in the feudal age.

Always the program of the Party has been trimmed to meet the wishes of those elements who look to the countryside for support and approval. Without exception, at every turning point, in all campaigns, before and during each convention or conference, the proposals or demands of advanced sections of the workers have been denied.

Farmers Outvoted Workers

The workers have been outvoted in every state convention, the most important committees having been governed by a seven to three vote with the farmers always seven and the industrial workers three.

All the proposals by the Communists and Left wing for a closer affiliation of the unions to the Party have been hailed with cries of "split" by the farmers; and the "practical" politicians and labor "leaders" in control of the machinery have never failed to turn thumbs down on these demands. Two instances of this sort of kowtowing to reaction should be cited as typical. In several State conventions the proposal was made by the Left wing to give the local unions affiliated to the Party direct representation to the state conventions. After many attempts had been made to put this into effect, the workers, over the opposition of the farmers and the leadership, were finally able to achieve a half measure of recognition. The unions are now ALLOWED—to send ONE delegate to conventions, who has the standing virtually of a FRATERNAL delegate!!

For a long period the Communists, together with the Left wing, attempted to gain affiliation for a large group of militant workers through their co-operatives and workers clubs. The all too successful plans devised by the leaders to keep these thousands of workers out of active participation, make nothing less than shameful history. It is of extreme importance that workers generally review the history of the Minnesota Farmer Labor Party, that they grow familiar with the path along which so large a number of workers have been led, only to find themselves, after years of struggle and sacrifice, burdened with a party dominated by the ideology of the petty property owner and led by opportunists of the first order.

Of still greater importance, are the reasons for this state of affairs and a clear understanding of the mistakes made years ago which led inevitably to the present situation.

"Unity" in a Two Class Party

First of all, the condition of the Minnesota F. L. P. with its list toward merger with the old parties of the capitalists, is not the result of false and incompetent leadership primarily. Any political party composed of two classes, as is the case in this instance, with farmers and workers in the same organization, maintains unity only at the expense of the program put forward by the most exploited and propertyless section. The leadership of such a party can lead only as long as it is able to hold back the thrusts of the workers and satisfy the demands of those elements whose political outlook is bounded by the illusion that it is possible to achieve security under the capitalist order, by acquiring property or enhancing the value of that which they already hold, through reforms, half measures, etc.

The program of a party is the expression of its aims; if the program is wrong fundamentally, those leaders who base themselves upon it have no choice but to follow a path of compromise. Workers in industry always have before them the grim reminder of their position in our present social system. For them there is no question of property; the overwhelming majority have none, the vast mass face the problem daily of making their meager wages stretch out in order to cover the bare necessities of life. Why then do we find this state of affairs in Minnesota? Whence came the idea that together, that is, with-on the same party, workers and farmers could work towards a solution of their problems?

It is a matter of history that in 1924 the Communist Party under the leadership of the Right-Centre bloc in the International and the Pepper leadership in America, forced the merger of the Farmers Non-partisan League with the Working Peoples Non-partisan Political League.

Pepper's Bold Plan

This, to be sure, was the local manifestation of a plan, national in scope which, according to Pepper and his followers, was to make the farmers, if not the spear-head, at least the haft of the weapon that would strike the decisive blow for the workers.

Still within the International in this period, the Leninist-Bolsheviks headed by Trotsky, were able to check for a time, the development of this un-Marxian course: Stalin's theory of "dual composition" parties finally prevailed through the East at a later date, only to do immeasurable damage to the world revolutionary movement. (For a full realization of the enormous damage done by this reactionary idea, workers should secure and read the pamphlet, "The Draft Program of the Communist International," by L. D. Trotsky, published by the Militant.)

It is the purpose of this article to deal with the local and national effect of the false idea of dual composition parties and to bring out clearly, in this connection how wrong tactics proceed from wrong programmatic formulations.

The idea of Farmer Labor Parties, once planted in the favorable soil of the farmer-worker state of Minnesota, grew and blossomed under the guidance of a labor-farmer-compromiser type of leader, whose one burning desire seems to be junction, by any crossover, with some form of "progressive" or "liberal" political movement.

It is not without significance, that the F. L. leaders, almost without exception, look upon the "progressive bloc", Brookhart, Wheeler, Norris, Frasier, etc., as the real leaders and have an almost child-like faith in them. Naturally, these leaders are knowingly or unknowingly expressing the wishes of the dominant group within the Party—that is the farmers.

The present maneuver towards the Democrats has at least a two fold purpose. First: to capture the Governorship and so to build up a machine within the Party which can be used in the future for bigger and better mergers. Secondly: it is now generally recognized that the Minnesota movement cannot stand alone. The leaders now understand the danger to the movement and are trying in this confused manner to give a new lease of life to the party, hoping against hope that the national "progressives" will come to their aid and lead them into the green fields of a new "liberal" movement on a national scale.

Workers Used by Farmers

With this political outlook, the leadership, from the vantage point of the farmers' wagon, from time to time sees bogholes in the road ahead and is forced to use the workers as pushers of the cart in such bad spots as political campaigns, financial difficulties, etc.

That the workers have nothing to gain from this horse play must be evident to those who give it a little thought. It must be evident also, that the poor farmers, those without land (the banker's hired men) are being led along a path that will deliver them, bound and helpless, into the hands of the common enemy, for although the farmers belong to a different class than the workers, they can be delivered from their bonds only by supporting the workers politically. The workers, because of their class position, must lead. Only thus can victory be achieved.

Does all of the foregoing preclude the possibility of the workers making an advance politically, through a Labor Party? Not at all; the fact is, that millions of industrial workers still are bound to the political parties of the dominant capitalist groups. A Labor Party based upon workers' organizations, with a program permeated with the idea of the struggle of the classes, can serve as an instrument in rallying the masses for a march toward the Marxian solution of the great problem.

Gertrude Duell Joins the Opposition

NEW HAVEN, Conn.—Comrade Gertrude Duell, one of the most active members of the Communist Party in this city, becoming convinced of the correctness of the platform of the Opposition, joined the New Haven branch of the Communist League of America (Opposition). Having been secretary of the Workers International Relief, she was not only expelled from the Communist Party for supporting the Opposition, but was also removed from the secretaryship of the local W.I.R., despite the fact that there was no other comrade available for the post. The local Stalinists calculated that rather than have an Oppositionist as secretary of the W.I.R. it would be better to see it collapse and go out of existence. This is precisely what happened. Comrade Duell then received a letter of inquiry from Ludwig Landy, national secretary of the W.I.R., concerning the collapse of the local work. She replied with the following letter which requires no comment:

Ludwig Landy, Executive Secretary, Workers International Relief,
949 Broadway,
New York City.

Dear Comrade Landy:

Responding to your letter of the 3rd inst. will say that you are correct—I am no longer secretary of the W.I.R. in New Haven. Nearly two months ago I informed the Comrades here of my belief in the claims of Comrade L.D. Trotsky and the Opposition and I adhere to the Platform and principles of the Communist League of America. I am certain that until the Comrades of the Opposition are recalled and take their rightful place in the Party, no unity can prevail nor can success be attained in the work undertaken.

I was instructed to turn the books and material over to Comrade Pearl Liebenson, 470 Columbus Ave., this city, who was appointed in my place. I have likewise turned over to her the 300 W.I.R. buttons and collection lists recently received from your office.

Fraternally yours,
(Signed) Gertrude Duell

And Hell Hath No Fury Like an Engdahl Enraged

The International Labor Defense, which lived a modest life for several years as a defender of persecuted workers on a non-partisan basis, has finally awakened to the implications of the Third Period and become militant. The formal pronouncement of this change in character, which has been in process for some time, coincides and quite appropriately with the elevation to the national secretaryship of the man whose name is a symbol of blood and thunder and sudden death—J. Louis Engdahl.

One of the indications of this emergence of the I.L.D. butterfly of the Third Period from the constricting chrysalis in which it lay supine for so many years is the formal and official discarding of the reactionary, counter-revolutionary, social-fascist and renegade nonsense about non-partisanship in the defense of class war prisoners. The regenerated I.L.D., having killed off with several blasts of its new horn its old time antagonists, the frame-up system of class justice, the courts, the police the persecutors and similar small fry, is now turning its devastating proclamations on other enemies, some of whom, alas! have been concealing themselves within its ranks and disguising their nefarious purposes by supporting and working for the I.L.D. and even contributing their Judas gold into its collections.

"Basing itself squarely on the class struggle" (at last!) "the International Labor Defense takes up the fight against all enemies of the working class." It is no less a man than J. Louis Engdahl himself who is speaking, and let all the aforesaid enemies take notice and run for cover while there is still time. "The I.L.D. cannot tolerate as members of its organization those who are opposed to its class struggle policies."

In case anybody should be in the dark as to what this bold declaration of war on the enemies of the working class means, Engdahl, who was trained in militancy for years under Hillquit and Berger and who learned from them how to hunt down Reds like the bloodhounds of Simoh Legree tracked the fugitive slaves, makes the matter clear. "The I. L. D.," says Louis the Seventeenth, "combats the hostile policies of Cannon and Lovestone viciously and those who support them . . . The theories and practices of Cannon and Lovestone and their followers are hostile to these class interests. No honest worker can support the views of either Cannon or Lovestone."

We can't speak for Lovestone in the face of this hour of calamity. Engdahl, who worked for him as faithfully as he worked for Berger or Hillquit, knows him better and is in a better position how he will accept this fate. We can speak only for our poor selves, and we do not conceal our fears as Engdahl attacks us with all the fury of a cornered rabbit. We need help and we want it.

Yet we paused a moment, try feebly to stiffen our quivering limbs, and reflect that after all Louis is not the real author of our misery. He is but a witless instrument of circumstances who has bounced from Berger to Lovestone to Foster as the baseball bounced from Tinker to Evers to Chance, putting all men out, or he may be likened to the subject of Napoleon's famous aphorism: to the effect that an army travels on its stomach, and Louis was always in the army and always traveling.

Far be it from us—who have known the pangs ourselves—to begrudge any man his bread and butter, but when he becomes carnivorous and wants meat—ay, the human meat of our poor carcass—we cry aloud: God save us from being the meat in this cannibal's soup!

150 Workers Laid Off

BOGALUSA, La.—(FP)—150 employees of the New Orleans Great Northern Railroad have been laid off in the shops. The road has been acquired by the Gulf, Mobile and Northern Railroad Company.

NEW YORK (FP)—Two million men and women over 65 are dependent for support on other individuals or agencies, estimates Sec. Abraham Epstein of the Assn. for Old Age Security. One third of the aged in American are dependent, he states, after a careful survey of estimates made by other agencies, ranging from the well known insurance company figure that 54 out of 100 young men of 25 will be dependent when they are 65, to Massachusetts estimates that 40% are dependent.

ROSA LUXEMBURG -- 11 Years After

The echo of the Bolshevik revolution in Germany in 1918 was drowned out by the thunderous torrent of blood drawn from the working class by the bayonets of the social democracy. Noske and Scheidemann were the hands of the German junkers and bourgeoisie that drew a deep and ineradicable line which forever divides the revolutionary movement from the social democracy. But the cruelest blow the social democracy could have struck the young Spartacus was the murder of Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg. Not years and not decades can wipe out the memory of the horrible crime, for it has become an accusing finger that always points to the role of the social democracy in the present epoch of history.

To recall Rosa Luxemburg on the eleventh anniversary of her assassination is to unfold again the two decades of struggle between the revolutionary and the reformist wing in the pre-war social democracy. The manner in which Rosa's position in this struggle applies to the difficulties and travail that the movement is traversing today, is evidence that the memorials to her are not formal, solemn obligations to be fulfilled one day and forgotten the next, but rather the occasion for a recapitulation of her work and its relation to the struggle today.

Rosa Luxemburg was uncompromisingly loyal to revolutionary principle. Her very first appearance as an active and leading force in the proletarian movement showed her definite capacities for swimming against the stream. To the nationalist spirit that pervaded the petty bourgeois and revolutionary movement towards the end of the last century, she opposed the Marxist spirit of the proletarian revolution. Against the Polish Socialist Party formed in 1892 by intellectuals who set the national independence of Poland from Russian czarism as the next goal of the labor movement, Rosa Luxemburg together with Adolf Warski, Julian Karski, Ratinsky, Wesselowski and others, founded the Russian-Polish Social Democracy, based upon the most advanced workers in the country, and thus laid the foundation for the Marxian labor movement of Poland. It was her inexhaustible theoretical arsenal that furnished the weapons for the Marxist movement of that period. Her work on "The Industrial Development of Poland" played much the same role in the Polish movement as Lenin's work on the development of capitalism in Russia played in his country. Sharp were the struggles that developed between the Marxists and the Nationalists; in them the term "social-patriotism" was coined which was to become a tragic reality in the betrayal of the Second International little more than a decade later.

From the period of her first work in Poland to the day that the Communist Party in Germany was founded by her and Karl Liebknecht, her record can be searched in vain for any compromise in principle. The vulgar opportunism of the German party leaders was entirely alien to her. And if, in the rigidity of her position, she erred in her conceptions—as she sometimes did—it was always on the side of the revolutionary struggle and not on the side of that corroding "adaptability" that finally fitted social democracy for its role as handmaiden to the Kaiser and the bourgeoisie who succeeded the monarchy.

Her contempt for compromise—we speak here, of course, not of temporary compromises in the strategical or tactical course, but of compromise in principles—earned her the harshest blows and antagonism of the German party leadership, even if she gave better than she got. She repulsed those who tried to storm the Marxian fortress and evaded the others who, like Bebel and later Kautsky sought to damn her with faint praise and dull her steel with a paternal tolerance for "youthful hotheadedness".

Her profound regard for principle and Marxian theory still stands as a reproach to those cheap "practical people" who, in the Communist movement today, hide their contempt and fear of theory behind the empty clamor of the "mass work" they are supposed to be doing. It is true that she was always preoccupied with the study and development of Marxian thought, but she had nothing in common with the dull pedantry of the closet professor. Even when she still was a close friend of Kautsky she would make fun of his dry, lifeless learning. Like Lenin, she showed the vital connection between living Marxist theory and the living movements of the masses. While the "practical" leaders of the German social democracy were engaged in the "slow but productive" work of increasing the socialist vote in the Reichstag and the Landtags, Rosa not only engaged them in theoretical battle, but showed her capacity of stirring the masses into action. It was Luxemburg, not Kautsky not Bernstein not Legien, who went up and down the country arousing the workers to action against discriminatory electoral provisions in Prussia. It was Rosa Luxemburg who published the first appeals to the German proletariat, to the German masses, to rise against the imperialist war and the socialist bellwethers who led them to the slaughter.

She was the embodiment of Marxist theory enriched by the living struggle for power. With what scorn would she lash the bureaucrats of the Communist movement today who seek to smother all fundamental discussion with hypocritical appeals for "practical mass work" which gains no masses, introduces no clarity of purpose, and does not advance the basic aims of the revolution! In this period of the movement when contempt for investigation and discussion of questions of principle is at a premium, the monumental work of Rosa Luxemburg stands out like an unflickering, comforting flame.

Rosa Luxemburg knew how to stand and fight as a minority, even a minority of one. Especially now should this characteristic of hers be recalled, when it is as necessary and difficult to swim against the current as it was in her time. It would have been easier to yield to the national-socialist movement in Poland than to lay the small but firm foundations of a Marxist movement. She chose the latter alternative. With her brilliant attributes she could easily have become the most esteemed and highly placed figure in the German social democracy, instead of the unyielding opposition. She remained with the opposition and life gave victory to her views. She could have swam with the current of blood in 1914 instead of being the persecuted, hounded, despised and calumniated leader of the handful of men and women that raised the banner of insurrection. But it was precisely because she was with the proletarian masses that she stood alone. She stood with the minority for so many occasions for the simple and conclusive reason that the minority was right and the majority, the men of the apparatus, the men of influence and weight, was wrong.

The proudest, most respected, most influential names in the German social democracy were subjected to her remorseless blows. I recall an apt cartoon in an old German socialist journal which depicts Rosa Luxemburg swinging her pen like a sabre and putting to rout the most prominent and authoritative statesmen of the party: Bebel, Kautsky, David, Fischer, Bernstein and a half dozen others. With her pitiless whip she sometimes compelled a whole party congress to acquiesce in her views, and many of the Leftward swings of the German social democracy were accomplished not only under the distant influence of the Russian revolution of 1905 but under the more immediate impulsion of Rosa Luxemburg. And if she was not deceived or convinced by the "innocent" revisionism of Eduard Bernstein, she was just as little inspired with confidence by the Centrist vacillations of Kautsky and Company. It must be remembered that the pseudo-radicalism of Kautsky was quite fashionable in the socialist movement before the war; it had a certain glamor and genuineness about it in the struggle against Bernsteinism, not to speak of the enormous authority, among Marxists attached to Kautsky's name. But for every blow she dealt the open revisionists, Rosa dealt another to the school of Kautsky which revealed its opportunist cowardice in every crucial struggle. Her relentless scalpel laid bare Kautskyan Centrism at every turn. With the whole party leadership, and the enormous machinery at its disposal, ranged against her, she was nevertheless untiring in her efforts to arouse the party in the discussion on the war danger and the tasks of the social democracy that opened after the international congress at Copenhagen where, together with Karl Radek, Lenin and Trotsky, the viewpoint of the Left wing on militarism had been fought out, with Kautsky on the side of the social pacifists.

Her activity during the war is so well known that it requires no setting down here. With Liebknecht, Franz Mehring, Klara Zetkin, Karl Radek and a few others—a handful against the brutally oppressive machinery of the state, against party and public opinion—she carried on the painstaking, painful work of forming the nucleus of a new revolutionary movement, of mobilizing the forces of the proletarian insurrection. She was with a hundred against a million because she knew that it is often necessary to be only a hundred in order to gain the million. The hundred—the minority—was no fetish with her; her "fetish" was the proletarian revolution. In its interests, she knew how to stand with the mocked and jeered minority and fight implacably for principle. The difference between Rosa Luxemburg and the present-day pretenders to leadership of her party and her cause, the weather-cocks of the momentarily prevalent administration, the lost souls who have neither the courage to maintain a conviction nor the ideas to form one with—is the difference between the lion and the lapdog.

Despite their conflicting viewpoints on many questions, said Lenin, Rosa Luxemburg was an eagle. The modern Communist movement is as inseparable from the name and work of Rosa Luxemburg as it is from the name of Lenin. For both of them the International was the fatherland. To attempt to identify either of them with one particular nation is as meaningless as to say, for instance, that Marx was a German revolutionist. Both of them were single-mindedly consecrated to the triumph of the international proletariat. Both of them were teachers and soldiers in an epoch that makes them greater than those who illuminated the pages of history in the past. Both of them were devoted to the cause that is superior to all others because its victory opens an entirely new epoch for humanity. For that they are deathless.

To consider now those important issues that divided Rosa and Lenin—the mass strike, the driving forces of imperialism, the role of the proletarian party, and others—would require more than the space of this insufficient memorial. Rather let the solidarity and oneness of the two great revolutionists of our time be emphasized here, all the more so because it has become the fashion to distort, misrepresent and exaggerate the differences between Luxemburg and Lenin. Every little official functionary, particularly those turned out by the gross in the numerous "Lenin" schools throughout the world, can deliver a long dissertation to prove what a hopelessly incompetent thinker Rosa was and what enormous blunders she made. In the German Communist Party especially has this loathsome belittling of Rosa's immortal contributions reached the most revolting depths. The less the neo-Bolshevik knows about Luxemburg or has read of her works, the freer he feels to dismiss her with a contemptuous gesture. Let that sort of appreciation of Rosa remain the task of those cut out for it. For us, Rosa Luxemburg remains the eagle.

The eagle was foully killed as she was reaching the height of her power. With her death, the German proletariat, on the threshold of the revolution, suffered an irreplaceable loss. History does not produce many Marxes, or Lenins or Luxemburgs. Her place can only be taken by numbers, growing in strength, clarity and resoluteness, confident of victory. Men and women can be martyred by the enemy, but a whole movement cannot be assassinated. It can be set back for a time or cruelly defeated more than once. But each time it is crushed, like Hercules in his struggle with Aratus, it will gain from the earth that covers Rosa's grave a renewed power and determination to triumph.

The Communist Fight against Imperialist War

Talk! talk! talk! Peace! Naval reduction! Disarmament! Abolition of War! Geneva Conferences! London Conferences! League of Nations! Kellogg Pact—and while all this hypocritical cant is filling the air to the confusion of many workers, arsenals are being filled, gasses compounded, troops drilled, battleships built, industries organized, all for the next August 1, 1937?

Young workers and farmers, you who do the fighting and dying for the greater glory (and profit) of your capitalist masters, engrave this deeply into your consciousness: Twelve years after "the last war, the war to end wars", the world is bristling with armaments even more so than the week before Earejevo in July, 1914. The black clouds have gathered—a tiny spark and the storm of death will have broken.

The Role of the Socialists

Loudest in their vehemence, most touching in their oratory, holding the attention of millions of workers are the bellwethers for capitalism, the leadership of the international social democracy and the pacifists, trying to convince the workers of the possibility of disarmament, of the abolition of war under capitalism, meanwhile, with might and main aiding their imperialist in arming, such as MacDonald, Mueller and Paul Boncour.

The Communists are blunt: under capitalism war is inevitable. If you, fellow-worker, desire to abolish war, we say: Abolish capitalism with all its misery and replace it with the proletarian dictatorship—with a system of production for use and not for profit—all over the world.

Some "scientists" say, in the spirit of Bismarck, that war is nature's way of removing the unfit, the way "the law of the survival of the fittest" operates nowadays. Nonsense! It is precisely those who are sickly and weak and crippled and old who stay at home to survive and deteriorate the race, while the strong, the healthy and the young, without scar or blemish, who lay down their lives as blood sacrifices to Mammon on the altar of war.

So, as the chief sufferers, those most endangered, the young workers traditionally lead the fight against capitalist war. But how? Whose method shall be used?

War calls for a radical cure, for a revolutionary surgeon's knife to exterminate class society, and not a reformist salve to heal the ulcer and retain the body of capitalism. So those who would apply the salve, the leadership of the Socialist Parties and Socialist Youth Leagues are excluded as capable of fighting war.

From Bosses' War to Class War

Essentially the problem is how to turn the imperialist war into a war of the working class against the master class. The reformists do not desire whatsoever to turn the war against capitalism. The task remains for the Communists.

But the days when Leninist policy dominated the Communist movement are long past. Today, within the Communist movement we have three currents, the Right, the Center and the Left.

Based theoretically on the monstrosity of "socialism in one country", which it shares with the Centrists, the Rights have taken the next step down the hill to reform the next step following "socialism in one country". They have declared their "right" to "national" Communist Parties" (a contradiction in terms as ridiculous as a square circle), negating the very principles of internationalism which is fundamental in our movement and especially in the fight against war. The Right wing "Communist" is checked off as incapable. The Centrists waver between the Right and Left, and anyone who hesitates in the class struggle is lost. A bold, determined policy is needed. They lag behind the masses or overtake and jump far ahead of them into adventurism and lag behind again.

The Left wing under the leadership of Trotsky and Rakovsky and many other fighters against the last war stands foursquare on an international Leninist platform. It is the embodiment of internationalism, of the fight against war and capitalism.

With the old battle-cries, first used by Lenin, Liebknecht and Trotsky, with which the masses overthrew the czar and Russian imperialism, and shook many a haughty empire, we shall also turn the next imperialist war into a victorious class war of the proletariat. The young workers must be in the front ranks.

Throughout the World of Labor

The British Miners and the Labour Party

The question of coal is once more on the order of the day. On the occasion of the debate in Commons on the government project, the papers published numerous articles in which the ever-recurring problem is examined from its various aspects. A big space is naturally given to the length of the working day and to the wages of the miners, for the mine owners assert that it's the too high wages paid to the British miners that handicaps them in the struggle against foreign competitors.

The president of the Mining Association of Great Britain, Mr. Evan Williams in a letter addressed to the Times, asserts that in spite of the law voted on the morrow of the general strike and the great defeat of the miners, the working week is still shorter here than elsewhere. According to the figures he cites, it is 47 hours, 28 minutes (it is known that in certain regions the day is only 7 and a half hours), while the German miner works 49 and a half hours in the Aix-la-Chapelle district and 48 hours in the Ruhr, the Belgian miner 48 hours, the Polish miner 48 hours and 12 minutes in Upper Silesia and 49 hours in the Dombrow. In France, the average is only 46 hours and 42 minutes.

So far as wages are concerned, he maintains that the real wage of a miner in Great Britain is appreciably higher than in all the continental countries: 18 percent higher than in Germany, 47 percent higher than in France, 39 percent higher than in Belgium and 67 percent higher than in Poland.

The discussion of the government project in Commons was stirring. As is known it received a majority of only eight votes, and even then not for its final adoption; it was only the second reading and it is still the subject for a profound debate. This however is not the most important thing. The liberals having decided to vote against, it would not have had a majority at all. But since no party wants a general election right now, the conservatives will save the MacDonald government from defeat by partial abstention.

What characterized these debates was the brutality of the criticisms of the speakers, conservative and liberal, and the tone in which they were couched: that, even more than the vote that was humiliating to the government.

The conservatives confined themselves to saying to the ministers: your project is detestable; withdraw it. You say that you want to keep the promises made by you to the miners during the elections. But there are already so many engagements that you have undertaken and did not keep that another one more or less is of no importance.

But it is Lloyd George who delivered the big attack. The ground had been prepared by Sir Herbert Samuel, now considered an expert on the question of coal, who had made a condensed criticism of the project and posed some precise questions almost in the form of an ultimatum. Lloyd George adhered to generalities, to the essential features, and exercised his verve at the expense of the Laborites. It is known that the government first assured itself, and painfully enough, of the support of the Miners' Federation for restoring the working day to seven and a half hours. Then, to overcome the resistance of the mine owners, it accorded them a raise in the price of coal. The great Laborite project is thus reduced to a vulgar bargaining for which the consumer will pay.

"Incredibly bad project!" cried the liberal leader; "incredible project on the part of a Labor government." He continued by saying that nothing had been done to attack the roots of the crisis, the archaic organization of the mining industry. What is necessary is to make it obligatory upon the grouping of the enterprises to arrive at a rational exploitation. The project is confined to raising the price of coal. It is a project not of the Laborites but of the mine owners. And on this occasion, he rallied A. J. Cook, who defended its adoption before the Miners' Federation. "Blessed be the meek!" he cried, amid a general outburst of laughter in the Chamber.

The ministers were ill at ease under these lashing criticisms that could be directed against them by a more or less discredited politician. Moreover, they were furiously because it is said that MacDonald in order to parry the announced attack had taken the trouble of having Lloyd George informed that he was quite disposed to accept long amendments. They say that, as ever, Lloyd George was interested only in creating an effect from the tribune, showing once more that he was a good demagogue.

What is certain is that the governmental project in its first form is dead. When it comes before Commons for its third reading it will have to be seriously touched up. But it may already be said that it will hardly be worth more, the Laborites constantly retreating before the radical measures that encroach upon the privileges of the bourgeoisie.

On the occasion of his fiftieth anniversary, the British Communist Party sent Stalin a telegram saying that the British Communists "promise to create a mass party which, armed with a daily paper, will be in a position to mobilize the masses in the political struggles against the social fascist government of MacDonald". Such promises do not cost much. But that is not the case with the paper.

Opposition Progress in Spain

We are in the midst of a brutal attack by the acolytes of Stalin in Spain against the comrades of the Opposition.

Practically speaking, the Communist Party of Spain exists only in the mind of a few mediocre and ignorant functionaries, who have no clear understanding of their responsibility. Originally, we can say without fear of contradiction, the C. P. S. can count as its members only the adherents of the small circle of indolent bureaucrats who ramble around on a wage paid by Stalin. Let us work to remove this small circle to—Mars, without a return ticket.

The masses of the Spanish workers have no contact with "the elite of the vanguard of the Spanish proletariat" as Manuisky would say; there is an absolute divorce between the bureaucrats and the Spanish working class. The district committees do not function and exist only on paper. Can even one hundred dues payments be counted in the Spanish party? No! Here is the true, the sad and chaotic reality. The C. P. S. is in a dying state and it lacks the most indispensable aid. The masses do not know of the party because it never shows itself anywhere; the party does not know of the masses of the workers because the bureaucrats lack a sense of Communist political orientation. The Executive Committee of the Comintern, in conformity with its destructive and spineless policy, gives its support to the leadership which, in Spain, is engaged in destroying what is left of the skeleton of the Spanish C. P.

The Young Communist Opposition had the boldness to denounce the present situation to the masses. It launched an appeal to the Communist workers (official or expelled) for the reorganization of Communism in Spain; it examined the causes of the disease and pointed out the remedy; the application of the methods of struggle recommended by the International Opposition, reorganization of the party based on the principles of the Leninist Opposition as the sole guarantee of the development of the party and its further consolidation. It is only in this way that the party will be able to make its way in the exceptional political situation through which Spain is passing.

The Stalinist bureaucracy, incapable of reacting against the prostration of the party, impotent before historical reality, found in the appeal launched by the Leninist Opposition an excuse for organizing a newspaper offensive of four columns against our comrades. Doubtlessly for want of any more appropriate means of defending and justifying their salaries (Stalin pays the enemies of "Trotskyism" well, which the leaders of the C. P. S. know quite well), they organized the battle against the counter-revolutionary Trotskyists who are pretending to maneuver in Spain. (Horror! Miserable "Trotskyists", dead so many times and many times revived!)

It was a battle organized according to the rules. The known Trotskyist victims at the moment I write these lines are not very numerous, but sure. One of the methods employed by the technicians of Spanish Stalinism against the Opposition is denunciation. The first attempts were made in the November number of central organ of the Party, Bandera Roja. A comrade was denounced in the central organ of the Communist Party by the bureaucratic leaders who took advantage of the circumstances, of the very gravity of the case and of the fact that the Spanish Opposition has as yet no journal of its own.

We will not lay stress on this case—for the time being; it is too dangerous. The comrades of the Communist Party have taken note of it and some of them are asking for the expulsion of the author of the article from the Comintern. We simply make a note of it. But we must remark that the act of expulsion against the author of the article in question (it was an editorial) would change nothing of the very causes of such acts. They have their roots in the composition of the Party itself, in the wrong political orientation. It is an evil that proceeds from the chronic crisis in the leadership and the orientation that is vexing the International: The discharge of a rotten functionary will not save from corruption the organism in decomposition, which is the bureaucracy of the Communist International, just as the amputation of a gangrened limb cannot save from death a cancerous organism. It is a question of giving the C. I. a competent leadership and a correct political orientation without which there is no solution possible.

In Spain, the C. P. is extremely weak, numerically and politically. The basis of the party has always lacked the most elementary political formation. The Leninist Opposition is also weak, as may be expected, but it is the Marxist school of the Party out of which will be born, because it must be born, a genuine Communist party to reconstitute on firm foundations the organization of the proletariat that an absurd and imbecile policy has led to dismemberment and ruin.

The Opposition is trying to reorganize the party, to cleanse it by pushing it along the Leninist-Marxist line, to strengthen it so that it may realize the historic mission assigned to it.

The bureaucrats may calumniate, denounce (to justify and defend their salaries). We will not swerve from the correct line to which we have bound ourselves; we are fighting without a truce until we will have attained our objective; to revive Communism in Spain on the basis of revolutionary Marxism, by unmasking the corrupted bureaucracy which disorganized the Communist Party of Spain, by educating the revolutionary working masses following the ideas of Marx and Lenin.

A New «Workers' and Peasants' Party» in France

The clique of Sellier, Gelis and Co., which we have denounced since its first acts, and fought inside the Communist Party as we will fight it outside the party, has just constituted itself into a "workers and peasants party". This buffoonery has but one meaning for its authors: to preserve before the electoral clientele the label which elected them, that of the workers and peasants bloc.

The constituent meeting of this party was held at Cllichy last Sunday. We do not yet know the details of the deliberations nor the documents that were worked out. But we did not wait for the constitution of the new party in order to say what was to be thought of the policy of the "elected", and we need not do any more waiting in order to give some estimates of the new party.

The absolutely ambiguous character of its constitution must be indicated first of all. It is already patent that a strong section of the trade union minority, champion of "trade union independence", is participating actively in the work of constituting the party of Sellier. Deveaux presides over its meetings. Then, the comical and amicable negotiations with the Socialist-Communist Union of Paul Louis, the political leader of Monde (the Communist controlled "non-partisan", literary-political weekly edited by Henri Barbusse), are very indicative. Finally, the participation of the Alsatian deputy Mourer, the proclaimed sympathy of the organ of the Alsatian Communists-Autonómists (Hueber group)—with which Fourrier of the Libérateur collaborates actively—the amalgam of Villeneuve, mayor of St. Denis, of Chasseigne, suddenly disappeared from Communist Party activity for reasons unknown,—all these contribute to giving the new party a character loaded with rubbish, and also indicates that its career will be brief.

Many papers have already printed extracts from the declaration that will be made by the party. Pretty near everything that is needed to prepare a modest return to the waters of the social democracy can be found there. In language that attempts to be sharp, they raise against the Communist party the criticism made long ago by the Opposition, when the "worker-peasants" of today covered up the whole activity of the party leadership. And naturally they attack above all, like every good Right winger, the so-called "class against class" electoral tactic, which "if no other reason(!) experience proves today that it only consolidated the power of the worst bourgeoisie of the Right, without any profit for the party itself." In conclusion, they declare that there is a place to be occupied between Communism and Socialism, that is, in a particular nauseous swamp.

We will wait for the declarations and acts of this new party. But we already see—and it has always been clear—that it is taking a road that turns its back not only to the Communist Party, which the "worker-peasants" of today led to its present position and which they abandoned when the profit from it became too trivial for them—but to Communism, and nothing else. It is falling back into the morass of petty bourgeois electoralism where the Paul Louises and Selliers are pushing it.

A certain number of comrades will perhaps try to follow it for a while. We will appeal to them to reconsider, to abandon confusion, to come and strengthen the ranks of the Left Opposition. For us there is no neutral ground between Socialism and Communism. We want to fight on the historic ground of International Communism, and so far as it is indispensable, to denounce the faults, the errors, the crimes of the Communist International and the cadres of our party—even against those who would leave it today after having assumed full responsibility for it without saying a word.

Urbahns, however, raises the slogan of the freedom of organization in the general democratic sense. In fact, it would be impossible in any other sense. Urbahns formulates the same demand for Russia, for China and all the capitalist countries. This would be absolutely correct, but on one little condition: the recognition that the Thermidor is already accomplished. But here it is Urbahns who "does not go far enough". To put forward the freedom of organization as an isolated demand is a caricature of politics. Freedom of organization is inconceivable without freedom of assemblage, freedom of press, and all the other "liberties" which the decision of the February Conference (Reichsausschusses) of the Leninbund mentioned vaguely and without comment. But these liberties are inconceivable outside the regime of democracy, that is, outside of capitalism. One must learn to think one's thoughts out to the end.

Referring to my remarks that we fight against the Stalinist faction but defend the Soviet Republic to the very end, the Fahne des Kommunismus explained to me that "an unconditional (?) support (?) of the Stalinist policy (?), the foreign policy included," would be inadmissible, and that I would acknowledge this myself if only I would "think my thoughts out to the end" (No. 31, p. 246). It is not astonishing that I awaited with interest the conclusion of the article (No. 32): It was to produce the tactical deductions from the theoretical contradictions with which the first half was filled and besides that, it was to teach people to think out their thoughts to the end.

Between the 1st and 2nd halves of the article many things became clear. In that time, Urbahns and his friends had the opportunity of receiving the resolution of the Bureau of the Second International which could not pass without a sobering effect upon them, since the agreement between the arguments of Otto Bauer and those of Louzon and Paz were too flabbergasting.

However that may be, in the second half of the article, Die Fahne des Kommunismus comes to the conclusion that the Soviet republic must be defended even in the conflict with China. Very praiseworthy. But what is stupefying is that the article, in arriving at this conclusion, polemicalizes not against the Korschists, not against the Ultra-Left, not against Louzon, not against Paz but against the Russian Opposition. It would seem that the question of the defense or non-defense of the Soviet republic is in itself so important that secondary and tertiary considerations would disappear before it. That is dictated by the most elementary requirements of politics. But Urbahns and his friends proceed quite differently. At the most critical moment in the Soviet-China conflict, they print the articles of the ultra-Leftists who, as I showed above, simply demand that Chiang Kai-Shek be supported against the Soviet republic. It is only under the pressure of the Marxists that the editors of the Die Fahne, six weeks after the beginning of the conflict, pronounce themselves for the defense of the Soviets. Yet even here they do not conduct a struggle those who denied the elementary duty of defense, but against... Trotsky. Every mature political person must come to the conclusion that the question of the defense of the October revolution is a secondary affair for Urbahns, and that his principal aim is to show that he is not in "one hundred percent" agreement with the Russian Opposition. It evidently never occurs to comrade Urbahns that whoever seeks to demonstrate his independence by such artificial and negative methods, only demonstrates in reality his complete lack of intellectual independence.

In the second part of the article, it says:

"Besides the sympathy for Soviet Russia and Communism destroyed in the Chinese people by the policy of Stalin, the fact that Russia resorts to war over the Chinese Eastern Railway when it did not lift a hand while Chiang Kai-Shek and his military hordes waded in the blood of the Chinese workers and poor peasants, would undoubtedly play a role in the attitude of the Chinese people to such a war" Fahne des Kommunismus, No. 32, p. 246).

What is correct and what has been said long ago is mixed up here with what is new and wrong. The crimes of the Centrist leadership in China are absolutely unprecedented: Stalin and Bucharin murdered the revolution in China. This is a historical fact which penetrates more and more into the mind of the vanguard of the international proletariat. However, to accuse the Soviet republic of not having intervened with arms in hand in the Shanghai or Canton events, is to substitute sentimental demagoguery for revolutionary policy. Louzon is of the opinion that every military intervention in the affairs of another nation is "imperialism". That, of course, is a pacifist absurdity. But no less absurd is the directly contrary demand that the Soviet republic, under the present relationship of forces and in the present international situation should repair with Bolshevik bayonets what was lost with Menshevik policy. Criticism must move along real and not imaginary lines; otherwise the Opposition will never win the confidence of the workers.

How, then, could the Soviet republic decide in this case to carry on a war for the possession of the Chinese Eastern Railway? I have already said that if it comes to war, this fact alone would demonstrate that it is not a matter of the Chinese Eastern Railway but of something infinitely greater. It is true that this railway, even by itself, is a far more serious matter than the head of the Archduke killed in 1914, which was the occasion for the outbreak of the war. But it is not at all a matter of the railway. A war in the East, regardless of what were the immediate cause would inevitably be transformed the very next day into a struggle against Soviet "imperialism", that is, against the dictatorship of the proletariat; and the violence of the conflict would be immeasurably greater than that of the war which, provoked by the killing of an archduke, was transformed into a campaign against Prussian militarism.

It now looks like an agreement between Moscow and Nanking which can end in China redeeming the railway with the aid of foreign banks. That would mean, in reality, that control would pass from the hands of the workers' state into those of finance capital. I have already said that the cession of the Chinese Eastern is not out of the question. But such a cession must not be regarded as a realization of the principle of national self-determination, but as a shifting of strength from the proletarian revolution in favor of the capitalist reaction. But there can be no doubt that it is precisely Stalin and company who will seek to present this surrender of position as a realization of national justice, in conformity with the categorical imperative, the evangel according to Kellogg and Litvinov and the articles of Louzon and Paz that were reprinted in the organ of the Leninbund.

Practical Tasks in Case of War

The practical tasks of the Opposition in case of a war between China and Soviet Russia are characterized in the article in an unclear, ambiguous and evasive manner. "In case of a war between China and Soviet Russia for the possession of the Chinese Eastern Railway," says the article, the Leninist Opposition is against Chiang Kai-Shek and the imperialists standing behind him." (No. 32, p. 250). Ultra-Left confusion has gone so far that "Marxist Leninists" must declare "we are against Chiang Kai-Shek". That's how far things can go. Good, against Chiang Kai-Shek. But for whom are you?

"In such a war," the article replies, "The Leninist Opposition will mobilize the forces of the proletariat in every country with the aim of a general strike, proceeding from the organization of the prevention of arms manufacture, and any kind of arms transport, etc." (No. 32, p. 250). That is the position of pacifist neutrality. The task of the international proletariat, according to Urbahns, lies in the preventing any sort of arms transport, that is, not only to China but also to the Soviet republic. Is that your thought? Or have you simply said something different from what you wanted to say? Perhaps you have not thought out your thoughts "to the end"? In that case, hurry to correct yourself: the question is worth it. The correct formulation should be: By all means to prevent the transport of arms to counter-revolutionary China, and by all means to facilitate the acquisition of arms by the Soviet republic.

Does the Defense of the U. S. S. R. Mean Reconciliation with Centristism?

In order to show wherein the standpoint of the Leninbund differs from that of the Russian Opposition, Urbahns makes two discoveries: 1. Should an imperialist state intervene on the side of Russia, in the event of a war of the Soviet republic with China, then the Communists of this bourgeois state should not make civil peace with their bourgeoisie, as Bucharin taught, but they must adopt the course of overthrowing their bourgeoisie; 2. In defending the Soviet republic in the war with the Chinese counter-revolution, the Opposition must not become reconciled with the Stalinist course, but must conduct a decisive struggle against it. This is supposed to explain the difference between the position of the Leninbund and our own. In reality it is confusion, and I fear, not unconscious. These two theses, dragged in by the hair, do not refer to the Sino-Soviet conflict as such but in general to every war against the Soviet republic. Urbahns submerges a specific question under a general question. Neither Louzon nor Paz have as yet renounced the duty of the international proletariat to defend the Soviet republic in the event that it is attacked, for example, by America or England over the payment of czarist debts, the abolition of the foreign trade monopoly, the denationalization of the banks and factories, etc. The discussion arose over the specific character of the present conflict between China and the Soviet Union. It is precisely in this question that the ultra-Leftists showed themselves incapable of correctly evaluating individual and complex facts from a class standpoint. They are just the ones to whom the Leninbund so widely opened the columns of its paper. It is precisely over the slogan of "Hands Off China" that the Fahne des Kommunismus refrained for six weeks from expressing any opinion, and, when further silence was impossible, limited itself to half-hearted and ambiguous formulae.

What has the theory of Bucharin to do with this? What is the question of the cessation of struggle against Stalinist Centristism doing here? Who proposed it? Who spoke of it? What is it all about? Why is it necessary?

It is necessary in order to hint that the Russian Opposition—not the capitulators and turncoats, but the Russian Opposition—is leaning towards peace with Centristism, using the war as a pretext. Since I am writing for uninformed or badly informed foreign comrades, I consider it indispensable to recall, even if quite briefly, how the Russian Opposition posed the question of its attitude to the Stalinist course during the conditions of a war.

At the moment of the rupture of Anglo-Soviet relations, the Russian Opposition, contemptuously rejecting the lie of defeatism and conditional national defense declared in an official document that in the event of war all the differences of opinion could only become accentuated. Such a declaration in the country of the dictatorship of the proletariat, at the moment of the rupture of diplomatic relations with England requires no further explanations and in any case gives far more serious guarantees than this or that little article.

On this question, a furious struggle broke out in 1927. Have Urbahns and his partisans heard anything about the so-called "Clemenceau theory"? With this theory, the apparatus tried to agitate the party for months. It was the question of my having pointed, as an example of patriotic opposition in the camp of the imperialists, to the Clemenceau clique, which, from 1914 to 1917, in spite of the civil peace declared by the bourgeoisie, fought against all the other factions of the bourgeoisie, took over power and insured the victory of French imperialism. I asked: Is there an imbecile in the camp of the bourgeoisie who would therefore call Clemenceau a defeatist and a supporter of conditional national defense? That is the famous "Clemenceau thesis" which was criticized in thousands of articles and tens of thousands of speeches.

A short time ago, my book, "The Revolution Distorted" appeared in Paris. Among other things it contains the speech

I made at the Plenum of the Central Committee and the Central Control Commission on August 1, 1927. Here is what is said in the speech on the question that interests us now:

"The greatest events in human history are revolution and war. We have tested the policy of Centristism in the Chinese revolution... The greatest historical test after revolution is war. We say in advance: in the face of the event of a war, the policy of Stalin and Bucharin, the policy of zig-zags, of mental reservations—of ambiguity—the policy of Centristism—cannot prevail. This holds for the entire leadership of the Comintern. At present the leaders of the various Communist Parties have only one test question to answer: 'Are you ready to vote day and night against Trotskyism?' The war will confront them with exigencies demanding far greater responsibility... There will be no room for the intermediary position of Stalin. That is why, if I am permitted to say so in all frankness, the prattling about the 'handful of Oppositionists', the 'generals without an army', etc., appears simply ridiculous to me. The Bolsheviks heard that many times, in 1914 and in 1917. We see the morrow too clearly and we are preparing it. In domestic policy there will also be no room under the conditions of war for the slow down-sliding of Centristism. All the discussions will be condensed, the class contradictions will sharpen, become acute. A clear and precise answer will have to be given... Centrist policy will be unable to stand up in time of war. It will have to fall to the Right or to the Left, that is, it will have to choose the road of Thermidor or the road of the Opposition." (Disturbance).

And it is precisely this speech that I ended with the words: "For the socialist fatherland? Yes! For the Stalinist course? No!" And when Urbahns and his friends, apropos of precisely these words, recommend to me two years later to think the question out "to the end" and to comprehend that in time of war there must be no reconciliation with Centristism, I can only shrug my shoulders regretfully.

How Has the Discussion Been Conducted?

It is an ill wind that blows no good. The conflict between China and Soviet Russia has once more shown that within the Marxist Opposition an irreconcilable line of demarcation is necessary not only from the Right but also from the Left. The philistines will sneer at seeing us, a small minority, constantly occupied with internal divisions. But that should not bother us. It is precisely because we are a small minority whose entire strength lies in its ideological clarity that we must be especially implacable against dubious friends on the Right and the Left. For many months I attempted to attain clarity from the leadership of the Leninbund by means of private letters. I did not succeed. In the meanwhile, events brought one of the most important questions to a head. The differences of opinion came out into the open. The discussion began.

Is it good or bad? The article in Die Fahne des Kommunismus explains to me the advantage of discussion and points to the harm caused by the absence of discussion in the Comintern. I have already heard these ideas expressed, whether by comrade Urbahns or some one else escapes me for the moment. But there are discussions and discussions. It would have been far better if the Russo-Chinese conflict had not taken the Leninbund by surprise. There was time enough in the past to prepare for it. The question of Thermidor and the defense of the U. S. S. R. is no new one. It is a good thing that it did not come to war. But had it come to one? All this is an argument not against discussion, but against a bad discussion that maintains silence on the important questions so long as they have not come out into the open. The fact is that the Leninbund at least its leadership, showed itself unprepared to reply to a question raised by life itself. There was nothing left to do but to open the discussion.

Or Factional Demagogy & Forgery

As was to be expected, the Political Bureau of the Communist Party has drawn up a resolution on "The Economic Crisis and the Tasks of the Communist Party" published in the Daily Worker (1-11-1930). We will yet take occasion to write in greater detail on the general line of analysis and conclusions of this party document. It is enough now merely to say that it is an average example of non-Marxist electicism, a piece of sophomoric research-clipping work, without any clean line to illuminate its jumbled statistics, and with a conclusion that flows from no premises. It picks up one quotation from a financial journal here, another from a bourgeois economist there, glues them together with a couple of quotations from 10th Plenum resolutions, and presents the resultant hodge-podge as an economic and political analysis.

As for its political conclusions—they are disgraceful: no strategical task is elaborated except the recommendation that the party must win the masses of the American workers (How?) participate more actively in the struggles of the workers (with what program and policies?) recruit new members (in what way?) and what has prevented the recruitment up to now? and similar meaningless platitudes. There is no review at all of the enormous tactical blunders of the party and the policies that have led it from one defeat to another.

The document, in short, is worthless. It is one of those shoddy products ground out with monotonous regularity by the party thesis mill and just as regularly laid on the shelf of the archives room—forgotten in less time than was consumed in writing it. Nevertheless, we shall return to it at another opportunity. We limit ourselves now to the section of the resolution dedicated to the Opposition—for nowadays a yard-long attack against "Trotskyism" is the absolutely required sauce for an otherwise tasteless and unpalatable party thesis.

"Trotskyism" Dead Again

The section on the Opposition (Point 21) begins with the religiously observed formula that the "Trotskyist group" is bankrupt, breaking-up, anti-Communist, and even openly anti-Soviet. But how has the Militant in spite of "bankruptcy and disintegration", been able to transform itself into a weekly? The authors of the thesis explain: "With the money received by Trotsky for his articles against the Bolshevik Party and the Soviet Union from Hearst and Lord Beaverbrook!" i.e., the explanation of people who cannot conceive of a movement functioning in any way other than their own, other than with subsidies from the international Stalinist apparatus which corrupt the movement and transform the official parties into changeless echoes of any and every pronouncement of their financial patrons. But when it is impossible to elaborate intelligent and effective political arguments, others must be substituted, and in this case with all the characteristic features of Stalinist swindle.

In a recent issue, we pointed out how the Daily Worker had deliberately and maliciously misrepresented the viewpoint of the Militant on the question of the present economic situation in the United States. It simply took a sentence out of a news story in the Militant, which referred entirely to the dress-making trade, distorted it, and with fine scorn and contempt, presented it as though that were the Alpha and Omega of the Militant viewpoint of the situation. In spite of our exposure, this piece of cheap journalistic misrepresentation worthy of the yellow press is now re-consecrated and printed over again in the thesis as a "crushing refutation of our position."

But the thesis-grinders are not satisfied with misrepresentation alone. In the resolution, they go a bit further and resort to outright forgery. They write: "In its issue of Nov. 30th, the basic ideas of Love-stone are clearly echoed; while admitting depression in some of the most important branches, United States capitalism is described as 'on a road of production increase such as has not had its parallel in history.'" (Daily Worker's emphasis). Now let us see what actually appeared in the Militant. We wrote (November 30, 1929):

"The Wall Street crash was not due solely to the speculative mania, which only aggravated the situation. Its roots go deeper. Since the end of the World War, the U. S. became the world's banker. Easy money' made possible an embarkment on a road of production increase such as has not had its parallel in history, accompanied by an unprecedented export of capital." (Our emphasis).

Compare the quotation made by the party thesis with the original, and the clumsy forgery becomes apparent. What we did was to make a simple and incontestable statement of fact: that after the World War—not today, but twelve years ago!—the U. S. increased its productive forces and output to a degree never before known in history. Only a hopeless idiot or a revived Egyptian mummy could deny this well-known fact. But what the forgers did in their thesis was to make it appear as though the Militant claims that the United States today, now, not twelve years ago, is on the road of an unparalleled production increase! By the "slight" change in grammatical tenses, the Stalinist swindlers wipe out a whole decade of American economic history, and thus "achieve" another "argument" against the Opposition! Lenin once said that a demagogue is the worst enemy of the working class. Are swindle and forgery different in any degree from demagogy?

The resolution finally "clinches" its attack upon our position with the following half quotation from the Militant: "But the United States is still in a sufficiently strong and arrogant (?) position in world economy and politics to endeavor to overcome its economic difficulties at home." (Daily Worker emphasis). From this quotation is omitted the balance of the sentence: "by pressure on two points: on the U. S. workers in the form of a more intense drive to lower wages, lengthen the work day, speed up the workers, and on Europe, in the form of a decreased ration for France, Germany, Italy, England and the rest of the world market."

What is wrong in this statement, the Daily Worker does not say. Does it contest the absolute correctness of these words? That is hardly likely; it would fly in the face of the party resolution itself (Points 10, 11, 14, etc.) But what of that? For the thesis writers in the party today all such "petty matters" of honesty, independent political thought, analysis proceeding from facts and not wishes, are entirely subordinated to the main problem of destroying the so-many-time-destroyed Opposition. If it cannot be done with fact, then falsehood must serve. If no arguments are available, then demagogy must be pressed into use. If your opponent's position is unassailable, distort it, misrepresent it, or manufacture for your opponent such an untenable position that you will be able to attack him. For the Stalinist press and those who fill its columns, these tenets are the beginning and the end of all political wisdom.

Karakhan Takes a Pleasant Trip to Turkey

But, Unlike Trotsky, He is not Confined on an Island by Friend Kemal Pasha

The diplomatic representative of the Soviet Union, Karakhan has just made a triumphal voyage to Turkey. Everywhere, at Angora as at Constantinople, his passage was the occasion for demonstrations of an exceptional warmth. In the course of his trip, he made some declarations to journalists which are interesting to note. The manner in which he spoke of official personages is pretty astonishing. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Tewik Rushdi Bey, is his best "friend" and he "harbors feelings of the deepest respect" towards the president of the council, Ismet Pasha. The conventional language of diplomats it will be said. Perhaps, but of bourgeois diplomats, and in this domain as in the others, the Soviet Union must demonstrate that it is not a State like the others, that it is a proletarian State. Its diplomats should distinguish themselves, although not in the manner of Bessedovsky.

Nevertheless, it is not there that the most important point lies in the declarations of Karakhan. That which is serious and symptomatic, in our opinion, is that, upon arrival at Angora, the associate of the Soviet commissariat for foreign affairs cried:

"This city reflects the calm and firm security with which the new Turkey is built, which supports itself upon its own forces and puts its hopes in the creative force of its people and in them alone. What I have seen, especially in this regard, is not strange to me. They are the same ideas and the same state of mind that prevails in our country. We are building up our life, our material and intellec-

The Professor's Nightmare

A Story of the Great American Worker-Boss that Never Existed

Dr. Thomas Thornton Read, Professor of Mining at Columbia University, having spent three years studying the "American at Work", and having found that the American "does several times the amount of productive work accomplished by an Asiatic or a European", seats himself (one may suppose) in a comfortable chair and puts his undoubtedly remarkable brain to work to discover the reason why. After some little time spent in mental acrobatics he arrives according to the New York Times of January 5, at these equally remarkable conclusions: first, that the American workers are not wage slaves, but, on the contrary, bosses, one and all, with "mechanical slaves" doing the work for them; second, that the American "converts food into energy at a higher rate than any other nationality" but "utilizes much of that energy in play rather than work" (!); third that the economic system of America "is based on the ability of American business men to find ways to provide employment for every one", so that the worker and his employer can both live well on the fruits of their joint enterprise".

As the Professor, after having given his discoveries to the world, via the Times, dozes quietly in his chair, there suddenly appears before him a tall, lean creature dressed in workmen's clothes, carrying a bundle under his arm. The Professor gives a start and exclaims, "Who are you? What do you want?"

"I am the American Worker", replies the apparition in a hollow voice "and I want you to come with me."

"But I have just spent three years seeing you at work," the Professor remonstrates. The stranger hands him a suit of working clothes and repeats: "Come along."

The Professor gives a deep sigh but gets into the clothes and asks, "Where are we going?" "To work", is the brief response, as the door enclosing the Professor's cozy study bangs behind them.

"Let's hop over to Detroit and see how things are going there," says the stranger. "Ah, Ford," the Professor smiles. "Yes, indeed, let's be off to the Ford plant—that's the place to go; scientific management—everything's systematized there, you know—the machines do all the work and the men have scarcely anything to do, yet get good wages for it."

The stranger gives him a sorrowful look, which quickly disappears however, for in the shake of a lamb's tail the traveling workers find themselves in Detroit, outside the Ford works. Several hours pass before he enters the promised land, where he undergoes a rigorous examination.

"Can you use a wrench?" finally asks the agent in a tone of doubt.

"Is that all I have to do?" answers the Professor gleefully, and he makes not the slightest objection as the agent pushes him over to a foreman who conducts him forthwith to the Hall of the Machines. Here long rows of Tin Lizzies in all stages of development travel on an endless chain. The Professor is furnished with a wrench and a box of nuts. He is placed in position and instructed that when a car reaches him he must put a nut in a certain spot and tighten it up. He is warned that he must do this before the car reaches the next man, and that he must repeat the same operation on the next car as it comes along.

"This is too easy," smiles the Professor and playfully gets busy on the first car as it arrives. He repeats the operation on the second while his companion watches him quizzically. The first hour of his labor passes quickly, but by the time the second has gone the ardor of the nut manipulator has begun to ebb. His motions slacken.

"Get a move on, there," comes the voice of the foreman and the Professor braces himself for the worst, for his head is already dizzy and his imploring looks in the direction of his former companion have had no effect.

"Say, I'm getting tired of this. Can't I do something else for a change?" he finally calls across. And adds, "For heaven's sake, don't they ever stop this chain?"

Great heavens, he must put on nuts for ten hours today. What a nightmare! What a nightmare, indeed! But eventually the whistle blows. It's time to quit.

"Come on and eat something and then you can go to bed. You'll have to be up early tomorrow," says his companion. "There's another day ahead."

"No! No! Not another day, not another hour. I've had enough."

"Very well, then so be it. But let's go to the office and get our money."

"Well, what do you want?" asks the clerk as the Professor stands mutely waiting for his reward.

"I want my share of our joint enterprise."

"What's that?"

"I want my share . . ."

"Oh, you mean you want your wages. Sign this."

"No, no. I am an American Worker. a boss. I want my share of our profits."

"Say, what the heck are you talking about? Did your work affect your brain? Here's your five simoleons and now beat it!"

"What, only five dollars for ten hours of slavery at a machine? And Ford gets millions!"

"It's no use to argue," admonishes the stranger. "That's the wage they pay you for a day's labor; you can take it or leave it. There are thousands outside all ready to step into your shoes at the same price." He takes the tired Professor to the nearest park and seats him on a bench.

"Listen to me, Professor," he begins. "You've had some real experience now as a worker, and I hope it's taught you something. If you had had it first, and talked afterwards, you would have arrived at different conclusions than you did after your three years' survey. You would have learned, for instance, that American as well as European and Asiatic workers are all wage-slaves, selling their labor power as a merchant sells his commodity, for what it costs to reproduce it. The amount of wealth the workers produce in the shops has nothing whatsoever to do with the wages they receive. They get only enough for a bare existence, and if the American worker produces, as you say, three times more than the European worker, he is nevertheless only exploited the more in doing so."

"I'm leaving you now, but you can sit here as long as you like and think the matter over."

"Oh, please don't leave me. I've got only five dollars in the world, no job and no place to go."

"You've got plenty of company. There are three or four million just like you—without money and no prospect of a job. So console yourself with that. Write to the Times about it."

Hutcheson Expels Militant

Louis A. Roseland Removed from Minneapolis Carpenters Union

At the last meeting of the local, a communication was read from international president William Hutcheson demanding that Roseland be stricken from the membership rolls. The move was instigated by Andrew Leaf, special organizer of the U. B. C. & J. of A., who did not have the courage to expel Roseland by himself in face of the tremendous opposition among the membership. With the excuse that Roseland was a Communist, Hutcheson demanded his expulsion.

When the letter was read in the local, the meeting hall bristled with members demanding to be recognized and speak against the reactionary proposal. One member walked from the rear of the hall, stated that he was not a Communist, had no understanding of what Communism stood for, but that he had taken the obligation like all other members, with the provision that his religious, political and domestic affairs would not be called into question. Amid applause, he announced his opposition to Roseland's expulsion. Several others clamored for the floor, making motions to table the matter, and demanding that the chairman rule on whether Roseland gets a trial or the communication is tantamount to forthwith expulsion and the membership had nothing to say about it.

The chairman dared not make an outright ruling, and evaded the issue by saying that Roseland understood the meaning of the document as well as he did and that he did not deem it necessary to make a ruling. Seeing the chairman's weakness, Hutcheson's watchdog, Andrew Leaf, took the floor and explained that immediately after reading the letter, Roseland was no longer a member of the union and that was final. He was greeted with shouts of "Throw him out!" "Sit down!" "We want a decision from the chair!" "To hell with you!" Thereupon the chairman finally called the letter supreme and advised no further action. But as far as "escorting" Roseland out of the hall, or requesting him to leave, the chairman was unwilling.

Upon an appeal from the chair, a mix-up followed, and Roseland finally took the floor, demanding a definite ruling as to whether or not he was still a member of the Brotherhood, since no business can be conducted with a non-member present. The chair, fearing that it would be lost, refused to entertain a motion that followed for Roseland to leave the hall.

The meeting was in an uproar, until Roseland was granted the floor for some last remarks. Briefly, he stated that since his admittance to Local 7 about seventeen years ago, he had fought to the best of his ability for the union and the working class as a whole. "Through the every day struggle on the job, meeting workers of all shades of opinions, I soon became conscious of who the enemy was—the boss—and that my duty was to fight him as well as those who defend him. Because of the fact that I have consistently fought for the amalgamation of craft unions into powerful industrial unions, for the organization of the unorganized, for independent political action of the workers, etc., I have been branded by Hutcheson as an enemy of the trade union movement."

Roseland's removal came at the end of a sharp conflict in the building trades over the erection of the N. W. National Bank Building. Early last spring the building trades locals were united on a program of fighting the Haglin Contracting Co. which was to put up the building. Mass picketing was endorsed by locals, assessments of $5.00 per member were levied in all locals. The spirit of mass action was manifest in all the unions, the general public was aroused and expected a real battle on this job. In the face of this splendid opportunity to win with hands down, the leaders were negotiating with the city officials and trying to make peace with the police.

A systematic campaign of hushing up the rank and file was begun by communications from local officials, as well as from various internationals and the Executive Council of the A. F. of L. stating that the rank and file must be very careful of what it says and does. Stand by your officials, do not criticize, we are doing all we can! Paul Smith, representative of Bill Green gave assurance that the whole Executive Council of the A. F. of L. was behind (the scenes) the workers in this fight, that there was no reason for hasty action. After months of sabotage by the officials the spirit died down, workers became disgusted some tore up their union cards and went to work on this job. Ranks were breaking and no sign of a strike: only a single banner carried by volunteers for a while, which finally dwindled down to one person.

The class collaborationists were squandering the unions' money without giving an accounting of it. Requests for information were rejected on the pretense that it would hurt the movement. But towards Fall, when the strike had been considered lost for some time, a new leadership had developed in the building trades and the fight was taken up again. Officers of the Building Trades Council and the local unions went on the picket line one morning and were arrested. The news in the capitalist press was the first the workers had received that there had been a picket line on, duty.

Officials Want No "Interference"

This aroused the workers and many appeared on the scene the next morning. Some fell in line, others stood along the curb across the street looking on curiously. At about 7:00 a. m., as the morning before, the police wagons were again brought on the scene to pick up these courageous officers who dared to chat and smile with the police while the scabs were rushing to the gates to get to work. Upon their arrival, they discovered several stowaways in their midst. The labor officials said to them: Who in hell are you? Stowaways from the rank and file. Who the hell told you to come here? asked the polite labor leaders. Nobody; we read in the capitalist papers that everyone who gets on the picket line gets a free ride to the city hall. Well, said the officials, this is strictly our affair and we don't want any more butting in of the rank and file, so tomorrow you stay home.

Next morning, about 6:15 a. m., about 100 rank and file showed up but got no free ride. They became peeved and started calling the scabs names. A big, burly business agent came rushing up the line and howled: Cut it out, can't you see you're making the police sore? Furthermore, can't you see Mr. Haglin, the contractor, and his wife just across the street? What will they think of us if we permit you to call his men such vile names? We want peaceful picketing as per instructions from Judge Wright. Thus ended the picket line.

About a month ago war broke out in the Building Trades Council. The fight was opened against the Sipperley-Sjostrom machine. By resolution all officers were declared vacant and an election of new officers followed. Paul Smith tried valiantly to stem the tide, but was swept aside with the rest of the rubbish to the tune of 30 to 10.

Immediately after the election of the new leadership, they proceeded to go into all the building trades locals with a program of organization and education, requesting all local unions to elect a committee of five, preferably rank and file members, to work in conjunction with the organization and education committee of the Building Trades Council. This started the fireworks in Carpenters Local Union 7. Its officers, Ole Nelson, Oscar Ericson, Walfred Engdahl and William Young, with Andrew Leaf sitting in occasionally, were the official representatives of Local 7 in the Council. This element had consistently carried out a class collaboration policy, along with Paul Smith, D. F. Sipperley, Attle Sjostrom, Bob Cramer and Co.

For more than a year, Roseland, along with other members of Local 7, had fought for affiliation to the Building Trades Council. Hutcheson sent a letter forbidding it, but permitting affiliation to a Twin City B. T. C. and then only through the Twin City Carpenters District Council.

This was accepted and an agitation was started for the building of a Twin City B. T. C. The secretary of the Twin City Carpenters Council was instructed to call a conference of all building trades locals in both cities (Minneapolis and St. Paul) for the purpose of consolidating the two organizations. But instead of making this a broad appeal, it landed in the hands of the executive boards and the ranks never heard of it. Roseland then moved the election of a committee to visit all local unions for the purpose of reaching the rank and file, who would in turn elect similar committees to work with Local 7's for a Twin City B. T. C.

This motion was defeated on some trumped-up grounds. Roseland then moved on December 27, to endorse the program of the B. T. C. education and organization committee, and to proceed with the election of a committee of five members to work with them in accordance with the committee's request. After three or more hours' discussion, the motion was tabled.

The issue in the expulsion of Roseland is in reality the development of a conscious Left wing in Local 7 which has got under the hide of the reactionaries. In order to safeguard their positions they had to have a killing. The last word remains with the union membership not only in the Twin Cities, but throughout the country.

The Struggle of the Miners in Taylorville, Ill.

Taylorville, Ill.

Dear Comrades:

Perhaps you have already read of what happened in the Peabody district. In all the conventions and conferences I have attended, and I have attended most all of them and chiefly on my own meager expenses, I was somewhat set back because Taylorville was considered the weakest district, and it was thought that the work was not good, not effective. The occurrences in the last strike taught me a bit different. When Taylorville came out, and that was about 100 percent, the other districts did not. And I am proud of the boys around here and the walkout shows what lone determined fighting can accomplish. I had no or little assistance, but those things have not stopped me, nor will they stop me. I will continue with my silent persistent work, which is the most effective. I had that experience in the German miners' strike in 1889 and so I will carry on the fight here which will help not only the National Miners Union but also the Communist movement, as the two cannot be separated. The success of the one is the success of the other.

The strike was a success in Taylorville, Pana and the Midland. It was a failure in the other places in the state. We had not enough men to take the lead and some of them are already mis-leaders. On the third day of the strike, when it seemingly looked like a success, all the fakers and would-be fakers clamored for the leadership. Think of it, two preachers, one a Nazarene, and the other a Latter-Day Saints preacher, another an ex-committee-man of Local 58, a renegade and friend of the bosses, and several other doubtful characters. Then, I think at the order of Freeman Thompson and some local celebrities, I was replaced by the above-mentioned gents, and as soon as the strike fizzled out, they renounced their membership in the N. M. U. so as to hold their jobs, which they did. For their treason to the miners they got a better job while hundreds and more were fired from the mine, and those that were not discharged by the operators were discharged by the Haywoods and Glassgows (U. M. W. A. officials).

At one time they had the jails so full that there was no standing room. I too was nabbed on Friday the 13th. I wanted to be with the boys but the sheriff rounded up Joe Natterman who put up $2,000 bond for me and I was forcibly escorted home by the sheriff and my house guarded so that I could not get out of the yard.

My trial was postponed three times and comes up Monday January 13. The International Labor Defense took up the majority of the cases, but 65 year old Fritz Bode had to hire his own lawyer because he committed "lese majeste" in quoting from the Militant in one of his speeches, and distributing the Militant among the men. This, I think, was also the reason why I was side-tracked by Freeman Thompson and Company. Some of their ilk had given me previous warning and a bunch of Militants were stolen out of my outside overcoat pocket. Isn't that some wonderful comradeship to treat an old rebel? I was at the Belleville conference when Watt was ousted. It was the most disgraceful procedure I have ever witnessed

Bessedovsky

Trotsky on the «Revelations»

Hardly had Mr. Bessedovsky quit Communism by the way of the back-window and fence of the Soviet embassy in Paris, than he immediately made clear his position in a long series of articles that have been gobbled up by the bourgeois press of the world. In the United States, they are being published by, among others, the Jewish "socialist" Forward with sensational headlines guaranteed to make Willie Hearst turn yellow with envy. From his articles it becomes quite clear that his "revelations" are calculated to open a new attack on the Soviet Union and, as a first result to achieve its diplomatic isolation. Because this time it is a question of "facts" destined to alarm the interested governments. Comrade Trotsky, having received numerous questions, writes:

"You ask me what 'value' the abundant 'revelations' of Bessedovsky have. I confess that I have not read them, because the first article that came to hand appeared to me to be vacuous. After your request, I perused a number of the articles. I have not, of course, any possibility of verifying all his information, seeing that a series of facts he recounts are entirely unknown to me, even from hearsay. Nevertheless, I have run across at least a dozen facts with which I am personally acquainted. The others I can judge only according to the knowledge of the circumstances, the persons, etc. Within these rather broad limits, the memoirs of Bessedovsky are impressive for their fantasy, a fantasy of that particular character known among us as 'chlestakov' (from the name of one of Gogol's heroes, Chlestakov). It is a combined lie, where the element of personal interest joins with an impartial imagination provoked by the absence of any regulating centers. In many cases, Bessedovsky's inventions have quite defined and despicable aims. He is trying to serve those who would like to muddle the relations between Germany and the U. S. S. R. and provoke a rupture between Moscow and Paris. At the same time he wants to furnish arguments to the most belligerent elements in Poland and other neighboring countries. Since, despite his rather representative official position, he played a role of only second or third order, he employs for his combinations the petty crumbs that reached him from tables where he had no place. But in many cases, his fantasy has no aim and rather indicates a mind that has lost its balance.

"By the way, I am told that Bessedovsky not only took part until recently in the bureau of the Communist nucleus of the Embassy, but that he played one of the leading roles in the commission charged with purging the nucleus from ...Oppositionists. As you see, he is a man quite qualified for that! This fact at the same time makes clear the political 'evolution' that Bessedovsky has made...not even in twenty-four hours, but within a much shorter time.

"Communist greetings,

in my 42 years in the revolutionary fight.

After the strike fizzled out, all the would-be leaders crawled back to their holes, kissing and glorifying the hands of their masters, either the operators or the labor fakers. The miners in Taylorville and vicinity are actually starving. This morning, January 7, they discharged 80 more men at No. 7 mine. All members of the N.M.U. must go. Hundreds upon hundreds have already been fired and the little work they had previously was not enough to feed their loved ones.

I sincerely hope that I can stay a while longer in the fight, but the 29th of this month marks my entry into the 65th year, but when I am in the fight, then I feel myself as young as any of them. I never will be a renegade or traitor to my fellow men. I receive a bundle of Militants every issue, and they come in mighty handy right now. As I write, the paper comes in stating that two more of our boys were arrested. I wonder what they will do to me, but let her go!

With the hope that we all remain faithful and fearless and true to the inevitable world revolution, I remain yours as ever,

—FRITZ BODE, Sr.

Leninism Lives! The Opposition Carries It Forward

Every class society not only produced the movement working for its destruction but the directing genius with whose name the movement is associated. Luther, Napoleon, Cromwell, Lincoln, Bismarck, Robespierre—each of them marks a turning point in society. They are men who were at once the made and the makers of history. But these men, their contemporaries and predecessors, were limited by the very nature of the milieu. While their names are associated with the progress of society in one way or another, they were all the banner-bearers of classes which, in liberating themselves from the fetters of a ruling class, enslaved others in turn.

The Great Men of the Proletariat

The fundamental difference between the great men of bourgeois history and all preceding societies, and the great men of the proletarian revolution is that the latter, in the movement for working class freedom from capitalist class rule, finally liberate all of humanity from class society and open up an entirely new historical era. For this profound social reason, the leaders of the proletarian revolution already tower above all the doers of the past, and the niche they occupy in history still to be written will make them even more prominent. And of these leaders, one of the greatest—if not the outstanding man among them all—is Lenin.

Without capitalism and without the revolutionary proletariat, there could be no Lenin. He was the child of their present and the father of the future. The symbol of the final struggle, he presided over the dying writhings of the one and the painful birth of the other. The struggle between the new and the old therefore stamped his whole life and work.

No article can pretend to give even the briefest resume of his life. It can only mention its most prominent and characteristic features, those that raised Lenin far above the shoulders even of his fellow-fighters and made his name the shibboleth of a world movement.

Foremost in Lenin was his unswerving confidence in the victory of the proletariat, organized and led by its most conscious and determined section, the revolutionary party. For more than twenty years he devoted himself to the formation, clarification and strengthening of the principal arm of the Russian working class, the Bolshevik Party. He persistently pointed out that the working class as grouped together by capitalist production, without organization, or even with the elementary organization of trade unions, cooperative groups, etc. could carry on a defensive struggle against the daily encroachments of the capitalist class, but never the successful struggle for power. It was a cardinal point in his work, tested and proved in life in 1917, that only by possessing an organized political vanguard, a party embracing the most active, devoted and clearest elements of the class, embodying and crystallizing all the experiences of the struggle, serving as a guide and leader, could the working class rise to the position of the ruling class and free itself from exploitation. With Lenin, the revolutionary proletarian party was the only door through which the working class might enter the realm of power and maintain itself there.

The 1917 revolution in Russia—the greatest experience of the international working class—demonstrated the validity of Lenin's life work. The Bolshevik party was the instrument that brought order out of capitalist chaos and installed the working class as master of one-sixth of the earth. The Bolshevik party successfully repulsed not only the attacks of the enemy in the country but also the armed intervention of the imperialist world from without. The Bolshevik party successfully organized production and set into motion the wheels of industry that had been jammed by the imperialist and civil wars. The Bolshevik party initiated the formation of the Communist International, the mightiest weapon with which the international working class could be equipped to fulfill its mission in the period of preparing the world revolution.

A Party—Not a Sect

It is necessary to emphasize, particularly in the present day, that Lenin's conception of the revolutionary party was not that of a sect separated from the working class as a whole, living a life of its own outside the domain of the living struggle, pursuing special interests of its own. A mass movement for the sake of numbers was no fetish with him, for he was pre-eminently a fighter who could swim against the current of prevailing opinion. What was essential for him was a party basing itself on the interests of the whole working class so that the strength necessary for victory could be mobilized. He always proceeded from the standpoint of the requirements of the main task: the dictatorship of the proletariat, to which all others must contribute.

Just as the proletarian party was considered by Lenin to be the principal arm of the working class, so the theories of Marxism were considered the granite formation and strength of the party. Revolutionary theory was his most powerful weapon, and in the struggle against those who endeavored to revise Marxism Lenin produced many of the fundamental works of the movement today. He contributed more than any other man to the fact that "Russia attained Marxism, the only revolutionary theory, by dint of fifty years' travail and sacrifice, through the greatest revolutionary heroism, the most incredible energy and devotion, in seeking, educating practical experience, disappointment, checking and comparison with European experience."

His regard for theory and unshakable belief that it is only by proceeding from it that the practices of the movement could be correct deserve special emphasis in the struggle today, when an entirely different spirit prevails in the official Communist parties. It is a characteristic of the departure from the teachings of Lenin that has taken place in the movement since his death, that the "leader" of the Communist International and the Russian Party today is one whose ignorance of Marxist-Leninist theory yields only to his contempt for it. It is characteristic of the alienation of the official movement from Leninism that it has allowed to prevail such anti-revolutionary "theories" as socialism in one country, joint workers' and peasants' parties, the subordination of the proletariat to the bourgeoisie in the colonial revolution and the "socialist development" of the rich peasantry to mention only a few of the "contributions" made to Marxist thought by Stalin since Lenin died.

Just as pernicious as ignorance, from Lenin's point of view, is the contemptuous light-mindedness with which new-fangled "theories" are formulated one day only to be substituted by equally "novel" conceptions the next day, a system that has de-

Mass Unemployment Continues

Unemployment is general throughout the United States, according to the December bulletin of the U. S. Employment Service, issued Jan. 20 by Director Jones. From Maine, where a "seasonal recession in production" was reported from all sections, to Washington State, where the "volume of employment" was reported as decreased as usual at this season, the employment agents have found excuses for the reduction of jobs, but they have admitted the fact that great numbers of men cannot find means of earning a livelihood.

Massachusetts reported that "curtailed schedules obtained in the shoe, textile, machinery, hosiery and celluloid industries in various sections of the state, with rather limited opportunities locally for the released workers in their individual communities." Building trades and unskilled labor were also hard hit.

New York noted that December showed decreased activity in manufactures, and that inventory taking and repairs to plants were under way in many of the larger establishments, throwing large numbers of workers out of employment. Holiday extra help in stores were let out at the end of the month, and the usual flow of unemployed unskilled labor from the country into the cities had begun.

New Jersey reported that some unemployment was "apparent in practically all cities". Pennsylvania found the same condition, with part-time operation in many of the iron and steel mills. Detroit, Pontiac and Flint, in the automotive production area of the Michigan, reported "surplus of labor apparent" and part-time operation of many factories. Some automobile plants were closed down. Ohio's general view was that practically all trades were suffering from lack of jobs. Automobile, steel and miscellaneous plants were operating on part-time schedules. Rubber factories had let out a considerable part of their force. Thousands of bituminous miners were idle.

Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin and Minnesota were among the states whose industries slowed down in December. Chicago had a surplus of railroad maintenance-of-way and shop workers, building tradesmen, and common labor, much of which came in from smaller cities.

PATERSON, N. J.—(FP)—Sixteen hundred men laid off by the Wright Aeronautical Corp. of this city recently waited anxiously for the return of their jobs. They had been told that an inventory was the reason for their lay off, and were led to believe that they would soon be put back to work. Most of them have experienced bitter disappointment as the plant gradually reopened to find themselves still unemployed, while the plant filled their places with women at $14 a week. The men had been getting about 50 cents an hour.

DURHAM, N. C.—(FP)—Distress is becoming acute among unemployed workers who have been pouring into Durham from other stricken cities and from the farm-sides, seeking work.

Enormous Profits in Southern Tobacco

Enormous profits for the companies contrast with the bitterest exploitation of the workers—Negro and white—in the South's second biggest manufacturing industry—tobacco, in which opportunities for labor organization and struggle are ripened by the sharpened class distinction. Annual financial reports of the big cigarette companies, just released, are very instructive.

Leading in profits is the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. which has attached to Winston-Salem, N. C. the sobriquet of Camel City. Its profits for 1929 reached the amazing total of $32,210,000 compared with $29,080,000 in 1927. No question here of an over-expanded industry "profitless" for capitalists, as the textile barons claim.

Enormous Company Profits

The tremendous net earnings, built on the sale of Camels and Prince Albert, come from workers suffering under an even lower scale of wages than cotton mill operatives, and from tobacco growers, many of whom are reported famine-stricken in eastern North Carolina. Unionism is tolerated even less in tobacco factories than in cotton mills. The Tobacco Workers Intl. Union reports the negligible membership of 3,200 based on a few small, but friendly firms in Kentucky manufacturing cigarettes for the union label trade.

R.J. Reynold's net earnings of $32,210,000 for 1929 are computed after "deducting all charges and expenses of management, and after making provision for interest, taxes, depreciation, advertising, etc." From this sum $25,500,000 was paid to stockholders and $6,710,000 transferred to the undivided profits account, which now totals $51,579,000.

These tremendous earnings are based on the labor of 12,000 Winston-Salem workers, more than half of them negroes. Wages run from $7 to $11 a week, with a maximum of 48 cents an hour.

The Winston-Salem tobacco factories are strongly protected against union inroads. R. J. Reynolds answered the activities of E. L. Crouch, vice president of the Tobacco Workers Intl. Union, stationed in the Camel city, by wholesale discharges of unionists. Last year 800 were fired in one batch, many of them negroes. But back in 1920 the union was strong and covered the 14,000 workers then employed in an industry where speedup has since taken its toll in displaced workers. No one got less than 32 cents an hour and the maximum was 64 cents. The Machinists Union had separate contracts covering their men.

The industrial depression of 1921 afforded an excellent opportunity to drive out unionism, which was crushed under militant anti-union tactics and unemployment.

Virtual Famine for Workers

The other side of the R. J. Reynolds exploitation is seen in eastern North Carolina, where the Raleigh News and Observer reveals hunger prevalent and conditions closely approaching a real famine. This is in the tobacco country. At the mercy of the Big Five tobacco corporations, which set the price to be paid the grower at the start of each harvest season, the bright leaf growers, who supply the cigarette trade, find no open market in which to sell. This year with partial crop failure and a price of 24 cents a pound, they find themselves at the mercy of the big cigarette companies, the landlords and the bankers.

The Right wing, which still employs some Communist phraseology purely out of years of habit, has taken another step away from Communism and towards the social democracy. This time the action is laid in Czechoslovakia. The Right wing there has been divided into three camps: the Jilek-Bolen group of Right wingers with some, Centrists leanings, the Right wing organization in Brunn, and the trade union opportunists (Hais et al) who are now in control of the Left wing unions. On December 15, the Action Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia (Opposition)—the Jilek-Bolen-Houser group recently removed from Party leadership and expelled—held a plenary meeting at which the question of unity in the Right wing camp was discussed.

The report was delivered by Houser, with a co-report by Bolen. The subject of the controversy was the political and organizational resolution worked out by the C. P. C. (Opposition) at a joint conference with the Brunn Opposition on November 25. The resolution was adopted at the Plenary session by a vote of 18 to 4, with Jilek, Bolen, Lipina and Kolzer voting in the negative. While adequate details are not yet at hand, the character of the resolution that forms the basis of the unification of the Czech Right wing groups may be judged from the following illuminating excerpt:

"The proletarian united front is not just a maneuver for the purpose of exposure, but it is a serious policy which has as its task the approachment (annäherung) and collaboration of all class conscious socialist parties that are ready to fight against the bourgeoisie..."

Gegen den Strom, the central organ of the German Right wing (Brandler-Thalheimer) quite correctly remarks that this paragraph in incompatible with the Leninist tactic of the united front. It may be added that it breaks not only with some specific tactic of the Communists—which should or should not be applied, according to the conditions of the struggle—but with the fundamental principles of the Communist movement. We know of no socialist parties outside of the Communist Parties that is ready to fight against the bourgeoisie. We know only that all shades of the social democracy, Right as well as "Left", are the decoys of the bourgeoisie in the proletarian movement, that their role in the struggle is essentially one of diverting, confusing and strangling every genuine movement of struggle against capitalism.

To the so-called Left socialists falls the specific task of deceiving the workers into the belief that there are "bad socialists" who collaborate with the bourgeoisie, and "good socialists" who are against the proletarian revolution and the dictatorship of the working class but still "ready to fight against the bourgeoisie". Their names are A. A. Purcell, James Maxton, Paul Levi, Georg Ledebour, Otto Bauer and Company. Their ranks are wide open to receive the new recruits to national socialism of the "Left" variety—Hauser, Hais, Brandler, Hueber, Seller and Lovestone. The above-mentioned Czech resolution is an indication that the Right wing of the Communist movement is more than ready to meet Bauer and Co. half way.

It is true that Gegen den Strom very formally records its disagreement with the resolution of its Czech colleagues. But it is purely a matter of record with Brandler. Let the archives bear testimony for the future historian that Brandler once recorded his opposition to the crude opportunism of his Czech comrades, and thereby cleared his "international" conscience. (It might be added, of course, that Brandler's policy in Germany, while a bit more refined, is neither better nor worse than Houser's in Czechoslovakia.)

But no sooner has Brandler so devoutly "fulfilled his international obligations", than he turns around in the very next issue of his paper (Vol. 3, No. 1), and gives a glowing and unrestrained account of the "Unification of the Three Communist Opposition groups in Czechoslovakia". And lo and behold! there is not as much as a syllable whispered about the resolution so formally and unobtrusively criticized a week before. It is not against this vulgar piece of Menshevism that Brandler now directs his shafts, but against the timid souls, Jilek and Bolen, who presumed to oppose the unification on the basis of the submitted resolution! Brandler suddenly discovers—after having lavished praise upon them for months—that Jilek and Bolen are "the two representatives of the Ruth Fischer-Maslow era in Czechoslovakia"—the worse thing Brandler can say about anyone.

That is the contemptible way in which the Right wing "criticize" each other's new strides away from Communism. "You must understand, dear Houser," says Brandler, "that I will have to say an embarrassed word or two in Gegen den Strom. But please do not feel hurt. We are really for a Hands Off policy, and in our next issue I will write a full page eulogizing you in such unmeasured and uncritical terms that nobody will remember the petty criticism I made the week before."

The Right Wing Doesn't "Intervene"

Thus proceeds the occupation of new social democratic territory by the Right wing in every country and the ever greater distance it puts between itself and its former Communist base. Every group knows there is no danger of any serious "intervention" by the other.

A similar case may be found in the United States. With a simplicity and ease that does no credit to his followers, Lovestone has succeeded in allying his group with the Brandler group in Germany. The completeness of this reversal may be judged from the fact that there has not been a national or international party congress or plenum since 1924 where Lovestone did not condemn Brandler and Co. from hell to breakfast as the outstanding representative of social democracy in the Communist movement. Lovestone prided himself on being the most prominent antagonist of Brandlerism, and made this antagonism one of his principal claims to leadership in the American party. Inside of six months, Lovestone erased five years of his record. The two Right wing groups have agreed to let each other traverse its own specific path of national reformism without molestation or "petty criticism".

But the outward forms of "internationalism" must be maintained. Even Otto Bauer will sometimes be found criticizing the more scandalous actions of his British or German colleagues in the Second International. Therefore the current issue of the Revolutionary Age contains a criticism of M. N. Roy that is positively touching in the delicacy of its reproach. In a recent article, Roy condemned not only the pet abomination of the Right wingers, the 10th Plenum of the E. C. C. I., but also the Sixth Congress: the latter was too "Left" for him. In a "critical" article of reply Herberg assures Roy that he is wrong. The Sixth Congress was not a "Left" Congress; its leaders were Bucharin, Lovestone, Jilek, Serra and Humbert-Droz, says Herberg. The only trouble is that its work is being revised now.

Roy's Nationalism

Alas, even the tender criticisms of Herberg are lost on Roy. The latter is a well-known Indian nationalist, who has travelled for the last 4 to 5 years from Moscow to Shanghai to Moscow to the Riviera to Berlin to Moscow and back to Berlin, where he is now the "international" specialist of the Brandlerites. All these years he has had to masquerade in a Communist costume. Now he has thrown it off. Even the Sixth Congress was "too radical" for him. With his expulsion from the Comintern, there is no longer even the faintest restraining leash upon him.

He will not lose any sleep over Herberg's criticism. He knows that it means nothing and can accomplish nothing. So long as he doesn't interfere with Lovestone's effort to create a temporary berth between the socialist and Communist movements of this country, Lovestone will not expose the sleight-of-hand tricks by which Roy pulls nationalist policies and theories out of a Bolshevik hat.

DETROIT—(FP)—Workers in the Motors Products Co. in Detroit are making as low as $1.25 for a 10-hour day. This is done by returning work done on a piece-work rate as "unfinished". Many workers have left their jobs as this system enters its fourth week.

TROTSKY

The writings of L. D. Trotsky are the richest and most fruitful contributions being made to the labor and revolutionary movements today. There is not a problem that great Bolshevik touches which is not immediately illuminated in all its aspect. And the problems he deals with concern the most vital interests of the whole movement.

The international labor and Communist movements are in a critical situation. Never has the need for clarity been so urgent as it is today. Never has the need for straight Marxist thinking been so pressing. Nobody is doing more in this field than Trotsky.

The situation in the Soviet Union, the fountain-head of the revolutionary movement today, which offers so many complexities to the average observer, is made clear and understandable by Trotsky's writings. In fact, the course of events in the Soviet Union and the Russian Communist Party can be evaluated properly only by a reading of the works of the Russian Opposition which Trotsky speaks for and leads.

In the United States, Trotsky's writing appear regularly in the Militant. Just as the first writings of Lenin in this country became a mighty instrument for the molding of the revolutionary movement years ago, the writings of Trotsky now are playing the same role in the movement at a different stage.

Among the articles by Trotsky that have appeared in the Militant recently are: Disarmament and the United States of Europe. Syndicalism and Communism. The Austrian Crisis and Communism. Who is Leading the Communist International? What is Happening in China? Twelve years of the Russian Revolution. The Defense of the Soviet Union and the Opposition. Etc. Etc. No active worker can afford to be without these contributions which appear only in the Militant.

In 1930, the Militant plans to continue the publication of Trotsky's writing, which will include some of the most brilliant work he has yet done in the course of his years in the revolutionary movement. The best way to insure getting these copies of the Militant regularly, is to subscribe for a year. A yearly subscription is $2.00 or $1.00 for six months.

The Struggle for the South

Green's Pleas to the Bosses, the Progressives and the Communists

By James P. Cannon

The theses of the unlucky leaders of the Communist Party nowadays seem to be written in order that events may speedily refute them. Such is the fate of the Foster revelation of a year ago regarding the "decline of the A. F. of L." The formal opening of the A. F. of L. campaign in the South brushes this theory into the discard, while, incidentally, it confirms all that we said in the subject in our Platform (The Militant, 2-15-1929).

The conference at Charlotte, N. C., was staged on a scale designed to attract the maximum of attention, and the resources placed at the disposal of the United Textile Workers ought to remove all doubt that the reactionary McMahon organization henceforth will contest the field with the Communists far more aggressively than was the case in the year just passed, which marked the entrance of the National Textile Workers Union into the South. The Federated Press dispatch of January 16, states that 15 organizers have been assigned to the work of organizing the Southern cotton mill workers into the U. T. W. and that 25 will be in the field in the near future. Along with this goes the announcement of imposing financial support to the campaign. Discounting much of this as typical promotion talk, the entry of the A. F. of L. as a real contender in the Southern labor situation remains a clearly established fact which none but fools can deny.

The A. F. of L. Program

In all the preparations for their campaign in the South the reactionaries run true to form as "the labor lieutenants of the capitalist class," as DeLeon called them many years ago. Peaceful partnership with the bosses and war to the knife on the workers' vanguard—the sword and shield of labor reaction—is the undisguised program, as frankly proclaimed at the Charlotte conference. "No strikes are to be called," is the promise to the exploiters of labor by Thomas F. McMahon, president of the U. T. W., and "give us a trial" is the supplementary plea of William Green, in the name of the A. F. of L. Coupled with this supplication to the bosses to give them a chance to "be of service" is the inevitable declaration of war on the Communists. "There will be a never-ending conflict between the American Federation of Labor and these destructive people," is the pledge made in Green's speech at the conference, reported in the New York Times (1-7-1930).

The whole strategy of the reactionaries is elucidated here: To make their appeal to the employers and offer them a safe alternative to the Left wing unions.

In all this there is nothing new, much as it may surprise the ignoramuses who explain this—and all other—phenomena by the newly baked theory of "social-fascism". In offering itself as a strike-breaker and bulwark against radicalism, the United Textile Workers is repeating its own inglorious role of the past. During the Lawrence strike of 1912 it made a contract with the mill owners and attempted to stampede the strikers back to work on the bosses' terms—a maneuver exposed and defeated by the militant I. W. W. It did the same thing in the Paterson strike of 1914, coming in at the height of the strike and openly conspiring with the bosses and police to break it. Such instances in the American labor movement are innumerable. They can be found in every field where labor militants have come to the front as the organizers of the workers. Even today's strike of the Amalgamated Food Workers in New York against restaurants "signed up" with the A. F. of L. union is an old story. The writer recalls an identical situation in Minneapolis in 1914 when I. W. W. restaurant workers on strike were confronted one morning with a card in the window proclaiming the establishment to be a "union house". The theory of "social fascism" is not necessary to explain the A. F. of L. campaign of treachery in the South to anyone who knows the A. B. C. of American labor history and the role of the "labor lieutenants" of the bosses. This hare-brained theory serves no purpose except to muddle and confuse the workers and thus, in its objective consequences, to weaken them in their fight.

in the South? They are playing a characteristic one which gives the honest progressive worker a good opportunity to compare their words with their deeds and to judge them accordingly. In a New Year's manifesto, A. J. Muste, the head of the C. P. L. A., called for "militancy, determination and idealism" in the labor movement and predicted: "The year 1930 will be a year of strikes and of renewed aggressiveness on the part of the American workers." These are the words, and they are fair ones. What of the deeds? Several C. P. L. A. leaders are assigned as organizers in the A. F. of L. campaign with its pledge of "no strikes" and its war to the knife on the Left wing exponents of "militancy, determination and idealism" in the labor movement.

The C. P. L. A. people are playing the role of come-ons for the labor fakers. They were present at the Charlotte conference but the reports contain no reference to any protest on their part against the reactionary program. One of the committee of three appointed by Green to direct the campaign is Paul Smith, who is not unknown to the "progressives" of the West. His sole occupation as the A. F. of L. "organizer" for several years has been to break up Central Labor bodies tainted with signs of "militancy, determination and idealism". The Central Labor Councils of Detroit, Seattle, Minneapolis, Great Falls and other cities which supported some of the planks in the C. P. L. A. program know him for this work and for no other. The Federated Press release for January 8 says "Smith...is regarded as a policy man within the A. F. of L." You bet he is. His policy is reaction, and it will govern the campaign as everybody knows. The "progressives" will work under him and according to his policy.

The Bosses' Program and the A. F. of L. Program

The A. F. of L. chiefs want to serve the interests of the employers but they are not the same as the employers and their programs at the moment are not identical. If one is to understand the labor situation in the South it is necessary to see this important differentiation, much as it conflicts with the dogma of "social fascism". The Southern bosses are not yet ready to accept the A. F. of L. as an alternative to Left wing unionism. They are determined to fight it also as they did at Marion. They want no union at all. The mill owners' press greeted the Charlotte conference with full page advertisements against all labor organizations, citing the case of "ruined Massachusetts" where unionism is alleged to exist. From this conflict of programs great struggles may arise despite the wishes of the A. F. of L. leaders and their program of "no strikes". Even if the reactionaries succeed in temporarily defeating the Left wing union the issue will be by no means settled. It is quite possible that the struggle between the Right and Left for the leadership of the workers will take other forms than those indicated at the moment. The clearer this is seen the better will be the safeguards against pessimism and panic in the event of a temporary defeat of the Left union.

Under the present conditions, the center of gravity lies in the head-on fight between the rival unions—the reactionary U. T. W. and the Left wing N. T. W.—for the support of the workers. The support of the N. T. W. is the first duty of the class conscious workers. This applies not only to the Southern textile workers but to the proletarian vanguard throughout the country; the textile workers cannot be organized against the bosses and the A. F. of L. without the help of the entire American movement of militant labor. Of what should this support consist? Well, first of all it should be to try to understand the whole situation and then to tell the truth about it. This is the way a Communist approaches every problem of the class struggle. The robot like support of everything said and done in the name of the Left wing union regardless of its wisdom or its folly; the craven acquiescence in false policy which throw the new union off the track; the treacherous silence of accomplices in factional disruption which plays the game of the mill owners and the labor fakers—all this is the business of soulless functionaries who have lost sight of the interests of the workers. Communist revolutionaries will scornfully reject these criteria of "support" which are designed only to shield the Foster wrecking crew from accountability to the workers.

Mistakes of the Party Leaders

The Party leaders, by false policies and by factional juggling of the most criminal kind, have laid heavy handicaps on the National Textile Workers Union, and are sending it into the great contest weakened and ill-prepared. They threw away the great opportunity to dramatize the Southern struggle around the Gastonia case and to mobilize all the best forces of the working class for the support of the N. T. W. By abandoning the historic struggle of American labor against the frame-up system they lost the chance to line up the Northern workers and they cleared the way for multiplied persecution in the future—one of the greatest obstacles to the organization of the Southern textile workers.

Their failure to employ united front tactics of approach to the Marion strikers and to link this situation up in a national agitation with the Gastonia fight was likewise a costly blunder. The striking workers of Marion who were shot down on the picket line belong to us; it is thanks only to the multiplied bungling of the party bureaucrats that McMahon and Co. are enabled to wave the tradition of Marion as a banner for their reactionary campaign.

On the organization side the Foster leadership has no less to account for. Considering the great historical importance of the struggle in the South and the immensity of the task the organizing force and the financial support assigned to it were ridiculously inadequate; and the constant juggling and shifting of forces, dictated, as a rule, by party factional exigencies, greatly hampered the campaign. These mistakes of the past might be passed by if there were signs of change and improvement; but this, unfortunately, is not the case. The latest exploits of the Party bosses in the N. T. W. are blows against its future.

The Removal of Weisbord

The principal achievement of the recent convention of the N. T. W. was the elimination of the three former officials—Weisbord, Keller and Dawson, who, it is reported, are tainted more or less with Lovestonism—of carrying over one might say, the official Comintern line of 1928 into the year 1929. So far as the Lovestone clique of leaders is concerned, we have recorded our opinions fully and adequately many times, and not since yesterday. We need not repeat these opinions here except to remark that everything to be found in the Party campaign against them which has political complexion and substance is borrowed almost literally from material written by us long ago when the present leaders of the Party were united with them like a band of brothers in the war against "Trotskyism", i. e. against the fundamental teachings of Marx and Lenin. The task of educating the Communist vanguard in the ideological struggle against the petty-bourgeois theories and practices of Lovestone, Wolfe and Co. is one we have not shirked in the past and will not shirk in the future.

But this educational work will be hindered and not advanced by the arbitrary removal of their adherents from the Left wing unions. Such a course will have far-reaching consequences, leading to the disruption of the unions—or their transformation into impotent sects, which amounts to the same thing, and we declare emphatically against it.

The "victories" of the Party caucus do not pass unnoticed either by the workers or their enemies. The masses of the textile workers who saw in Weisbord the organizer of the great Passaic strike, the symbol of their aspiration for militant organization will not be enthused by his removal for purely party reasons.

Labor leaders, able to arouse and organize the masses, are not manufactured so easily in a Party caucus or a caucus bound convention. To his faults, many and serious, we have never been blind; we had occasion to speak of them more than once when he was being artificially, and quite disgustingly, promoted and advertised like Barnum's white elephant. The elements of the careerist intellectual in him, which determined his affinity for the Lovestone faction, were as plain as a pike-staff and these odious traits were stimulated by his factional exploitation during the Lovestone regime in the Party.

But in throwing Weisbord aside without any serious or valid reasons, the Party

Prospect Bad for Builders

By T. P. LEWIS

CHICAGO—(FP)—Now that the data is available, building trades workers can size up the prospects for work and organization in the industry for the coming year. The first, work, depends on both the volume of building to be done and the technical advances in construction. The outlook is bad. With regard to organization and union demands, the ensuing year will in all probability see many struggles between associations of employers intent on doing away with what they term "prosperity" working conditions and building unions loath to give up the advantages won during the past eight booming years.

Peak Reached in 1928

The outstanding characteristic of the industry from the point of view of the worker in overalls is and probably will continue to be throughout the year, a dearth of jobs. The present slackness in employment is much more than the usual winter layoff. The all-time peak of building production was reached in May, 1928. From that peak to the following February, 1929, the drop in building activity was 44%. In Oct. 1, 1929, when the stock market crash occurred contracts awarded had already been declining for 17 months.

December 1929 was the lowest December recorded in the records of a statistical organization operating in the 37 Eastern states for all time. Almost the entire drop is in the residential section. In fact, non-residential construction as a whole showed an increase of 4% in 1929 over 1928. It was mainly the booming condition of residential building which includes apartments that gave jobs to so many workers.

The advancing technique of construction has wiped out many jobs. High building costs in 1929 were an incentive to speed-up, both directly as noticed and complained about by many union workers, and in new methods. Here are a few examples of expedited construction: In Mississippi a 22-story reinforced concrete structure was placed in seven weeks. The merchandise mart in Chicago, the world's largest building, was the scene of the most comprehensive assemblage of building equipment ever brought together. Cement was distributed pneumatically and concrete was placed by conveyors. New developments in scaffold erection and high-speed hoists have materially cut down on time.

Burden Workers with Losses

Grumbling about high wages is already heard in boss circles. In spite of professional optimists paid by trade journals or hired by the bosses' organizations to spread good cheer, the employer knows 1930 will be a lean year in the building industry. He saw his profits cut in 1929 and is preparing to pass some of his losses on to the workers, forgetting the fabulous profits that in the main have made seven fat years for him.

NEW YORK—(FP)—Exploitation of child workers as young as 10 in scallop sheds along the southern shore of Long Island is under attack. The children await the arrival of the scallop fisherman late in the afternoon and work on the docks of in badly ventilated board shacks until late in the evening shelling and packing the scallops. Paid by the gallon, they rarely earn as much as $2 a day.

manipulators are discarding a valuable and necessary force in the struggle to organize the textile workers against the mill owners and the A. F. of L. reactionaries.

But the harmful effects of these latest removals go deeper than the question of the individuals involved. It is another advertisement to the world that the Foster bureaucrats demand a hand-picked administration of yes-men in the unions under their control and that no dissenting opinions will be tolerated. A persistence in this course over a long enough period will seal the doom of the Left wing unions as mass organizations and give the game to the exploiters and their labor agents. This course is today a cancer eating the vitals of the N. T. W. The struggle for a correct line of policy and a drastic reformation of administrative methods is a pressing duty of Communist workers, in the North as well as in the South, who want to give real support to the National Textile Workers Union.

The «Third Period» of the Comintern's Mistakes

What is Radicalization of the Masses?

By L. D. Trotsky

The radicalization of the masses for the Comintern has become, at present, a bare catechism and not the characterization of a process. Genuine Communists—teaches l'Humanité—should recognize the leading role of the party and the radicalization of the masses. It is meaningless to put the question that way. The leading role of the party is an unshaken principle for every Communist. Who does not follow it can be an anarchist or a confusionist, but not a Communist, that is, a proletarian revolutionist. But radicalization itself is not a principle, but only a characterization of a state of the masses. Is this characterization correct or is it not correct for the given period? That is a question of fact. In order to estimate seriously the state of the masses, correct criteria are necessary. What is radicalization? How does it express itself? What are its characteristics? With what tempo and in which direction does it develop? The deplorable leadership of the French Communist party does not even pose these questions. At most an official article or a speech will refer to the growth of strikes. But even there only bare figures are given, without serious analysis, without even a simple comparison with the ones of the preceding years.

Such an attitude to the question follows not only from the unfortunate decisions of the Tenth Plenum of the E. C. C. I. but, as a matter of fact from the very program of the Comintern. It speaks of the radicalization of the masses as a continuous process. It believes: today the mass is more revolutionary than it was yesterday, and tomorrow it will be more revolutionary than it is today. Such a mechanical idea does not correspond with the real process of development of the proletariat and of capitalist society as a whole. But does correspond, as perfectly as possible, with the mentality of the Cachins, Monmousseaus and the other frightened opportunists.

The social democratic parties, especially before the war, had imagined the future as a continual growth of social democratic votes, which will grow till it comes to the very moment of the complete possession of power. For a vulgar or pretended evolutionary this perspective still remains, essentially, its force, only instead of continuous growth of votes, he talks of the continual radicalization of the masses. This mechanical conception is sanctioned also by the Bucharin-Stalin program of the Comintern. It goes without saying that from the point of view of our epoch as a whole the development of the proletariat goes in the direction of the revolution. But this is not at all a straight process, just as the objective process of the sharpening of capitalist antagonism is not straight. The reformists see only the ups of the capitalist road. The formal "revolutionists" see only its downs. But a Marxist sees the line as a whole, with all its conjunctural rises and declines, without for a moment losing sight of its main direction—to the catastrophes of wars, to the outburst of revolutions.

The political feelings of the proletariat are far from changing automatically in one and the same direction. The rising of the class struggle are followed by its fallings, the flood-tides by the ebbs, depending upon complicated combinations of material and ideological conditions, internal and international. The activity of the masses, if not utilized at the right moment, or used wrong, goes to its opposite and ends in a period of decline, from which the masses recover faster or slower, again due to the influence of new objective stimuli. The characteristic of our epoch is the especially sharp changes of different periods, the extraordinary abrupt turns in the situation and this puts upon the leadership unusual obligations in the matter of correct orientation.

The activity of the masses, even when it is quite correctly ascertained, may have different expressions depending upon different conditions. The mass may, at certain periods, be completely absorbed in an economic struggle, and show very little interest in political questions. On the other hand, suffering from a series of failures on the field of the economic struggle, the mass may abruptly transfer its attention to the realm of politics. But here too—depending upon a series of conditions and on the experience with which a mass entered these conditions—its political activity may go either by the purely parliamentary way or by way of extra-parliamentary struggle.

We take only a very few examples, which characterize the contradictions of the revolutionary development of the proletariat. Those who know how to follow facts and understand their meaning, will admit without difficulty that the variations traced above are not some kind of theoretical combination but an expression of the living international experience of the last decade.

In any case, it is clear from what has been said that when the radicalization of the masses is being discussed, a concrete definition of it should be demanded. The Marxist Opposition should, of course, put the same demand to itself. A bare denial of radicalization brings just as little as its complete affirmation. We should have an estimate of that which is and of that which is becoming.

The Strike Curve in France

The official leaders speak of the radicalization of the French working class almost exclusively in connection with the strike movement. The growth of the latter is an incontestable fact, systematically established. We will take this fact as a starting point.

The official statistic of strikes in France are always extraordinarily late. The last report of the Ministry of Labor on strikes ends with the year 1925. For 1926 I have not data at my disposal. For the next three years there is the data of the Communist press. There is absolutely no doubt that the figures taken from the two sources mentioned are incommensurable. It is doubtful if the Ministry of Labor registers all strikes with the necessary completeness. On the other hand, the superficial "revolutionists" of l'Humanité have an obvious tendency to give exaggerated data. But in spite of that the general tendency of the movement comes out clearly enough.

The strike movement in France reached its highest point in the first two years after the war. In 1919, 2,100 strikes took place in which 1,200,000 workers participated. In 1920, there were 1,900 strikes, in which almost 1,500,000 workers were involved. As to the number of strikers, this is the year of its high point. With the year 1921 there begins—with one small exception which will be mentioned later—a systematic decline, which reaches its lowest point in the years 1926-27. Here are the figures in round numbers: 1921: 450,000 strikers, that is, one-third of the number in the preceding year. In 1922: 300,000 strikers. Only in 1923 does the curve not decline but even rises slightly and shows 365,000 strikers. This episodic rise was undoubtedly due to the events connected with the occupation of the Ruhr and the revolutionary movement in Germany. In 1924, the number of strikers goes down to 275,000. For 1926, as already said, we have no data. For 1927 we have only the total number of strikes: there were only 230 of them, while in the years 1919-1925 the number of strikes varied between 570 and 2,100. Although the number of strikes is a rather crude index, still it does not leave room for doubt that the curve of strikes continued, in general, to fall, beginning from 1921 and including 1927. In the last quarter of 1927, there were 93 strikes with 70,000 strikers. Supposing that the number of strikes was the same on the average during the whole year, (an obviously arbitrary supposition), we will have approximately 170,000 for 1927, a number which is exaggerated rather than understated.

In 1928, the Communist press counts about 800 strikes, about 600 of which belong to the second half of the year, with 363,000 participants. Consequently it is possible to adopt, for the whole year of 1928, a hypothesis of 400,000 to 450,000 strikers. The same press shows 1,200 strikes for 1929 with approximately the same number of participants as in 1928 (that is, 400,000 to 450,000). Thus, in comparison with the preceding year there is no rise. The number of strikers in 1928, as also in 1929, is about twice as big as in 1925. It is nearly the same as the number of strikers in 1921. It is three to three and a half times less than in 1920.

All these figures, as has already been noted above, do not pretend to be absolutely exact, but they are enough to define the dynamics of the process. After the high point of strikes in 1919-20, the diminishing progression takes place until 1923, with a very small break in 1923. In the years of 1928-29 we observe an unmistakable, and, what is more, a considerable increase of the strike movement, connected it is not hard to understand—it will be shown further on—with the rise in industry under the influence of the stabilization of the currency.

We can say with perfect confidence that the period of 1919-27 forms a certain independent cycle in the life of the French proletariat, including the cyclonic rise of the strike movement immediately after the war, as well as its defeats and its decline especially acute after the catastrophe in Germany in 1923. In the most general of its aspects this cycle is characteristic not only of France alone, but of the whole of Europe, and in considerable degree, the whole world. What is characteristic of France as such is the comparatively moderate extent of fluctuation between the highest and lowest points of the cycle: victorious France did not go through a genuine revolutionary crisis. In the rhythm of the French strike movement the gigantic events developing in Russia, Germany, England, and other countries found only a weakened reflection.

The same tendencies of the strike movement of the French workers are indicated by other data. The number of strikers and the number of days of each strike, fell sharply beginning with the year 1922. In 1921 each strike had an average of 800 strikers and lasted more than 14,000 days. In 1925 each strike already had less than 300 strikers and a little more than 2,000 days. We can assume that in 1926-27, these averages did not in any case, grow bigger. In 1929, we already have 400 men per strike.

We shall note another important index, which we shall need later. In the post-war years, the first place among the strikers belonging mainly to the miners the last two years, the first place is occupied by the textile workers and, in general, by the so-called light industry.

What do the Data of the Statistics Show?

Do they confirm the thesis of the radicalization of the masses or do they refute it? First of all, we answer, it takes it out of the realm of abstractions in which Monmousseau says Yes and Chambelland says No, without giving any definition of what is meant by radicalization. The data of the strike struggle given above are indisputable proof of certain moves in the working class. At the same time, they give a very important estimate of the number and quality of these moves. They outline the general dynamics of the process and make it possible, to a certain degree to anticipate the tomorrow, or more exactly, the possible variations of the tomorrow.

In the first place, we can affirm that the data for 1928-29, compared with the preceding period, characterize the beginning of a new cycle in the life of the French proletariat. They give us the right to assume that deep molecular processes have taken and are taking place in the masses, as a result of which the inert force of the decline begins—if only on the economic front for the present—to be overcome.

Nevertheless, the same data show that the growth of the strike movement is still very modest, and does not in the least give a picture of a tempestuous overflow, which would allow us to draw conclusions about a revolutionary or at least a pre-revolutionary period. In particular, there is no marked difference between 1928 and 1929. In the front rank of the strike movement, there still stand, as was mentioned above, only the establishments of light industry. From this fact, Chambelland comes to a general conclusion against radicalization. It would be a different matter, he says, if strikes were taking hold of the large enterprises in heavy industry and the machine shops. In other words, he imagines that radicalization falls from the sky ready made. As a matter of fact these figures testify not only that the new cycle of proletarian struggle has begun, but also that this cycle is now only passing through its first stage. After defeat and decline, a revival, in the absence of any great events, could only start in no other way than from the industrial periphery, that is, from the light industries, from the secondary branches, from the smaller establishments of heavy industry. The transfer of the strike movement into the metal industry, machine shops, and transportation, would mean its transition to a higher stage of development, and would signify not only the symptoms of the beginning of a movement but the fact of a decisive break in the mood of the working class. It has not come yet. But it would be absurd to shut our eyes to the first stage of the movement only because the second has not begun yet or the third, or the fourth. Pregnancy even in its second month is pregnancy. To force it may lead to a miscarriage. But it is possible to arrive at the same result by ignoring it. It may be well, though, to add to this analogy that in the social realm dates are by no means as stable as in the realm of physiology.

Facts and Phrases

In discussing the question of the radicalization of the masses, it should not for a moment be forgotten that the proletariat attains its "monolithism" only in periods of the highest revolutionary flood tide. In the conditions of "every day life" in capitalist society, the proletariat is far from being homogeneous. Moreover, the heterogeneity of its layers manifests itself most acutely precisely at the turning points in the road. The most exploited, the least skilled, or the politically most backward layers of the proletariat are frequently the first to enter the arena of struggle, and, in case of failure, are often the first to desert it. It is exactly in the new period that those groups which did not suffer defeats in the preceding period are easily attracted to the movement, if only because they did not generally take part in big fights. In one way or another, these phenomena are bound to appear also in France.

The same fact is shown by the indissolution of the organized French workers which is pointed out by the official Communist press. Yes, the organized workers have their inhibitions too well developed. Considering themselves an insignificant part of the proletariat the organized are often apt to play a conservative role. It is not, of course, an argument against organization, but an argument against its weaknesses, and an argument against those trade union leaders of the type of Monmousseau, who do not understand the nature of trade union organization and are not able to guarantee it a proper place in the working class. But, in any case, for the given moment the vanguard role of the unorganized testifies that the question is not as yet about a revolutionary, but about a joint-economic struggle, and that, moreover, in its elementary stage.

The same thing is demonstrated by the important role of the foreign born workers in the strike struggle, who—by the way—will in the future play in France a part analogous to that of the Negroes in the United States. But that is in the future. At present, the part played in strikes by the foreigners who often do not know the language, is another proof of the fact that it is not a question of political but economic struggle, to which an impetus has been given by the change in the economic conjuncture.

Even in relation to the purely economic front, one cannot speak of the offensive character of the struggle, as Monmousseau and company do. They base this definition on the fact that a considerable percentage of the strikes are conducted in the name of increased wages. The thoughtful leaders forget that such a form of demands is forced upon the workers on the one hand by the rise of prices

The New Udrzal Government in Czecho-Slovakia

After six weeks of laborious combinations, the new government has now been formed. The government chief, Udrzal, is an Agrarian, his party (the strongest) has four ministers in the new cabinet. The other ministries are divided among the following parties: Czech Social Democrats, 3; Czech National-Socialists, 3; 1 ministry each to the following parties: Czech National Democracy, German Agrarians, Czech Industrial, Czech Clericals, German Social Democrats. The ministry of finance is allotted to a "non-Partisan".

Thus, eight parties participated in the new government. They unite more than 5 million votes; the parties outside of the government (Czech and German Fascists, German Nationalists, Hlinka, German and Hungarian Christian Socialists, Communists) have about 2,300,000 votes.

The new international-bourgeois-socialist coalition therefore has a strong majority. It also calls itself the Concentration Cabinet. The former national-bourgeois-socialist coalition showed themselves to be too narrow. The birth of the new government was a hard one. The old basis of democracy no longer suffices and the social democracy, in the role of a liberal party has to save bourgeois democracy. This is a sign of weakness in the politics of the in food products, and on the other by the intensified physical exploitation of the worker as a result of new industrial methods (rationalization). A workman is compelled to demand an increase in his nominal wages in order to defend his standard of living of yesterday. These strikes can have an "offensive" character only from the standpoint of capitalist bookkeeping. From the standpoint of trade union policies they have a purely defensive character. It is precisely this side of the question that every serious trade unionist should have clearly understood and brought to the forefront by every means. But Monmousseau and company believe they have a right to be good-for-nothing trade unionists because they are, if you please, "revolutionary leaders". Shouting till they are hoarse about the offensive, political and revolutionary character of purely defensive strikes, they do not of course, change the nature of these strikes and do not increase their significance by a single inch. But on the other hand, they do their best to arm the bosses and the government against the workers.

It does not improve matters when our "leaders" point out that the strikes become "political" on account of . . . the active role of the police. An astounding argument! The beating up of strikers by policemen is designated . . . a revolutionary advance of the workers. The history of France knows quite a few massacres of workers in purely economic strikes. In the United States, a bloody settlement with strikers is the rule. Does this mean that the workers in the United States are leading the most revolutionary struggle? The shooting of strikers has in itself, of course, a political significance. But only a loud-mouth could identify it with the revolutionary political advance of the working masses—thus unconsciously playing the hand of the bosses and their police.

When the British General Council of Trade Unions represented the revolutionary strike of 1926 as a peaceful demonstration, it knew what it was doing: that was a deliberately planned betrayal. But when Monmousseau and company represent scattered economic strikes as a revolutionary attack on the bourgeois state, nobody will think of accusing them of a deliberate betrayal: it is doubtful of these people can act with deliberation. But it is certainly no help to the workers.

In the next article we will see how these terribly revolutionary heroes render some other services to the bosses, ignoring the rise of commerce and industry, underestimating its significance, that is, underestimating the profits of the capitalists—and by the same token undermining the foundation of the economic struggles of the workers.

All this is done, of course, to the glory of the "third period".

Prague, December 18, 1929

bourgeoisie. It is compelled to confide to the social democracy the safeguarding of its profit interests. The social democracy assumes the task of appeasing the masses aroused by the crises. Without the reformists it would hardly be possible to form a parliamentary government. At the same time, however, it shows the strength of the bourgeoisie and the weakness of the proletarian party (the Communist) when the bourgeois parties could permit themselves to carry on coalition skirmishes for six weeks without the combinatory idyl being destroyed by the proletariat.

What is the background of the new government formation and where are its perspectives?

The Czecho-Slovak bourgeoisie has an industrial crisis to overcome. Politically, this was expressed among other things, by its loss of the confidence of substantial masses and that it now required the reformists in order to establish the political equilibrium. But it utilizes the reformists without qualms for it has nothing to fear from them. On the contrary, they will assist it in surmounting the industrial crisis.

Φ

The economic situation is far from cheerful. The expansion of American capital in Europe, the concentration and rationalization measures in North America (for the overcoming of the crisis there) evokes crises in Europe. Germany and the other European states, supplanted by American capital, are sharpening the competition in Europe. Characteristic is the passive balance of trade of Czecho-Slovakia with Germany in September, the smallest total of foreign trade as a whole in comparison with the previous year. The largest figures of Czecho-Slovakia are shown by its foreign trade with Germany, Austria, Poland, England, Hungary, Rumania and Jugo-Slavia. In most of these countries the expansion of the Czech republic seems to be checked. In comparison with the previous year, the export of textiles fell 6 percent, leather goods, 4 percent, fruits and vegetables 27 percent. Other manifestations of a crisis are also plainly observable. There is a weakening of demand for money and a decline in industrial activity to record. The curve of industrial stocks is on the downgrade. The wholesale trade indices are included in the decline. Besides the sinking of the living standard index, a falling consuming power of the agricultural population is to be noted. In the metal industry, there are numerous discharges of workers; in building, there is a strong decline, although there was very favorable weather for it in the Autumn. There is a weakening of production in the chemical, wood, and leather industries. A falling off in orders in the glass industry from the U. S. A. is to be recorded.

The principal consequences are: increase in unemployment, insolvencies, revenue friction.

It is clear that there is no final solution for these problems of the Czech republic on a national scale. The manifestations of a crisis can temporarily be ameliorated at the expense of the working class and the petty bourgeois sections, but the development of the productive forces of the republic, just like in the other countries, is hopelessly checked by the many national boundaries of Europe. The figures for exports to Germany, England, Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Jugo-Slavia give a clear picture of that. The bourgeoisie makes convulsive efforts to insure its profits: Trustification of the textile industry, rationalization, tax pressure on the urban and rural masses, all this is to make possible competition on the European markets. But it is precisely the profit economy that narrows the market possibilities internally and externally, crises arise which counterpose the hungry unemployed and the pinched masses to finance capital.

National boundaries are an expression of the interests of the profit economy of the financial groups of the country concerned, and the abolition of the limits and boundaries is equivalent to the suppression of the capitalists, that is, the proletarian revolution.

Only the United Soviet States of Europe can eliminate the chaos and misery in Europe.

The bourgeoisie exerts its political domination over the decisive proletarian class in the Czech republic, which can carry out this revolution, through the reformists. The domination of the bourgeoisie in modern Europe is possible only through the isolation of the Communists from the oppressed sections and from the proletariat. If a genuine Left turn in the leadership of the Communist Parties does not take place within a short time and a Marxist direction established in the whole Comintern, then Europe is condemned to a further vegetation. The counter-revolution will continue its march in Europe and raise its head in Soviet Russia.

The student riots in the Prague universities, which took place under the leadership of the fascists, show the perspective. The reformists, who have four ministers in the government, will have to take a position on questions like unemployment, reparations (which signify a new tax burden on the people), crisis in agriculture, tenant protection, etc. They will of course not solve them in the interests of the working population.

It was only in the second session of parliament on December 13 that the new government came to a reading of its programmatic declaration. The fact that this was introduced only at the second session, and its general lack of concreteness, shows how difficult it is for the government to speak of its future, practical measures for surmounting the crisis.

Φ

Yet, a capitalist government shows its face even in its general declarations.

The government promises to overcome the industrial worries by a collaboration of the parties in the interest of the state. That is, of the capitalist state, whose interests are antagonistic to those of the toiling population. The government promises to defend the national economic interests of the capitalist state as a whole and its position on the international front, which means in other words, to sharpen capitalist rationalization in order to appear capable of competition on the markets and to conduct the eventual war conflicts that arise out of the nature of these affairs with sword in hand. In this connection, the declaration assures that the government will devote thorough attention to the security of the defense of the state. In the question of reparations, the government promises to yield as much as possible.

This then is the program of this new government of finance capital. It is noteworthy that the chairman of the house of deputies has been entrusted to the Agrarians, that of the senate to the social democrats. In the first and second sessions, the newly-elected Communist deputies carried through a technical obstruction. The government proceeded to its first "action": All the Communist deputies present were excluded for 10 sessions and a month's wages withdrawn from each of them. It is too bad that the party leadership of the C. P. C-S. takes no steps to expose the meaning of the democratic acts of violence of the new government in mass meetings. This fact may be traced to the isolation and theoretical untenability of the present Centrist leadership.

The Communist Party has the task of drawing the dissatisfaction of the masses into a revolutionary path through a correct mass policy. But the leadership of the C. P. C-S. has no clear perspective.

In its central organ, Rude Pravo (12-13-1929) an appeal to all the trade union, political, sport and cultural organizations of the proletariat, to the whole conscious working class of the republic, is issued in which we read the following:

"The five-year industrial plan is an achievement that humanity has never before seen. Through this plan, the Russian proletariat wants to reach and surpass the highest industrially developed states of the world (?) abolish the last remnants (?) of capitalism, and erect (?) the socialist society."

Thus, through the five year plan the Russian proletariat is to surpass the most highly developed capitalist world. This five year plan is to abolish the last remnants of capitalism and erect the socialist society.

What hinders this idyllic construction of socialism? Perhaps the economic isolation, the international division of labor which requires the extension of the proletarian revolution in Europe, the United Soviet States of Europe? Not a trace! The appeal says:

"But the capitalists outside and inside Soviet Russia are striving with all means to make impossible the carrying out of this plan. They provoke the Russian proletariat and its government and want to pull them into war conflicts."

Φ

The idea consequently prevails in the appeal that if the bourgeoisie does not force a war, the five year plan will build up socialism in Russia, that is, in one country.

Is this perhaps ignorance or shameful stupidity? No, it more than that, it is reformism, it is the theory of socialism in one country.

This appeal was signed by 16 organizations under Communist influence and the Party Central Committee itself.

It is difficult to expect a Marxist position from such a leadership in all questions of the mass struggle (courageous leadership, preparation for surprising turns, correct trade union, peasant, national policy, questions of democracy, fascism, etc.)

The petty bourgeoisie, (middle peasants, officials) is showing a proletarianization in the Czech, German, and especially in the Slovakian sections. The proletarian and semi-proletarian class is growing. The enslavement of the exploited takes place through all the parties. The dissatisfied masses swing between democracy and fascism, which contain all the species of clericalism (Catholicism, reformed church, anti-semitism), Nationalism (Masarykism), humanism, pacifism, reformism, defense of the fatherland, irredentism, etc.

Communism is confronted with the task of finally finding a way out. Otherwise, Europe remains the home of convulsive crises, barbaric misery and war.

Fascism Still Alive in United States

NEW YORK — (FP) — That Mussolini was only kidding the U. S. when his black shirt ruffians recently announced the dissolution of their Fascist League of America is now definitely proved by activities and utterances from official Fascist sources in this city.

"American Fascism is more alive than ever," screeches Il Grido della Stirpe, (The Yell of the Race) Italian language newspaper published in New York as the official organ of Fascism in America. It tacks this statement onto the same headline in which it announced that the Fascist League is no more.

Dissolution of the official black shirt band only means that in the future "Fascism will be stronger, better armed, more effective, and if necessary more violent in all parts of America," Il Grido goes on to explain. Finally, it says, Fascism in America "will be ready to defend itself against attack others with words, the press, and fists".

Anti-Fascist leaders point to the ceaseless activity of scores of Italian consulates throughout the country as centers for spying, intimidation, and Fascist propaganda. Italian consuls, among other things are taking a systematic census of Italian Americans, especially wage workers. Pressure is brought to bare on these people—American citizens as well as Italian subjects—to reveal their trade, their place of employment, the number of persons in their families and other information.

Finally, there is the Italian Historian Society, a cover organization for the same bunch of terrorists which ran the deccase Fascist League. Its secretary is Harold Lord Varney, renegade I. W. W. who sold out to the bosses and renounced the labor and all its works 15 years ago. Since then he has been busy shocking timid gathering time stories about the horrible reds—at a much per shock.

But to this day I have been unable to find in the papers of the Leninbund any echo of the discussion in the organization. The editors of Die Fahne des Kommunismus made a one-sided selection of ultra-Leftist articles from foreign Opposition papers, making the ridiculous article of the "Korschist" sympathizer the basis for the discussion. The editors themselves stood on the side, waiting to find what would come out of it all. In spite of the exceptional acuteness with which the problem was posed, Urbahns lost week after week, limiting himself to reprinting foreign articles directed against the Marxist point of view. Only after my article, that is, six weeks after the beginning of the conflict in the Far East, did the editors of Die Fahne judge the moment opportune to express themselves. But even then they took their time. A short article divided into two parts. The political conclusions are again put off to the following week. Why? Perhaps to make room for Radek's calumniations against the Russian Opposition that appeared in the same number? Then what was the line of the Leninbund on the most important question of international policy in the course of these six weeks? No one knows.

That won't do. Such methods weaken the Leninbund and render the best service not only to Thaelmann but to Brandler.

For him who knows the history of the Russian Opposition, it is clear that Urbahns expresses in an embarrassed manner the very opinions that the Stalinists have so perfidiously and with such bad faith attributed to the Opposition. Dishonestly concealing our documents from the workers, the Stalinists tirelessly repeated and printed it in tens of millions of copies, that the Opposition considers the October revolution lost, Thermidor accomplished, and that it is directing its course towards bourgeois democracy. It is beyond question of doubt that Stalin's successes in the organization were in no small measure assured by the incessant spreading of this lie. But how great must be the stupefaction, and with it also the indignation, of the Russian Opposition when they find in the publications of the Leninbund, in a concealed form, this friendly counsel: Take the road that Stalinists have so long attempted to foist upon you.

This question assumes an all the sharper character because there are little gentlemen among the ultra-Leftists who whisper in each other's ear: the Russian Opposition itself agrees that Thermidor is accomplished, only it does not say so out of "diplomatic" considerations. How far from a revolutionary position one must be to admit that among revolutionists there can exist for a single minute such execrable duplicity! Only one thing can be said: the poison of Zinovievist and Maslowist cynicism has left its traces in the ranks of the ultra-Leftists. The sooner the Opposition rids itself of such elements the better for it.

The program article we have analyzed, which seems to draw a balance of the "discussion", contains frequent allusions to the effect that on various questions Urbahns was right while all the others were wrong (declaration of the Russian Opposition on October 16, 1926; the question of creating the Leninbund not as a faction but as an independent party with its own candidates; the question of the First of May and the First of August, 1929, etc.) I think it would have been better if the article had not raised these questions, for each one of them indicates a definite mistake by comrade Urbahns, which he has not yet understood. I will not speak at all of the thoroughly wrong position in 1923-26, when Urbahns together with Maslow and others supported the reaction in the Russian Communist Party and conducted an ultra-Left course in Germany. If necessary, I am ready to return to all these questions and to show that Urbahns' mistakes are all connected, that they are not accidental but come from a certain method of thinking which I cannot call Marxist. In practice, Urbahns' policy consists of vacillations between Korsch and Brandler, or rather in the mechanical combination of Korsch and Brandler.

The Danger of Sectarianism and National Limitedness

In this pamphlet are analyzed differences of opinion that can be designated as strategical. Compared to them, the differences that exist on internal German question appear more as tactical differences, even though they can probably be traced back to two different lines. Nevertheless, these questions will have to be treated separately.

It is incontestable that the basis of the numerous errors of Urbahns in German policy lies in his wrong attitude towards the official Communist party. To consider the Communist Party—not its apparatus of functionaries, but its proletarian kernel and the masses that follow it—as a finished, dead and buried organization, is to fall into sectarianism. As a revolutionary faction, the Leninbund would have been in a position to play a great role. But it cut itself off from development by its pretensions, which are to say the least without foundation, to play the role of a second party.

With the ideological confusion of the Leninbund, its striving to become a "party" as swiftly as possible leads it to accept into its ranks elements that have long ago broken with Leninism and Bolshevism. In its anxiety not to lose these elements, the leadership of the Leninbund deliberately refrains from adopting a definite policy on a number of questions, which naturally only confuses and aggravates the situation by driving the disease deeper into the body.

There exist at the moment a good number of "Left" groups and grouplets that march on one and the same place; while guarding their independence, they accuse each other of not going far enough; they pride themselves on not being in one hundred percent agreement with each other; they publish little papers from time and find satisfaction in this illusory existence, without any ground under their feet, without a clear point of view and without perspectives. Feeling their weaknesses, these groups, or rather their directors, are above all afraid of falling under someone's "influence", or have to declare themselves in solidarity with someone—for what would become of that sweet independence contained in the 64 cubic meters required for an editorial chamber?

With that is connected yet another danger.

In the Communist International, the ideological leadership of the Russian party has long ago been replaced by the absolutism of the central apparatus and the dictatorship of the cash box. And while the Right opposition shows no less activity than the Left in its protests against the dictatorship of the apparatus, our positions in this question are nevertheless directly opposed. By its very nature, opportunism is national, since it bases itself upon the local and temporary needs of the proletariat and not upon its historical tasks. International control is intolerable for the opportunists, and they reduce their international relations as much as possible to harmless formalities, thereby imitating the Second International. The Brandlerites will salute the conference of the Right wing opposition in Czecho-Slovakia, exchange amicable notes with the Lovestone group in America, etc., provided that no group prevents the other from conducting its opportunist policy to its own national taste. All this is concealed beneath the cloak of the struggle against bureaucracy and the supremacy of the Russian party.

The Left Opposition can have nothing in common with such practices. International unity is not a decoration for us, but the very axis of our theoretical opinions and our policy. Still, there are not a few ultra-Leftists—and not in Germany alone—who, under the flag of the struggle against the bureaucratic command of the Stalinist apparatus, carry on a semi-conscious struggle for the dismemberment of the from international control.

The Russian Opposition has no less need of international connections, of international control than any other section. But I stronger fear that the conduct of comrade Urbahns is not dictated by the desire to intervene actively in Russian affairs—which could only be welcomed—but rather the contrary: by the desire to separate the German Opposition from the Russian.

A sharp lookout must be kept so that, under the pretext of the struggle against bureaucracy, there is no strengthening of tendencies in the Left Opposition toward separatism, which, in turn, would inevitably lead to bureaucratic degeneration not only on an international but on a national scale.

If the question were asked after thorough reflection: from which side is the Left Opposition at present menaced by the danger of bureaucracy and ossification, it would become completely clear that it is not from the side of international relations. The exaggerated internationalism of the Comintern could arise—on the basis of the former authority of the Russian party—only under the condition of a state power and a cash box. These "dangers" do not exist for the Opposition. On the contrary, there exist others. The pernicious policy of the bureaucracy leads to unrestrained centrifugal tendencies, and to endeavor to crawl back into a national and consequently a sectarian shell, for by remaining within national limits the Left Opposition could be nothing but a sect.

Conclusions

1. A clear position must be adopted on the question of Thermidor and the class character of the present Soviet state. Korschist tendencies must be mercilessly condemned.

2. The position of determined and unreserved defense of the U. S. S. R. against external dangers must be adopted, which does not exclude, but on the contrary presupposes an intransigent struggle against Stalinism, in time of war even more than in time of peace.

3. The program of the struggle for "freedom of organization" and all other "liberties" in the U. S. S. R. must be rejected and condemned, for that is the program of bourgeois democracy. To this program of bourgeois democracy must be opposed the slogans and methods of proletarian democracy, which, in the struggle against bureaucratic centrism, has the task of regenerating and fortifying the dictatorship of the proletariat.

4. A clear position must now be adopted in the Chinese question, so that the next stage does not take us by surprise. A stand must be taken either for the "democratic dictatorship" or the permanent revolution in China.

5. It must be clearly established that the Leninbund is a faction and not a party. From that flows a definite policy towards the party (especially during elections).

6. The tendencies towards national separatism must be condemned. We must actively enter the road of international unification of the Left Opposition on the basis of principled unity.

7. It must be recognized that Die Fahne des Kommunismus as it is today does not correspond to its designation of the theoretical organ of the Communist Left. It is absolutely necessary to create in Germany, with the united forces of the German and international Left, a serious Marxist organ capable of giving correct evaluations of the internal policy in Germany in connection with the international situation and its tendencies of development.

These few points, which are far from including all the questions, seem to me the most important and the most pressing. Constantinople, September 7, 1929

A Letter from the Chinese Oppositionists

Shanghai, November 15, 1929.

Dear Comrade Trotsky:

We, the Chinese Bolshevik-Leninists have been conducting a struggle against Stalinism, for the Platform of the Russian Opposition for a year already. The situation in the Party is not very good. The relations between the Party and ourselves is very bad. We learned of your expulsion—that Thermidorian measure of the Stalinist bureaucracy—only after considerable delay, through the intermediary of the Opposition groups in other countries. We have received a letter giving us your address and we are writing to you forthwith. The Chinese Opposition sends you a hearty Bolshevik greeting.

Just as in other countries, the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party is under the direction of Stalinist opportunism. The Stalinist political line has not only suffered a defeat in the past, but will inevitably suffer a new one in the future. If we do not succeed in finally eliminating Stalin from the Chinese Communist Party, the Chinese revolution will be unable to enter the path of victory. Unfortunately, we understood the truth of the Russian Opposition very late. As soon as it was known to us, we published the principal documents of the Opposition. Besides that, we have our regular publication. And for some time now we have been organizing a central faction of the whole Chinese Opposition.

It is precisely because our active work is a danger to the opportunist Central Committee of our Party, that it recently expelled a good number of Oppositionists. The bureaucrats go still further. Recently, at Canton, they fired openly upon a comrade who directs the Opposition's activity in the Tcheking section. This shameful deed of opportunism must be brought to the knowledge of the working class throughout the world so that the workers may have an idea of the real character of the present opportunist bureaucracy which is ready to employ such methods towards the Bolshevik-Oppositionists! But the counter-revolutionary and the opportunist terror cannot halt our forward march. That is why we are fighting even more obstinately. In the end, victory will be with us.

The Opposition in other countries has sent us letters and propaganda literature. Good contact now exists between us.

We have now published a platform of the Chinese Opposition. In the period that China is now passing through, all our activity must follow the political line traced by this platform.

The requirements of the situation have obliged us recently to call a national conference of the Opposition. Many active militants participated. All important questions with which we are confronted were discussed.

We wholly approve of the slogan of the Constituent Assembly.

The former opportunist of the Chinese Communist Party, Tchen Du Hsiu (ex-general secretary of the Party), has been, as you know, expelled for some time. He also fights the Central Committee of the Party. But at bottom he is not against Stalin. Up to now he has not understood the viewpoint of the Opposition. He has simply made use of some passages from the Platform of the Left Opposition against his opponents. We have demanded of Tchen Du-Hsiu: 1. that he publicly declare the Stalinist leadership opportunist; 2. that he openly and honestly condemn his previous opportunist mistakes and that he acknowledge the correctness of the Opposition Platform; 3. that he publicly dissolve his own faction (recently constituted and very weak in numbers). He has rejected our demands and pursues an independent activity. Therefore, we consider that Tchen Du-Hsiu has not broken with opportunism. We have decided to combat him, like every opportunist.

Certain of our comrades think that the slogan of the United States of Asia can be issued on this continent. Is this slogan correct?

In the present conditions in China, the work is more difficult than in the other countries. But the only way for us is to fight against these difficulties.

We believe that the future development and the consolidation of our activity necessitates the organization of an international faction. What is your opinion?

Warm Bolshevik greetings, Yours,

—P.

(The next issue of the Militant will contain comrade Trotsky's reply to the Chinese Opposition, which deals with some of the burning problems of the movement.)

graded all the theoretical thought in the movement today and transformed it into a sleight-of-hand game for jugglers and scamps. For the neo-Leninists of Stalin's school, theory is no longer an instrument, a guide to action, a subject for considered reflection, a weapon against the enemies of the proletariat inside and outside the movement. It has been converted into convenient and constantly changed formulae, recast and readapted to "justify" each new blunder and crime of the leadership.

Exceptionalist or Internationalist?

The essence of Leninism is the application of the teachings of Marx and Engels to the period of imperialism and proletarian revolutions. The theories of Lenin are just as little "Russian" as those of Marx were "German". The favorite argument of the social reformists and revisionists in past decades—and even now—has been that while Marxism might be applicable to Europe, or to Europe of the last century, it did not apply to the United States, for example, or to Europe today. The argument of all national and social reformists today, of those to whom the name of socialist or revolutionary still applies only because of past associations, is that Leninism might be suitable for "backward Russia" but that it does not apply to highly developed industrial countries. The arch-type of this school is the Austrian social democracy. The new and shame-faced converts to this idea are the Right wing groups in the Communist movement. For them, Lenin's essence lies not so much in his internationalism as it does in his "exceptionalism". A recent article by one of the Right wing spokesmen even speaks of "Lenin the Exceptionalist".

It is of course unnecessary to share the conception of the present Communist party leadership, according to which the stage and rate of development of the situation in every country is unchanged and unchangeable—an enormous idiosyncrasy which only strengthens the hand of the Right wing—in order to reject out of hand the vulgar national "Communism" of the latter. What essentially characterized Lenin was not his emphasis upon the national peculiarities of the struggle in each country, but the fundamentally international features of the Communist party. On more than a hundred occasions, Lenin underlined the fact that while there were differences in the stage of development of the various countries, the basic tenets of Bolshevism were universally applicable despite these differences. "We have now considerable experience, of an international scope, which pretty definitely establishes the fact that some fundamental features of our revolution are not local, not peculiarly national, not Russian only, but that they are of international significance. And I say 'international significance' not in the broad sense of the word; not some features, but all fundamental and secondary features are in the sense of their influence upon other countries, of international significance." (—Lenin, our emphasis.)

From Hillquit to Lovestone

The spokesmen for the opposing viewpoint used to be Hillquit, Longuet, Wallhead, Crispin and Bauer. Later on, they were Lazzari, Frossard, Phillips Price and Levi. Today they are Thalheimer, Sellier, Huber and Lovestone. And while these names are mentioned, let it be added that Lovestone is one hundred percent correct when he writes in a recent number of his paper that while he and his co-thinkers are condemned for "exceptionalism" in every part of the world, it is not only practiced but is the official theory of Stalin in the Soviet Union in the form of "socialism in one country."

In spite of either Stalin or Thalheimer, Leninism and internationalism are as inseparable as Leninism and "national communism" are incompatible. The man who stands out in his work is not so much Lenin the Russian Bolshevik, but Lenin the international revolutionist who led the Left wing in the Second International, who laid the foundation stone for the Third, who poured out his vitriolic denunciation upon the heads of traitors who gave lip-service to "internationalism" and sent their followers into the trenches in order to defend their "national interests"; Lenin the internationalist, who considered the Russian revolution as a temporary outpost of the world's working class, a fortress to be defended at all costs until the workers of other countries could save it for socialism by overthrowing their own bourgeoisie.

That it is necessary to emphasize and argue these features in Lenin's theoretical in that fact, Stalinism can exist only at the expense of Leninism. It can live only by concealing or lying about Lenin's views.

Nowhere in history can a parallel be found to the six years of misrepresentation to which the official apparatus has subjected Lenin. Not even the falsification of Marx by the reformists before the war can equal—for cynical distortion, for disloyalty, for deliberate organized and outrageous lying—the campaign by Stalin-Bucharin-Zinoviev to devitalize Lenin. The most incredible enormities have been committed in an attempt to cover up the sins of Centrism and the Right wing in the Communist movement with the name of Lenin. So deeply ingrained in this horrible desecration have the Stalinist functionaries become that they can calmly reprint an article from ficial and solemnly accepted version of Lenin, his work and his views.

It is in this abominable falsification of Lenin, that the greatest danger lies to the revolutionary movement. The big problem now is to unearth Lenin's truth from beneath the garbage of falsehood and revision and to reestablish it as the guide of the movement, just as Lenin reestablished the principles of Marxism in spite of their emasculation by the Kautskys of the world. That task has been assumed by the International Leninist Opposition. It is being carried out under the leadership of the greatest living revolutionist, L. D. Trotsky, the closest comrade of Lenin, the exiled warrior who provokes venomous fear of those who floated to the top in the swamp of centrism and inspires a deep regard and devotion to Bolshevism in every proletarian fighter. Not only on the anniversaries of Lenin, but every day in the year, the militants in our ranks will reconsecrate themselves to this task, for without being equipped with the teachings of Lenin the proletariat is unarmed and helpless, and cannot accomplish its destiny. In the struggle for Bolshevism carried on by the International Opposition, Lenin and Leninism live.

CARRY OUT LENIN'S WILL!

Lenin's Last Words to the Party, Still Suppressed by the Stalinists

By the stability of the Central Committee, of which I spoke before, I mean measures to prevent a split, so far as such measures can be taken. For, of course, the White Guard in Russkye Mysl (I think it was S. E. Oldenburg) was right when, in the first place, in his play against Soviet Russia he banked on the hope of a split in our party, and when, in the second place, he banked for that split on serious disagreements in our party.

Our party rests upon two classes, and for that reason its instability is possible, and if there cannot exist an agreement between these classes its fall is inevitable. In such an event it would be useless to take any measures or in general to discuss the stability of our Central Committee. In such an event no measures would prove capable of preventing a split. But I trust that is too remote future, and too improbable an event, to talk about.

I have in mind stability as a guarantee against a split in the near future, and I intend to examine here a series of considerations of a purely personal character.

I think that the fundamental factor in the matter of stability—from this point of view—is such members of the Central Committee as Stalin and Trotsky. The relation between them constitutes, in my opinion, a big half of the danger of that split, which might be avoided, and the avoidance of which might be promoted in my opinion, by raising the number of members of the Central Committee to fifty or one hundred.

Comrade Stalin, having become General Secretary, has concentrated an enormous power in his hands; and I am not sure that he always knows how to use that power with sufficient caution. On the other hand comrade Trotsky, as was proved by his struggle against the Central Committee in connection with the question of the People's Commissariat of Ways and Communication, is distinguished not only by his exceptional ability—personally he is to be sure, the most able man in the present Central Committee, but also by his too far-reaching self-confidence and a disposition to be far too much attracted by the purely administrative side of affairs.

These two qualities of the two most able leaders of the present Central Committee might, quite innocently, lead to a split, if our party does not take measures to prevent it, a split might arise unexpectedly.

I will not further characterize the other members of the Central Committee as to their personal qualities. I will only remind you that the October episode of Zinoviev and Kameneff were not, of course, accidental, but that it ought as little to be used against them as the non-Bolshevism of Trotsky.

Of the younger members of the Central Committee, I want to say a few words about Piatakov and Bucharin. They are, in my opinion, the most able forces (among the youngest), and in regard to them it is necessary to bear in mind the following: Bucharin is not only the most valuable and biggest theoretician of the Party, but also may legitimately be considered the favorite of the whole party; but his theoretical views can only with the very greatest doubt be regarded as fully Marxist, for there is something scholastic in him (he never has learned, and I think never fully understood the dialectic.)

And then Piatakov—a man undoubtedly distinguished in will and ability, but too much given over to the administrative side of things to be relied on in a serious political question.

Of course, both these remarks are made by me merely with a view of the present time, or supposing that these two able and loyal workers may not find an occasion to supplement their knowledge and correct their one-sidedness. December 25, 1922

Postscript: Stalin is too rude, and this fault, entirely supportable in relations among us Communists, becomes unsupportable in the office of General Secretary. Therefore, I propose to the comrades to find a way to remove Stalin from that position and appoint to it another man who in all respects differs from Stalin only in superiority—namely, more patient, more loyal, more polite and more attentive to comrades, less capricious, etc. This circumstance may seem an insignificant trifle, but I think that from the point of view of preventing a split and from the point of view of the relation between Stalin and Trotsky which I discussed above, it is not a trifle, or it is such a trifle as may acquire a decisive significance.

conceptions, despite the fact that they are the very heart of his works, is only an indication of the extremes to which the false disciples of Leninism have gone to suppress, distort and falsify his views. The greatest crime of Stalinism lies precisely

Pravda on the 50th birthday of Stalin which is an insult to the intelligence of the reader and to the memory of Lenin. Stalin, upon whose removal from the post of party secretary Lenin insisted as one of the means of preventing a party split, whom Lenin denounced as rude and disloyal, is described as Lenin's loyal disciple! Stalin, who considered Lenin's contribution to the discussion on national questions as "superfluous", at whose activity in Georgia Lenin said he was "outraged", is characterized as the greatest theoretician of the Bolshevik party on the national question! Stalin is even credited with organizing and leading the Red Army to victory against the counter-revolution! A few years ago such hair-raising insolence would have been considered the work of a humorist or a madman. Today it is part of the of-

Ford's Parts Factories Drive Workers

By ROBERT L. CRUDEN

DETROIT—(FP)—While Ford is reaping the harvest of a high wage propaganda, workers are working in plants making Ford parts, straining under the 12-hour day and low wages.

Ford gets his wheels from the Kelsey-Hayes Wheel Corp. This plant runs its men seven days a week, two 12-hour shifts a day. A worker, if he is lucky, may make 65 cents an hour—but he'll be more than lucky if he is able to walk up the street to get a car. The speed maintained on the Ford wheel line is terrific. Kelsey workers told Federated Press. "If you thought Ford speed could only hold eight hours a day you ought to work on our line," said one worker. "We have a Ford boss and for 12 hours we got to go like shots out of hell. But you can't keep it up long. Three or four weeks lay you out."

The Briggs Mfg. Co. makes many Ford bodies. This plant is notorious among auto workers for its low wages, high accident rate and shameless exploitation of women workers. According to the state law, women are supposed to have stools when working. Very few women with whom your correspondent has talked have had these. Women are not supposed to work more than 54 hours per week but workers are not lacking who claim that they had to punch two separate time cards in order to evade the law. Attempts to have these women persecute have failed because they fear that if they do they will not be able to get a job in Detroit again, thanks to the blacklist and spy system.

This corporation recently took back some of its old workers—at 42 cents an hour. The workers have to work at high speed among machinery which for the most part is quite unprotected. A steady stream of Briggs workers pours into the company hospital all the time the plant is running, having lost their fingers, hands or whatnot.

Visitors are barred from the Briggs plants.

From such sources as these the Ford fortunes rise. These are the "economics of production" which make possible the low priced Ford and high Ford profits.

PITTSBURG—(FP)—Trustification of Pittsburgh's taxicab companies has been followed by a walkout of 1,500 taxi-drivers. The first act of the taxi merger was to cut wages, and the next act in the labor drama saw 1,000 drivers in Moose Hall to form a union.

The merger was effected by the Parmelee system. Within 48 hours after the announcement of the reduction, all the drivers involved had signed up in the union with demands for recognition, a 40% flat commission and a 10-hour day. The company flatly refused to receive a union committee or discuss their demands.

The new union men, meeting in Moose Hall pledged their solidarity while news was brought that drivers of an independent firm had walked out in sympathy with the strikers, making similar demands.

The Depression and Labor

Prospects for the Approaching Struggles in the United States

By Arne Swabeck

The American workers are now confronted with the prospect of an already advancing industrial depression. The questions of their preparations to meet it, the political development of the workers themselves, their degree of organization and their conception of the tactics to be employed, become vitally important. There need be no doubt about growing discontent and more severe struggles in the coming period.

That this is recognized by the capitalist class is most clearly evidenced in the increased anti-labor drive. It was demonstrated in the editorials carried by the Scripps-Howard Newspaper syndicate at the time of the American Federation of Labor convention at Toronto. The employers have become thoroughly alarmed at the appearance of Communists organizing, by militant methods, among a formerly backward but now awakening working class in the South. Hence they turn to the A. F. of L. officials demanding that they be the ones to organize and "lead". More recently it was shown in the Hoover "building conferences" in which A. F. of L. heads promised that there would be no movements for wage increases undertaken in the immediate future—that is, during the depression.

The Role of the A. F. of L.

This also indicates the role to be played and the perspectives of the A. F. of L. in the coming period. It is worth noting the most recent developments among the needle trades workers in the ladies garment and furriers sections, formerly largely under left wing influence. The A. F. of L. has actually succeeded in reestablishing its organization and "leadership". It has gained in co-operation with the employers, almost complete control of the jobs and membership dues payments. Among the New York food workers, where militants have lately been active in organization work, the A. F. of L. is now initiating an organizing campaign. The Toronto convention resolved to organize the South and the plans worked out are about to be put to test. The United Textile Workers union will have leadership and what it terms "any form of spectacular mass drive is banned. Negroes will be organized on approval of 'white locals' in the district, and—in separate locals.

Comments on the general organization policy to be pursued in this drive are quite superfluous as it is clearly indicated that there will be no departure from the general practice established by the A. F. of L. officials. Even among the hard boiled Bourbons of the South the main effort will be directed toward winning the bosses for co-operation with the labor "leaders" who have sufficiently proven their willingness to the greatest reciprocation in selling out the workers at the crucial moment. One question of the greatest importance, however, is whether or not the campaign will succeed in actually bringing the Southern textile workers into the U. T. W. The oft repeated statements of the Daily Worker that these workers, disgusted with the betrayals of the A. F. of L. in 1920-21 and recently, will never join its ranks are neither convincing nor true.

A comparison of events in the South, the frame-ups in Gastonia and the killings in Marion, clearly reveals that the Southern textile barons are set against any form of union or organization, whether led by Communists or by A. F. of L. officials. They will tolerate A. F. of L. "leadership" only so long as it is effective in helping to wipe out militant unions. Yet it would be idle to speculate on no results in the A. F. of L. organization drive. There are many reasons to assume that the Southern workers, driven by increasing speed-up pressure added to which there now appears the misery of unemployment, will respond and join, perhaps in large numbers, despite the sell-outs of the past. So much more so because the National Textile Workers union, under Communist Party direction, follows the usual method of practically abandoning a field when the opportunity for spectacular activities disappears. All recent history shows that during periods of industrial crisis workers flock to conservative unions. Nor is there anything horrible in this prospect when one remembers the development of the British trade unions from one of docile support of the capitalist empire to a situation where the general strike could become a possibility in 1926. Now the process of developments proceed at a much more accelerated pace.

The Pressure of the Ranks

The prospects of growth of the A. F. of L. are not confined to the South. The developing industrial depression not only offers excellent opportunities for organization but is certain to throw large sections of the unorganized workers into the lap of the A. F. of L. Extended organization in this period will inevitably mean greater pressure from the ranks against the present wage cutting, speed-up campaign and for more persistent struggle to obtain the demands corresponding to their growing needs. If anyone doubts the probability of such struggles developing on the basis of A. F. of L. organization, or denies their probability, we might refer to such recent examples as the New Orleans street carmen's strike and the Marion textile workers' strike.

That this will not in the least mean any change of policy or outlook in the upper layer of the A. F. of L. bureaucracy is of course amply proven by all past experiences. On the contrary, the demands of their capitalist masters will increase correspondingly and their faithful service will be expressed in more co-operation with these masters and the state powers in the violent suppression and cunning betrayal of workers' struggles. Especially will they attempt to buttress their own dominance over working class ideology by efforts to exterminate Left wing unions and any form of organized Left wing sentiment.

Yet it is under such conditions that new opposition develops. The "progressive" movement, already emerging within the A. F. of L. since the Left wing practically abandoned that field, was a natural first expression. But it was stillborn. It appeared in the form of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action, dominated by the Socialist Party and, although having a progressive platform, it was based rather upon certain sections of the trade union officialdom than upon the main stream of organized workers. Hence, while being an outgrowth and expression of dissatisfaction with the official policies of the A. F. of L., it lacked the dynamic force for becoming a real opposition and its course of complete merger with the bureaucracy is pretty well decided unless pressure from below and from within forces it in a Leftward direction. To conceive of relying upon the "progressive" leaders to develop a real opposition would of course be folly. But the gap created among the workers by their leadership of a growing progressive sentiment—leading it backward—and that of the Left wing leading it forward, can most successfully be bridged by correct united front policies of the latter. In the recent period the exact opposite has been the case with the result of further isolation of the Left within the mass organizations and easier diverting of opposition sentiment into harmless channels. Nevertheless, such sentiment remains and is bound to grow. Its correct direction is still a task to be performed.

The present trends among workers are characteristic of what can be expected from the mature course of development. There is a restlessness over the prospect of employment with the ranks of the unemployed increasing. There is discontent with the growing speed-up exploitation, and here and there distinctly manifested readiness for struggle, with some instances of workers swinging toward the Left. These are some of the outstanding features. With a protracted severity of industrial depression it can easily lead to convulsions. But this does not mean that the working masses recognize the role of the A. F. of L. "leadership", of the so-called progressives, of the social democrats, or that they are ready for the leadership of the Communist Party. They are still far from it and several steps will yet have to be taken considerable experience will still have to be accumulated before the workers reach that point.

A False Assumption

It would be preposterous to assume that for instance the main body of the steel workers, actually enrolled into unions in the 1919 drive and then left in the lurch have learned a sufficient lesson to be able to distinguish between leaderships. Even among the coal miners, where union official corruption and betrayal have yielded numerous bitter experiences, where the rank and file are far ahead of the workers in other industries in their readiness for struggle, the National Miners Union, under openly acknowledged Communist leadership, has thus far succeeded in enlisting the support of only a very small fraction (this, in large measure is also due to wrong policies which will be dealt with in separate articles).

Growing radicalization of the American workers, while likely to be accompanied by sporadic, unorganized struggles, essentially mean their turning more definitely toward union organization—mainly toward the existing mass unions without being able to comprehend the character of the A. F. of L. "leadership". A turn toward the building of a labor party is also likely. In one instance—the last New York City elections—the large increase in votes by the Socialist Party ticket, reaching a total of tens of thousands while that of the Communist Party ticket decreased to a little less than 6,000, is, despite the seeming paradox, an expression of radicalization in an American scale. Thousands of the workers who voted for the S. P. did so with the conviction of taking a step toward the Left, away from capitalism and toward socialism, without being able as yet to understand the character of the S. P. leadership or the distance that the party has moved away from socialism. In that sense and to that degree they expressed their growing radicalism. There is no other basis upon which that vote increase can be evaluated. If these workers had wanted to remain ideologically as they were before—supporters of capitalism—they would naturally have continued to vote for the Republicans and Democrats. This and subsequent events also indicates that the S. P. and its social reformist leadership will change from its years of relative obscurity and paralysis, and become more of a factor misleading the workers. The course of working class radicalization in this course and the blunders of the official Communist party, gives it that opportunity. Nevertheless, the fact of the workers actually taking the first steps away from capitalist ideology and toward union organization is what holds out great hope and great possibilities for the revolutionary movement.

The St. Louis Unemployment Demonstration

ST. LOUIS—The march of 1500 unemployed workers to the local City Hall to present a set of demands to the Mayor was one of the best working class demonstrations that St. Louis has seen for a long time. The spirit of the workers and the readiness with which they responded to the call for the march is an indication of their temper and the severity with which the industrial depression has hit them.

St. Louis Hard Hit

St. Louis is one of the most heavily affected industrial centers. Industry is at a low point, and thousands of workers walk the streets desperately seeking any job at all that will offer them the barest possibility to live. The prospects for an industrial pick-up are far from bright here and instead of the ranks of the unemployed becoming thinner, they increase in number every day. A conservative estimate of the number now out of work in St. Louis is about sixty thousand workers.

In order to begin the mobilization of the employed and unemployed workers in the city for a fight to improve the frightful conditions of the jobless, the local branch of the Communist League of America (Opposition) together with the Workers Alliance of St. Louis, planned the organization of a workers' march on the City Hall, where demands for the unemployed might be presented and a public forum be established so that an appeal that would reach the ears of the whole working class of the city could be made.

Without the bombast and cheap sensationalism that usually accompany the "mass demonstrations" of the official party, the League and the Alliance made all the necessary preparations for the march. In an effort to make the movement inclusive of all the radical elements in the city, an appeal was made to the local branch of the Communist party to join in the work and help organize the unemployed. The reply of the Stalinists—represented by one of the travelling "organizers", D. T. Early—was that they would have nothing to do with the "counter-revolutionary Trotskyists", particularly since they were "dead". The local Stalinists showed that all their words about the conditions of the unemployed workers could not be translated into action but would remain just so much talk.

Leaflets were issued by the Communist League and distributed among the unemployed workers who received them with enthusiasm. The demands proposed by the League included the following:

Demands Proposed

1. Complete insurance against unemployment to be provided by the government, giving all unemployed benefits of the full wage rates, without any exceptions or disqualifications. The insurance to be financed by taxes on income, inheritance, and profits, and the administration of unemployment benefits to be in the hands of the workers, elected from the shops, and the organizations of the unemployed.
2. No evictions of the unemployed for non-payment of rent.
3. Emergency relief to be provided for the unemployed immediately, from city, state and federal funds.

4. Full union wages on all public works, with the workers' right to organize and strike against discrimination and bad working conditions.

5. Abolition of private employment agencies; the establishment of free employment agencies, administered by workers' representatives.

6. Recognition of Soviet Russia, the only workers' and farmers' government in the world. This would alleviate employment through increased trade which Soviet Russia would place in the United States if relations were established.

7. Establishment of the seven-hour day and five-day week. No overtime work. Abolition of the speed-up system; 15 minute rest periods hourly, regulation of machine speed by the workers.

8. Immediate abolition of all "vagrancy" laws.

On the day of the demonstration, 1500 or more workers gathered at the appointed place and marched to the City Hall. The Mayor refused to see them. On the top steps of the City Hall, Elmer McMillan, leading St. Louis militant, read the demands of the Communist League and spoke in detail upon them. He was followed by Ralph Martin of the Alliance who spoke on the need for organizing the struggle against unemployment.

Cops Break up the Meeting

By this time, the Mayor had given his orders for dispersing the demonstration and a gang of cops and dicks sallied into the crowd. McMillan and Martin were arrested and taken to headquarters half a block away. The workers followed them, cheering and shouting for their release. After an hour of questioning by the cops the two militants were released.

As a result of the demonstration, thousands of workers throughout the city learned for the first time of an organized attempt being made to carry on a fight against the specter of unemployment. The secretary of the Communist League has been receiving numerous letters from workers throughout the city endorsing the movement and congratulating the League on its activity. A number of old time militants who had dropped out of the Communist movement some time ago have revived their interest and are turning toward the League particularly since the official party is doing nothing at all.

Plans are further being made for the continuation of the work in the form of protest meetings, the organization of Councils of Unemployed, and the formation of a broad united movement to combat the effects of unemployment on the workers.

This movement is meeting neither with approval of the St. Louis business men and their Mayor, Miller, or of the local A. F. of L. bureaucrats. For instance, Elmer McMillan is now up on charges before his local Painters Union for having participated in the demonstration. He is charged with being a member of a Communist organization. This is not the first time the reactionaries have tried to expel McMillan. A fight against these tactics is being organized.

Naval Conclave Shows No Unity

More than one week of the London Naval Conference has already passed by without much more being accomplished towards the "limitation of armaments", than the coming to the fore of a number of conflicts and disputes between France and Italy, Japan and England and the like. In face of the obvious striving of each of the imperialist powers involved to hold as much strength as possible against its nearest rival gives the lie to all the pretensions of the diplomatic pirates to "disarmament".

Italo-French Conflict

The first part of the conference, as soon as it gets down to "work", will be the developing conflict between Italian and French imperialism for Mediterranean power. Italy is playing hard for support from the United States for parity with France, which will give Mussolini a bigger advantage in his attempts to become an even stronger Mediterranean force. The contention of Italy is that its naval strength as compared with that of France should be estimated not so much on the basis of the present situation and relations of forces, as on the "prospective" position of Italy. In other words, Italy has in mind such an extension of its imperialist interests as will place it on an "equal plane" with France in the immediate future. How this virtually unconcealed declaration of Italy's belligerent intentions can be reconciled with all the high-sounding phrases about permanent peace in the Kellogg Pact naturally remains unexplained by the imperialist statesmen.

There is very little if any prospect that a "satisfactory" agreement between the two Mediterranean rivals will be reached at this conference. The past history of imperialism indicates the contrary, that is, that decisive questions of power are only delayed temporarily around imperialists' discussion tables and are determined definitely in actual warfare.

Another rift in the conference lute is the attitude of Japan, which is seeking agreement on its cruiser proposals. Japan is dominated by fear of England's position in the Orient and wants to be in a better position to counteract British imperialist progress by adding to its own cruiser strength. At the same time, it has raised the "delicate" question of merchantmen, which was passed over with vague words at the Washington conference. The Japanese point out that there is nothing in the Washington agreement that prevents merchant ships from mounting guns greater than six inches providing they are built in a manner that makes this technically possible.

Merchantmen Limitation Hits England

There is no doubt that the United States is far from displeased at this question being raised, for a delimitation of the use of merchantmen in war time (regardless of the fact that they would be used—agreement or no agreement) can only serve to handicap England. That is because England possesses, in merchant ships of 4,000 tons or more and a speed of 15 knots, about 3,150,000 tons compared with only 880,000 American tons and 250,000 Japanese. The exclusion of merchantmen would therefore give America a theoretical advantage of some 2,700,000 tons. Needless to say, England will balk like a mule at such a proposal.

Green Stabs Marion and Gastonia

A Federated Press dispatch from Richmond, Va., reports that in a speech there William Green, president of the A. F. of L., disclaimed all connection and responsibility of the Federation with the Marion strike situation, where six strikers were massacred by company thugs, or with Gastonia, where six workers face life long imprisonment in a frame-up over the killing of a cop. Green's role in the labor movement has rarely been expressed more brazenly than in this incident. He is not only crawling before the Southern mill owners, pleading with them to recognize him as best labor overseer for the bosses, but is deliberately stabbing the Marion and Gastonia workers in the back. His speech gives the Southern reactionaries an open hand.

"So far as I am concerned, you can repeat all the Marions and Gastonias you want"—that is the essence of Green's remarks. Green is presuming to speak in the name of the A. F. of L. Every militant worker in the A. F. of L. must reply by repudiating Green and his crew and driving them out of the labor movement where they are working in the interests of labor's class enemy.

Communist Worker Shot Down in Cold Blood

Steve Katovis, member of the Building Maintenance Workers Union and the Communist Party, is dead. He was shot in the back by Patrolman Harry Kirtz of the New York police force in a conflict that followed an attempt by police to break up a mass meeting called to express solidarity with the members of the Food Clerks' Union on strike against Miller's Market in the Bronx.

Steve Katovis is the first workers to be shot by the police in a labor struggle in New York for years. The uniformed thugs have received their orders to club and shoot in order to prevent the organization of the rising spirit of the workers. A victim had to be found in order to warn the workers, who are losing their jobs in the industrial depression or having their wages cut, that they can expect any resistance to be met by the most violent and murderous repression by the police. The capitalist class is desperately afraid of the development of a militant movement of the American workers. It will use the most brutal measures to crush even the first signs of such a movement.

Savage Attack on Demonstration

The demonstration of the Communist Party at the City Hall following the death of comrade Katovis was the occasion for another manifestation of Cossack Sadism. The police of Mr. Whalen, under whose administration New York's underworld of gambling, bootlegging, racketeering thugery and general corruption have had free rein, sailed into the peacefully assembled workers with a bloodthirsty fury that has not been equalled in New York since the days of the war hysteria. Participants in the demonstration as well as bystanders and curiosity seekers were mercilessly clubbed and pummelled by the "brave" police, on foot and horseback, armed with night-sticks, black jacks, brass knuckles and pistols.

Hundreds received at least one or more blows from the police; more than a score were severely beaten. Party leaders who attempted to speak were beaten and kicked while they lay on the pavement. Robert Minor of the Daily Worker had to be treated by a doctor for injuries, as were a half dozen or more others. Comrade George Clark, of the Communist League (Opposition), was beaten about the face and head by a number of police. A virtual reign of terror existed for almost an hour.

The attitude of the capitalist press towards this demonstration of police horrors was characteristic. The Telegram announced: "Curb Demonstration of 1,000 Communists, but Sticks Fall on Many Innocents". That is, the clubbing of Communists is quite in order, but "innocents" (!) must not suffer. The Mirror, the morons' picture paper, could find nothing wrong with the savagery of the police except that it made martyrs out of the Reds and helped to manufacture more of them! And it is no less characteristic that Norman Thomas, repeated the profound subway philosophy in his "protest" telegram to the mayor, of the Mirror. Instead of a call to the workers to protest the police terror and find ways of crushing it, Thomas wired the mayor—placing the responsibility for the cracked skulls and bleeding faces of the workers upon the Communists: "Why unnecessarily gratify Communists' mania for martyrs?"

United Front against Police Terror

Not a "mania for martyrs" is involved, but the capitalist and police "mania" for smashing every working class organization. As usual, they begin their attacks upon the most militant section of the working class, the Communists. The assault upon the Communists is a forerunner and an inseparable part of the attack upon the working class as a whole. That is why every worker must help to repulse and defeat this attack. The Communist movement by itself—in the present stage of its numerical and political weakness—cannot successfully defeat the police terror. For that purpose it is essential to set large masses of workers into action. It is necessary to develop a broad movement of the workers and all labor organizations ready to form a united front to drive back the monster of police brutality. The conscious workers, who detest the Cossacks and their deeds, can be rallied for such a movement if they are not repulsed by narrow sectarianism but approached in a spirit of proletarian solidarity. The savagery of the police, who can carry out their jobs with less difficulty when the Communists are separated from the rest of the labor movement can be overcome when the courageous handful of revolutionary workers succeed in rallying the fraternal support of tens of thousands of workers.

This can and must be done. The movement resulting from it will be the best memorial to Steve Katovis, the martyred worker-rebel, and the most effective reply to capitalist terrorism.

Mexico Breaks with Soviet Union

Following directly upon the United States visit of president-elect Ortiz Rubio, Mexico announced that it had broken all diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. The Mexican diplomatic representative in Moscow has asked for his passports, and preparations are being made for the return home of the Soviet minister to Mexico. The pretext for the break in relations were the Communist demonstrations in the United States during Rubio's visit, in which workers protested against the savage campaign of repression and murder of workers and revolutionists that the present Mexican government has been conducting for the past period.

The break does not come as a particular surprise to those acquainted with the development of relations between Mexico and the United States in the last couple of years. The pressure of American imperialism on Mexico, directly exercised by the House of Morgan through its partner Morrow, who was obligingly made Mexican ambassador by Washington, has resulted in the Mexican puppet government being entrained more firmly behind American finance capital. The resistance to American imperialist encroachments offered by the workers and peasants has been ruthlessly suppressed by both the Calles and the Gil governments. Rubio's present action indicates that he will follow directly in the footsteps of his bought-off predecessors.

The "reasons" given for the break are the hackneyed ones of "Bolshevik propaganda" in Mexico. The fact that Bolshevism naturally grows out of the soil of the class struggle in Mexico as it does in every other country is conveniently ignored by the American-controlled Mexican government. What it is really interested in, is to give every assurance to its American masters in Wall Street and Washington that it will have nothing to do with the workers republic in Russia.

That the break is part of the international campaign of the bourgeois world, headed by the U. S., to press against the Soviet Union is only too plain. The fact that the Soviet Union has moved to the Left in the past period, under the pressure of the workers and the fight of the Russian Opposition, has been a sad disappointment to the imperialist world which hoped that the movement to the Right would continue uninterruptedly to the point where Russia could be made a colony divided among the imperialist bandits. The intervention of Stimson in the Manchurian situation, the threats of Henderson and MacDonald to break off relations with Russia, the recent intimation from Washington that the present "radical policy of the Soviets makes recognition an indefinitely postponed issue", and the present action of Mexico, are all part of one attempt to force Russia further away from the socialist path and toward the road of compromise with imperialism.

As for Mexico's "reasons" for the break, they become pitifully thin when it is known that no protest at all is made by its marionette rulers against the bold and ruthless "propaganda", both verbal and military that the United States conducts in Mexico 365 days in the year.

WHITTINSVILLE, Mass.—(FP)—Hard times in the textile industry have knocked 75 more workers out of jobs at the Whittin Machine Works. Although the number normally employed is between 3,000 and 3,500 only 2,000 are on the job now.

BOSTON—Benito Mussolini, Italy's leading Fascist, has been invited to speak at the American Legion convention in Boston this year. The American reactionaries feel an international solidarity with their Italian brothers.

After the Miners' Strike

Operators and Reactionary Union Leaders vs. the Illinois Miners

By Joseph Angelo

The fighting tradition of the Illinois coal-miners is not dead; and the events of last December—the strike of the National Miners Union, despite many avoidable shortcomings and the court injunction squabble between Lewis vs. Fishwick with no bread in the homes of many miners—has made it more alive.

Of course, the strike of the National Miners Union has been defeated, by the combined efforts of the state government, the coal-operators and the Lewis-Fishwick machine. But, beneath the defeat the miners are stirring and this liable to flare up into a statewide struggle any day. The coal operators-Lewis-Fishwick machine, with the support of the state government are desperately fighting to crush this rising tide of militant feeling among the miners.

Labor Bosses As Operators' Tools

The reason for this is obvious. Capitalism cannot live as at present organized without longer hours, lower wages, speed-up systems, etc. And the coal-operators with the support of their agents, the Lewis-Fishwick machine, have not even concealed their true objectives. Today hundreds upon hundreds of militant miners that participated in the last National Miners Union strike are being fired from their jobs by the bosses, and their places filled with unemployed miners brought in special trains by the Lewis-Fishwick funkeys from mining camps where the mines have been closed down many years. But this does not solve the problem because these new miners soon realize that they are up against the same problem that their black-listed brothers were. They soon realize that one of the obstacles in their road to better conditions is the Lewis-Fishwick machine, which must be replaced before any gains can be made.

It is either Fishwick or Lewis that comes to the aid of the coal-operators whenever it is necessary, as for instance in an editorial of a recent issue of the Illinois Miner, where Fishwick wrote that after the contract of the Indiana miners expires next April 1st, the Illinois miners will not strike to support their brother miners in Indiana to renew their contract nor to fight for better working conditions. Fishwick here, as always, is not expressing the sentiments of the Illinois miners or helping the Indiana miners, on the contrary Fishwick here is the official mouthpiece of the coal-operators and by such action gives direct support to the coal-operators and stabs the Indiana miners in the back and at the same time tries to shatter the militancy of the Illinois miners.

And Lewis is not one whit better. Already while speculating on the outcome of the injunction trial, his henchmen, instead of organizing West Virginia and Kentucky are gathering hordes of unemployed miners and promising them that in case of a favorable decision, he will ship them into Illinois to replace those miners that refuse to accept his orders.

Although the trial to set aside the injunction began on December 18th, the judge has not yet rendered a decision, but the consensus among the miners is that Fishwick, because of the support of the majority of the coal-operators of Illinois and the state political administration will get a more favorable decision than Lewis. But Lewis, also, because of the support from certain influential coal-operators will be able to appeal the injunction to a higher court.

Trial Served Good Purpose

Regardless of the final outcome of the injunction trial, it has served a good purpose. It tore the false mask from both Lewis and Fishwick and showed that both of them are crooks, election swindlers, agents of the coal-operators, grafters and unfit to handle any affairs pertaining to the mine workers. The trial was like a match put to a cannon. It has awakened many miners and it marks the end of a rotten episode in the life of the coal-miners and the beginning of a period of growth of the National Miners Union. Both Lewis and Fishwick are playing hookey from the graveyard.

The National Miners Union is growing slowly from mining camp to mining camp while the Lewis-Fishwick company union is declining every day at an increasing speed. The miners are for the National Miners Union and the experience of a strike has had a tremendous effect in awakening the militancy of the miners. Whatever mistakes the National Miners Union made in the course of the last strike, the Stalin-Foster leadership is responsible and the members of the Communist Party must see that the mistakes are corrected. The policy of trying to side-track and lying about such militant and staunch fighters as John Watt of Springfield, Ed Morgan of Staunton, Fritz Bode of Taylorville and Luke Coffey

Prospects for New Struggles in New Bedford

New Bedford textile workers who made history in 1928 under the militant leadership of the National Textile Workers Union are again going into action. With almost half of the 30,000 textile workers of the city unemployed they are demanding immediate action to meet the critical situation.

Whether the N. T. W. U. will be able to meet the present tasks is difficult to determine at present. Two of the leaders of the struggle of two years ago, Eli Keller and Ellen Dawson, have been eliminated from the union on purely Communist Party lines while Raphael Pires, the editor of the Communist Party newspaper in the Portuguese language published in New Bedford has likewise been eliminated at the behest of the Stalinists. It is not necessary to defend Dawson, Keller, Pires and others for their support of the Right wing program of Lovestone. It is necessary to show that the Party's narrow faction game is being allowed to weaken the union struggle. Only those who believe in a certain interpretation of Communism, will be allowed to lead the New Bedford masses, says the official Communist Party. This is similar to decisions made in the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union and other organizations. Such a policy can only lead to chaos and defeat for the working masses. A struggle of the broad masses cannot be based at the present stage upon a faction of a political party, but upon all workers who want to fight under a militant banner.

Just as in 1928 when the N. T. W. U. had to fight on two fronts, that is against the mill owners and the United Textile Workers Union led by William Batty, so will its present organization drive which may lead to a new strike, also be fought on two fronts. Under such conditions, the broadest possible basis for support must be obtained and all sections of the working class be allowed to participate in the struggle.

The prospects for developing the National Textile Workers Union in New Bedford into a powerful organization are unusually bright. In fact, the actual dues-paying membership in that city is larger than in any other part of the country. It is no exaggeration to state that the only organized mass base of the union at present of Belleville and trying to replace them with faddlers from Chicago and preachers of the Latter Day Saints and Nazarene sects as was done in Taylorville, is not a correct policy with which to build the National Miners Union and must be corrected. These men have been in the forefront of all the great struggles of the Illinois miners for many years past and will continue to be, despite the childish attacks of the Stalin-Foster clique. Future events and pressure from below will prove that the present policy is incorrect.

Stalinists Retreat Partially

Under the blows of the Communist League (Opposition), the Stalin-Foster leadership has been forced to admit part of their mistakes and adopt a program of immediate demands, which should have been done before the strike. Yet, to adopt a program which reads, (Daily Worker 1-9-30) "that the miners must be imbued with the spirit of preparation for the coming general national movement of the miners, which will come next Fall." is not enough. Fishwick is afraid of the Indiana miners whose contract expires next April and that is why he is trying to prepare the minds of the miners of Illinois and Indiana against a militant struggle. The National Miners Union must make not only the Indiana strike but every strike an opportunity for launching demonstrations of national solidarity.

is in New Bedford. While in the South, the N. T. W. U. has many supporters, due to the semi-legal character of the work, the union does not function to any great extent. In most Southern towns it hardly functions at all. In New Bedford on the other hand, the work is carried on regularly, meetings are held and the union is a factor in the community. Although the United Textile Workers Union likewise has a strong branch in the city, the Left wing union fights it every inch of the way.

While the United Textile Workers Union membership in the main consists of the skilled workers, weavers, loom-fixers and spinners, the membership of the N. T. W. U. is composed mostly of the unskilled, such as warpers, spoolers, carders and speeder-tenders.

At present the two unions are divided on national lines—the highly skilled United Textile Workers being mostly English and French-Canadians while the members and supporters of the N. T. W. U. are in the main Portuguese and Polish.

If the present organization drive is to mean anything it must immediately break down the national barriers and have the English, French-Canadians, Portuguese and Polish workers unite in a common struggle. One of the greatest weaknesses of the 1928 strike from the point of view of the Left wing union, was the division on national lines. The inability of the N. T. W. U. to gain more than a score of supporters among the English and French-Canadian workers was one of the principal reasons why the Left wing was not more successful than it actually was. If the membership of the N. T. W. U. had been more varied in composition the sellout of the strike by the United Textile Workers Union in September 1928 may not have succeeded.

In brief: the present organization drive, which the N. T. W. U. says is leading up to a general strike, to be successful must be a broad movement, otherwise it will fail. All workers must participate and be given responsible positions. Let the Stalinist leadership forsake their factional game, which only discredits the Left wing and gives ammunition to Lovestone, and the New Bedford workers in 1930 will more than repeat their heroic struggle of two years ago. —FRANK BROMLEY

The writings of L. D. Trotsky are the richest and most fruitful contributions being made to the labor and revolutionary movements today. There is not a problem that great Bolshevik touches which is not immediately illuminated in all its aspect. And the problems he deals with concern the most vital interests of the whole movement.

The international labor and Communist movements are in a critical situation. Never has the need for clarity been so urgent as it is today. Never has the need for straight Marxist thinking been so pressing. Nobody is doing more in this field than Trotsky.

The situation in the Soviet Union, the fountain-head of the revolutionary movement today, which offers so many complexities to the average observer, is made clear and understandable by Trotsky's writings. In fact, the course of events in the Soviet Union and the Russian Communist Party can be evaluated properly only by a reading of the works of the Russian Opposition which Trotsky speaks for and leads.

In the United States, Trotsky's writing appear regularly in the Militant. Just as the first writings of Lenin in this country became a mighty instrument for the molding of the revolutionary movement years ago, the writings of Trotsky now are playing the same role in the movement at a different stage.

Among the articles by Trotsky that have appeared in the Militant recently are: Disarmament and the United States of Europe. Syndicalism and Communism. The Austrian Crisis and Communism. Who is Leading the Communist International? What is Happening in China? Twelve years of the Russian Revolution. The Defense of the Soviet Union and the Opposition, Etc. Etc. No active worker can afford to be without these contributions which appear only in the Militant.

In 1930, the Militant plans to continue the publication of Trotsky's writing, which will include some of the most brilliant work he has yet done in the course of his years in the revolutionary movement. The best way to insure getting these copies of the Militant regularly, is to subscribe for a year. A yearly subscription is $2.00 or $1.00 for six months.

The Indian Revolution at the Cross-roads

By Max Shachtman

The resolution adopted by the Indian National Congress last month on the initiative of Mahatma Ghandi, which gives formal approval to "complete Indian independence" from the British empire as the goal of the Congress, is of tremendous importance, not so much for itself but for the temper of the Indian masses which it mirrors. And what characterizes the present spirit of the latter is much less the lukewarm if sonorous phrases of the elements which dominated the Congress than the militant action of the workers in Bombay on Independence Day (1-26-30) particularly the mill workers who attempted to hoist the Red Flag not only in place of the Union Jack but also of the red-green-white flag of Indian nationalism.

To grasp the enormous significance of a genuine revolutionary movement in India, a land embracing some three hundred million people—a fifth of the world's population—its place in the mosaic of British imperialism must first be established.

A Keystone in the British Empire

Out of every ten people in the British Empire, black, brown, yellow and white, more than seven are in India alone. From the very first days of the conquest of India by Britain and the ousting of the Portuguese and other mercantile pirates, the country has been a source of almost inexhaustible loot for the Englishman. The British bourgeoisie still remembers with satisfaction and longing the days of the notorious East India Company, whose profits frequently mounted to 250 percent a year. The period of ruthless primitive accumulation for British industrial capitalism was greatly accelerated by the plundering of India and the impoverishment of its millions. As a source of markets and raw materials for Britain India has occupied an almost unrivalled position in the scheme of the Empire.

In more recent times, it has offered an immense field for capital investments. The British investment in India today is estimated at more than one billion pounds sterling, or a larger sum than that of all the other British dominions combined. In four post-war years alone, from 1919 to 1923, British capital exported to India increased 1800 percent, from 1,400,000 pounds to 25,300,000 pounds, and constituted a change in the capital exported by Britain to all parts of the world from six-tenths of one percent to fourteen and four-tenths percent of the total, or an increase in the Indian proportion of British capital exports of 2400 percent. India is not only a source for capital exports. One-tenth of general British exports go to India—more than any other single country in the world—and represents 70 percent of India's total imports.

India has even more than an economic-financial importance in the British Empire; it is of incalculable strategical value. It is not for nothing that priceless India has been the central objective of British Mediterranean and Oriental policy for virtually centuries. It is not for nothing that every European maritime power has sought enviously at one time or another for a route to India. The fabulous riches that spurred Columbus to cross the Atlantic exist today in an even more substantial and developed form. The Gibraltar guards not only Egypt but India, Malta and Cyprus are stations on the road to India and so is the Suez canal. A look at the map will further show that India forms the apex of a rough triangle, the basis of which is formed by a line drawn between South Africa and Australia; that India is a guardian towering over Afghanistan and Arabia, in which England is heavily interested; that India neighbors upon that second great Oriental field for imperialist buccaneering, China; that India forms an unrivalled basis for Asiatic and Pacific power for the country that dominates it.

Loss of India a Fatal Blow

The loss of India would be a fatal blow to the British Empire, compared to which the loss of even Ireland or being driven entirely out of China would take second place. That is why England prizes India as highly as a pauper would value the Koh-i-noor. Not a single political party or group in England, with the exception of the Communists has the slightest intention of ever granting India genuine freedom. The policy of England towards its possession has been stated with harsh frankness in the noted "steel frame" speech of Lloyd George in Commons (8-2-1922): "That Britain under no circumstances... has responsibility in India is a cardinal principle, not merely of the present Government, but of any Government which will command the confidence of the people in this country... I can see no period when India can dispense with the guidance and the assistance of this small nucleus of the British Civil Service... They are the steel frame of the whole structure."

With no essential changes, this policy has been pursued in India by every British government, be it Tory, Liberal, Coalition—or Labor. In two words, therefore, to find the forces and interests making for a movement to liberate India, one must look anywhere but in the ranks of British imperialism. The latter will never voluntarily yield its domination. The driving forces of the Indian revolution are consequently centered in India itself, even more so now than a few years ago because of the weakening of the revolutionary proletarian movement in England—the only other reservoir of Indian freedom.

What elements in India constitute these driving forces? In the first place, they are not the big Indian bourgeoisie or the native princes. The latter exist largely on the sufferance of Britain and are more or less satisfied with their present status. Imperialism exerts no particularly harassing pressure upon them. The former is an avowedly counter-revolutionary force. Much as it would like a larger share in the unequal partnership it has established with its British master, it likes infinitely more the suppression of every mass movement that threatens its social and economic position in the slightest. There is no movement away from Britain that has not been opposed by the native big bourgeoisie and the Liberal Federation. They can be counted upon to act hand in hand with the British bourgeoisie in crushing any struggle of the masses for the improvement of their economic conditions, not to speak of their liberation from the imperialist yoke.

The Nationalist Bourgeoisie

The second factor in the Indian struggle is the petty bourgeoisie in its various sections: landlords, merchants, professionals, small manufacturers, civil service employees, students, intellectuals, etc., etc. Having no really broad basis, and no over-secure economic position, they must rely for their troops upon the millions of workers and peasants. They are for the development of a native industry, by bounties if possible (Swaraj Party), for protection, for the decreasing of the heavy burdens of taxation, for the abolition of the irksome color discrimination that exists in governmental institutions, for a more decisive voice in the management of India's affairs and destiny.

But the national petty bourgeoisie constantly vacillates between its troops—the workers and peasants—and the class interests to which it is inherently inclined, to the big bourgeoisie and to compromise with British imperialism. It has always been ready in the past to accept some form of dominion status, which will allow it greater freedom of action and a larger measure of influence in India, without allowing the movement of the masses to "get out of hand". It lives in respect for the might of the British master and fear of a developing movement of the workers and peasants. On more than one occasion it has already demonstrated that when the miserably impoverished masses really enter the path of struggle against imperialism the role of the petty bourgeoisie is to sap the vitality of the movement, to misdirect its energies, to curb and limit it, and if necessary to betray it into the hands of British imperialism.

The Indian national bourgeoisie cannot and will not lead a revolutionary struggle against imperialism. It cannot and will not solve any of the fundamental problems that now strangle the development of India. It cannot and will not free the workers and peasants from the British and Indian chains that fetter them. If anything, its role will be even more rather than less ignominious and treacherous than the deceptive, murderous role played by the Chinese national bourgeoisie in the revolution of 1925-27 and thereafter. It will lead the masses of workers and peasants only to the extent that the latter can be used as a club with which to extort from England certain concessions for the national bourgeoisie, as obedient troops who can be ordered to advance or retreat as the class interests of the bourgeoisie dictate at the moment. But so far as the interests of the workers and peasants themselves are concerned, whether they are viewed from the angle of the struggle against British imperialism, or the native capitalists, users and landlords, the native bourgeoisie will lead them only to defeat and slaughter.

That the nationalist leaders, from Ghandi to Nehru, have apparently moved to the "Left" in the recent period, under the pressure of the masses, is just an indication of the fact that they will make every attempt to head the mass movement in order to behead it the moment it presents a serious danger to British imperial rule and their hoped-for class domination in the future.

To put a pennyworth of confidence in the capacity of the nationalist bourgeoisie and its leaders to conduct a genuine struggle against imperialism is to prepare and permit the strangulation of the Indian revolution in the same manner as the national bourgeoisie rode to power over the backs of the Chinese workers and peasants. The conclusion flows not only from the bitter experiences of the Chinese revolution, but from the recent past of the Indian movement itself.

Ghandi's Record

Will Ghandi, for example, who introduced the apparently "revolutionary" resolution at the Congress, lead or participate in a real struggle against British imperialism? His whole record proves the folly of such a belief. From the days when he organized an ambulance corps for service on the side of British imperialism in the Boer War, and his war record as a chauvinist servant of Britain, down to more recent times when he has defended propertied interests in every workers struggle or strike, Ghandi has played a reactionary role (not to speak of his semi-feudal "economic" theories or his spiritualistic and mystical confusionism).

Or do the actions of Ghandi and all the rest of the national bourgeoisie in the period after the war inspire any confidence that their real role is anything but the restraining and betrayal of the movement and interests of the masses? It is sufficient to recall the period between 1919 and 1922, when the liberation struggle reached a high point, with millions participating. The Empire was really in danger. Demonstrations, strikes and various other struggles swept the whole country. The visit of the Prince of Wales was the occasion for magnificent demonstrations of mass antagonism and resistance to British imperialism. The temper of the masses was approaching a high pitch. At Chauri Chaura and Bareilly, conflicts took place between the workers and poor peasants and the authorities.

The role of Ghandi and the Congress was to stab the movement in the back, nothing less. The struggle was officially called off at the notorious Bardoli meeting which adopted a resolution deploring "the inhuman conduct of the mob at Chauri Chaura in having brutally murdered constables and wantonly burned police (stations)" and demanding of the peasants that they recontinue the payment of taxes to the government and rent to the landlords! The contemptible middle class hoof of the hallowed Ghandis was revealed—as it always is and always will be—as soon as the storm of a mass movement of workers and peasants swept the country and threatened the existence of British imperialism and the "rights" of the landlords. The Bardoli resolution expressed in a classic manner the real role of the national bourgeoisie in the colonial struggle against imperialism: to stand by its foreign master, by the native landlord and business man against the masses of workers and peasants.

It is not the national bourgeoisie that will lead the Indian revolution. It will only mislead it. Its role will be no more glorious than the role of the Russian Kerenskys and the Chinese Chiang Kai-Sheks. The Indian revolution will not succeed as a "democratic revolution" carried on by a so-called "revolutionary democratic alliance." It will be successful only if it is led by the Indian proletariat, already quite numerous and enriched by many militant battles, supported by the mass of horribly pauperized tillers of the soil. It is quite true that there are gigantic difficulties in the way greater in many respects than those that confronted the Chinese workers and peasants. It is also true that the course pursued by the revolutionary elements particularly by the Communist International, in the past few years, has not facilitated the success of the struggle—it has made it harder and introduced the most ridiculous and calamitous confusion into the situation.

At the Cross-Roads

But these difficulties are decreased at the present moment by the revolutionary situation that is developing at such a rapid pace. Under the concentrating pressure of such a situation, mistakes and shortcomings of the past can be swiftly rectified—or lead swiftly to catastrophe. A rectification is now an essential requirement that dare not be postponed, precisely because the Indian revolution now stands at the cross-roads: it can travel either the path of the 1927 debacle in China or the 1917 victory in Russia.

As for the workers and peasants, the shortcomings of the past, the mistakes of the present, the character of the coming revolution, the question of the Communist Party—all the problems of decisive consequence—a consideration of these points require and must be left to another article.

Stalinists Disrupt Minneapolis T. U. U. L. Conference

MINNEAPOLIS—Although the T.U.U.L. unfurled its banner at Cleveland several months ago with a call to the wide masses of workers for struggle on all fronts, the first district conference held in the northwest opened its one session today with expulsions of three well-known militant workers.

C. R. Hedlund presented credentials from the Railroad Council of Minneapolis, the only militant group of railroad workers in this city. His credential was not only turned down by the credential committee, but he was denounced in the conference as a "Trotskyist". Further than this the railroad workers' problems were not considered.

The same treatment was accorded Arnold Ronn of Superior who presented credentials from the Central Co-operative Exchange of that city.

Representing the women's section of the co-operatives, Helen Ronkenan, who came down from the Twin-Ports as a fraternal delegate, was also refused a seat.

The complexion of the conference was anything but reassuring to one at all familiar with the workers' movement in this section. Of the fifty men and women present, less than a half dozen represented any one except themselves. The Stalinist functionaries were there in force. The district had been carefully worked. The result was a party membership meeting—not a Trade Union convention. A long list of speeches by party bureaucrats, a still longer list of resolutions presented by the same people, together with the maneuvers both before and after the expulsions, give a fairly good picture of the meeting. If anything really constructive was accomplished it was not apparent to the writer. The great harm that would proceed from the narrow sectarian line given at the conference, in other circumstances, is minimized by the fact that the official party apparatus and its hangers-on have little contact with the workers movement here and still less authority.

$81,000,000 CORPORATION REFUSES TO PAY 37 CENTS AN HOUR

CAMBRIDGE, Mass.—Rather than pay the extra 2 cents an hour provided by the state's minimum wage law, the wealthy Harvard University corporation has fired 20 scrubwomen without notice. The Harvard Scrub Women's Protective Aid Society, believed to have been started by students, is soliciting pennies to make up the Harvard budget so the women may not be jobless. They were getting 35 cents an hour, or $10.50 a week.

Some of the discharged scrub women were reemployed as chambermaids for the dormitories at 32 cents an hour. Chambermaids do not come under the minimum wage provisions. Harvard investments, listed at $81,000,000, have been swelled another $5,000,000 by a recent donation.

N. Y. TELEPHONE GRABS $14,000,000 MORE

NEW YORK—"To prevent confiscation of its property", the New York Telephone Co., Bell subsidiary, has announced a flat increase of $1.25 a month in business rates and 50 cents for residence phones. The increase, to net $14,000,000 for the already profitable company, was obtained through the courtesy of the federal courts.

The «Third Period» of the Comintern's Mistakes

Crises of Conjuncture and the Revolutionary Crisis in Capitalism

By L. D. Trotsky

At the Fifth Congress of the Confederation General du Travail Unitaire, A. Vassart made a lengthy speech against Chambelland*, which was later published as a pamphlet, with a foreword by Jean Brecot. In his speech, Vassart attempts to defend the revolutionary perspective against the reformist perspective. In this respect, our sympathies are entirely on his side. But unfortunately he defends the revolutionary perspective with such arguments as can bring only advantages to the reformists. In his speech, there is included a series of fatal theoretical and factual mistakes. One may object: Are there so few mistaken speeches in the world? Vassart can still learn a great deal. I myself would be glad to think so. But it has been made difficult by the fact that the speech has been published in the form of a propaganda pamphlet. It is provided with a foreword by Jean Brecot who is at least a cousin to Monmousseau himself, and this gives the pamphlet a programmatic character. The fact that not only the author, but also the editor who prepared it for publication, did not perceive the enormous mistakes is witness to the sad state of the theoretical level of the present leaders of French Communism. Jean Brecot does not tire of smashing the Marxist Opposition. What he ought to do, as we shall soon demonstrate, is simply to sit down and study his A. B. C. S. Leadership of the labor movement is incompatible with ignorance, as Marx once said to Weitling.

At the congress, Chambelland expressed the superficial thought—based decisively on nothing but the reformist tendencies of the speaker—that capitalist stabilization will last for about another thirty-four years, that is, that even the new generation of the proletariat which is just coming forward cannot count upon the revolutionary seizure of power. Chambelland brought no serious arguments to substantiate his fantastic period of time. Whereas, the historical experience of the past two decades and the theoretical analysis of the present situation speak wholly against Chambelland's perspective.

But let us see how Vassart refutes him. He proves first of all that even before the war the capitalist system could not exist without convulsions. "From 1850 to 1910, an economic crisis took place approximately every 14 years (!?) bred by the capitalist system." (Page 14.) And further on: "If, before the war, the crisis took place every 14 years, we see a contradiction between this fact and the assertions of Chambelland who does not foresee a serious crisis before forty years." (Page 15).

It is not difficult to understand that with this sort of argument, Vassart, who confuses crises of conjuncture with the revolutionary crisis of capitalism as a whole, only strengthens the false position of Chambelland.

First of all, the establishment of the conjuncture cycle at 14 years is rather surprising. Where did Vassart get this figure? We hear it for the first time. And how is it that Jean Brecot, who instructs us so authoritatively, (almost as authoritatively as Monmousseau himself) did not notice such a crass mistake, especially in such a question that has such an immediate, such a vital significance for the trade union movement? Prior to the war, every trade unionist knew that crises or at least depressions recurred every seven or eight years. If we take the period of a century and a half, we find that one crisis was never separated from the other by more than eleven years. The average duration of the cycle was about eight and a half years, and furthermore, as was shown by the pre-war period, the conjuncture rhythm had a tendency not to slacken but to accelerate, which is bound up with the renewal of technical machinery. In the post-war years, the changes of conjuncture had a disorderly character, which was expressed by the fact that the crises recurred more frequently than before the war. How does it happen that leading French trade unionists do not know such elementary facts? Especially how can one lead a strike movement without having in mind a realistic picture of the changes of economic conjuncture? Every serious Communist can and must put this question to the leaders of the C. G. T. U., primarily to Monmousseau—and that squarely.

That is how the matter stands from the point of view of the facts... It is no better from the methodological point of view. What does Vassart actually prove? That capitalist development is generally inconceivable without conjuncture contradictions; they existed before the war and will exist in the future. It is doubtful if even Chambelland would deny this commonplace. But from this there does not as yet flow any revolutionary perspective. On the contrary: if for the past century and a half the capitalist world passed through eighteen crises, then there is no basis for the conclusion that capitalism must fall with the nineteenth or twentieth. In actuality, conjuncture cycles in the life of capitalism play the same role as is played, for example, by the cycles of blood circulation in the life of an organism. From the periodicity of the crises, there flows just as little the conclusion of the inevitability of the revolution, as the inevitability of death—from a rhythmic pulse.

At the Third Congress of the Comintern (1921), the ultra-Leftists of the time (Bucharin, Zinoviev, Radek, Thaelmann, Thalheimer, Pepper, Bela Kun and others) calculated that capitalism would never again know an industrial revival because it had entered the final ("Third") period, which would develop on the basis of a permanent crisis until the very revolution. Around this question, a big ideological struggle took place at the Third Congress. My report was devoted to a considerable extent to proving the idea that in the epoch of imperialism the laws determining the change in industrial cycles remain in effect and that conjuncture vacillations will be characteristic of capitalism as long as it exists: the pulse ceases only with death. But from the state of the pulse, in conjunction with other symptoms, a doctor can determine whether he is dealing with a strong or weak organism, a healthy or a sick one. (Of course, I do not speak of doctors of the Monmousseau school.) Vassart however makes the attempt to prove the inevitability and proximity of the revolution on the basis of the fact that crises and booms take place every 14 years.

Vassart could easily have avoided these gross errors if he had at least made a study of the report and discussion at the Third Congress of the Comintern. But, unfortunately, the most important documents of the first four Congresses, when genuine Marxist ideology ruled the Comintern, are now prohibited literature. For the new generation of leaders, the history of Marxist thought begins with the Fifth Congress, particularly with the unfortunate Tenth Plenum of the E. C. C. I. The principal crime of the dull and blind bureaucratic apparatus consists in the mechanical interpretation of theoretical traditions.

Economic Conjuncture and Radicalization of the Masses

If Vassart does not know the mechanics of business cycles and does not understand the relationship between conjuncture crises and revolutionary crises of the capitalist system as a whole, then the dialectical interdependence of the economic conjuncture and the struggle of the working class is just as unclear to him. Vassart conceives this dependence just as mechanically as his opponent Chambelland, although their conclusions are directly contrary, and moreover erroneous to the same degree.

Chambelland says: "Radicalization of the masses is in a certain sense the barometer which makes it possible to evaluate the condition of capitalism in a given country. If capitalism is in a state of decline the masses are necessarily radicalized." (Page 23.) From this Chambelland draws the conclusion that because the strikes embrace only the periphery of the workers, because metallurgical and chemical industries are affected only to a slight degree, capitalism is not as yet in decline. Before him there is still a forty years' period of development.

What does Vassart answer to this? Chambelland, according to him, "does not see the radicalization because he does not see the new methods of exploitation." (Page 30.) Vassart in every respect repeats the thought that if one recognizes the intensified exploitation and understands that it will develop further, "that in itself compels you to reply affirmatively to the question of the radicalization of the masses." (Page 31.)

When one reads these polemics, he gets the impression of two blind-folded men trying to catch each other. It is not true that a crisis always and under all circumstances radicalizes the masses. Example: Italy, Spain, the Balkans, etc. It is not true that the radicalism of the working class necessarily corresponds with the period of capitalism's decline. Example: Chartism in England, etc. Like Chambelland, Vassart also ignores the living history of the labor movement in the name of dead forms. Wrong also is Chambelland's conclusion itself: From the fact, that strikes have not as yet embraced the main mass of French workers, one must by no means deduce a denial of the beginning of radicalization; but what can and must be arrived at is a concrete evaluation of the extent, depth and intensity of this radicalization. Chambelland, evidently, agrees to believe in it only after the whole working class is engaged in an offensive. But such leaders who wish to start only when everything is ready, are not needed by the working class. One must be able to see the first, even though weak, symptoms of revival, while only in the economic sphere, adapt one's tactics to it and attentively follow the development of the process. Meantime one must not disregard, even for an hour, the general nature of our epoch, which has proved more than once and will yet prove, that between the first symptoms of revival and stormy upsurge which creates a revolutionary situation, not forty years but perhaps only a fifth or a tenth of that are required.

This matter stands no better with Vassart. He simply establishes a mechanical parallel between exploitation and radicalization. How can the radicalization of the masses be denied, Vassart says irritably, if exploitation grows from day to day? This is childish metaphysics, quite in the spirit of Bucharin. Radicalization must be proved not by deductions but by facts. The conclusion of Vassart can be turned into its opposite without difficulty. It is sufficient to put a question like this: How could the capitalists increase exploitation from day to day if they were confronted by the radicalization of the masses? It is precisely the absence of fighting spirit in the masses that permits an increase of exploitation. True, such reasoning without qualifications would also be one-sided, but still a lot nearer to life than Vassart's constructions.

The trouble is that the growth of exploitation does not under all circumstances raise the fighting spirit of the proletariat. Thus, with a declining conjuncture, with the growth of unemployment, particularly after lost battles, increased exploitation does not breed radicalization of the masses, but quite the contrary, the falling of spirit, dispersal and disintegration. We saw, that, for example, in the English coal mining industry right after the strike of 1926. We saw it on a still larger scale in Russia when the industrial crisis of 1907 fell with the wrecking of the 1905 revolution. If in the past two years the growth of exploitation in France brought about the evident growth of the strike movement, the ground for it was created by the rise in the economic conjuncture and not its decline.

False Revolutionaries Fear Economic Processes

But the ultra-Left opportunists leading the Comintern fear a rise in industry as economic "counter-revolution". Their radicalism leans on a weak reed. For the further rise of industry, business conjuncture would in the very first place have delivered a mortal blow to their stupid theories of the "third and last period". These people deduce revolutionary perspectives not from the real process of contradictions but from false schemas. And from this flow their fatal mistakes in tactics.

It may seem quite improbable that at the Congress of the C. G. T. U. in France the official orators tried above all to depict the affairs of French capitalism in the most piteous form. Loudly exaggerating the present swing of the strike movement, the French Stalinists at the same time gave such a characterization of French industry as would make strike struggles absolutely hopeless in the future. Among them was Vassart. Precisely because he, together with Monmousseau, does not distinguish between the crisis of capitalism and the conjuncture crisis, and figures this time together with Chambelland, that a conjuncture rise might further remove the revolution to a period of decades, Vassart is apprehensive of an industrial rise. On page 21-24 of his pamphlet, he proves that the present industrial revival in France is "artificial" and "momentary" (page 24). At the December national committee meeting, Richetat diligently painted the French textile industry as being in a state of crisis. If this is the case it means that the strike movement which so far served as the only indication of radicalization has no economic foundation under itself or is losing it rapidly. To say the least, by anticipation Vassart and Richetat give the representatives of capital a priceless argument against economic concessions to the workers and what is more important they give decisive arguments to the reformists against economic strikes, for it must be understood that from a perspective of chronic crisis one can by no means draw a perspective of increasing economic struggles.

Do not these sorry-syndicalists follow the economic press? But, they may say, the capitalist press deliberately parades its optimism. However, it is not a question of editorials here. From day to day, from month to month, the press publishes the market reports, the balances of the banks, commercial and industrial enterprises and railroads. Some of the totals involved have already been printed in No. 12 of *Verite. The more recent figures are further proof of the rising tendency of French industry. The last economic weekly to reach me, Le Temps (October 9, 1929), carries for instance, a report of a general meeting of the stockholders of the metallurgical enterprises of the North and East of France. We do not know M. Quivelette's attitude to the philosophy of the "Third Period" and we admit that we are not very much interested. But nevertheless he can very well sum up profits and cut dividends. Quivelette sums up the total of the past year in the following phrase: "The condition of the domestic market has been exceptionally favorable." This formula, I hope, has nothing in common with platonic optimism because it is strengthened by forty franc dividends on stock instead of the twenty-five franc franc dividend the year before. We ask: Has or has not this fact an importance for the economic struggles in the metal industry? It would seem that it has. But unfortunately, behind the back of Quivelette we see the figures of Vassart and Brecot or that of Monmousseau himself, and we hear their voice: "Don't believe the words of this capitalist optimist who does not know that he is up to his ears in the third period!" Isn't it clear that if a worker makes the mistake of believing on this question, Monmousseau and not Quivelette, he will have to come to the conclusion that he has no ground under his feet for successful economic struggle, to say nothing of an offensive.

The Monmousseau school—if one may

*We can only welcome the fact that La Verite has introduced monthly economic reviews. The first article (No. 12) gives an excellent outline for the need of economic orientation for every Communist in the Party as well as in the trade union work. Particularly the Oppositionists must rely on this side of the matter: the establishment of a correct revolutionary perspective, based on a Marxist analysis of facts and figures, not only in opposition to the empty babblings of Cachin and Monmousseau, but also to the political fiction of some gentlemen who have wandered into the ranks of the Opposition by mistake.

Throughout the World of Labor

The Developments in Germany

The German working class is now going through a far severer period of economic and moral depression than even the most pessimistic tables of statisticians can describe. It takes an insight into the conditions of the average proletarian family to establish this. Vegetable-butter (margarine is found everywhere at the workman's table instead of butter. The diet is entirely devoid of eggs. Only the most meager portions of meat find their way to the worker's stomach. Malt coffee has displaced bean coffee, and so on without end. In short, the working class diet consists in large measure of what was termed during the war and inflation periods ersatz-lebensmittel (substitute products).

Professor Kucinski, a bourgeois economist has figured out that the worker receives in wages only 85% of what he needs for a minimum standard of living! This at the same time that German industry increases its production by leaps and bounds. And yet the reformists, still backed by a give such a title to an institution where people are taught to unlearn thinking, reading and writing—is afraid of an economic rise. It must be said plainly that for the French working class, which has renewed its composition at least twice—during the years of the war and after the war, having included in its ranks tremendous numbers of youth, women and foreigners—and is far from having fused this raw mass together in its melting pot—for the French working class, the further development of an industrial rise would have created an incomparable school, would have welded its strength, would have proved to the most backward sections their meaning and role in the capitalist mechanism, and would thereby have raised class consciousness as a whole to new heights. Two or three years, even one year, of a broad, successful economic struggle would give rebirth to the proletariat. After a properly utilized economic rise, a conjunctural crisis might give a serious impetus to a genuine political radicalization of the masses.

At the same time, it must not be forgotten that wars and revolutions in our epoch result not from conjunctural crises but from the contradictions between the development of the productive forces on the one hand and the bourgeois characteristic of national boundaries on the other carried to their climax. Imperialist war and the October revolution have succeeded in showing the strain of these contradictions. The new role of America has developed them further. The more serious a character the development of the productive forces has in one country or another, or in a series of countries, the faster a new rise in industry will find itself confronted with the basic contradiction of world industry and the sharper will be the reaction—economic, political, domestic and international. A serious industrial rise would be at all events, not a minus but a tremendous plus for French Communism, creating a mighty strike forerunner to a political offensive. Conclusion: there will be no lack of revolutionary situations. It is quite likely, however, that there will be a lack of ability to utilize them.

But is the further rising development of the French industrial conjuncture guaranteed? This we cannot dare to confirm. Here all sorts of possibilities remain open. At any rate, it does not depend on us. What does depend on us, and what we are obliged to do, is not to close our eyes to facts in the name of pitiful schema, but to take the course of economic development as it really is and to work out trade union tactics on the basis of real facts. We speak in the given case of tactics in distinction to strategy, which is determined, of course, not by conjunctural changes but by basic tendencies of development. But if tactics are subordinated to strategy then, on the other hand, strategy is realized only through tactics.

To the Comintern as well as the Profintern, tactics consist in periodic zig-zags, and strategy—in the mechanical sum of zig-zags. That is why the proletarian vanguard suffers defeat after defeat. Prinkipo. December 22, 1929 majority of the working class, shout: Accumulate! Accumulate! For them the way out of this working class misery lies in the accumulation of capital in Germany.

There are more than 3,000,000 unemployed in the Reich, more than half a million in Berlin alone. There is hardly a family in proletarian Berlin that hasn't its stempelbruder. Unemployment insurance, of which the "social" state, Germany, so proudly boasts as against the unsocial U.S., is hardly enough to keep its recipient alive. The result is that the unemployed fill the "welfare offices" and "aid societies" day after day and are forced to degrade themselves to virtual beggars. The moral effects can be imagined.

The coalition government of the Reich is very shaky. It has done its work. It has brought about the reduction in unemployment insurance and the arbitration clauses through Wissel; it has cast the burden of the taxes on the working class through Hilferding. Severing's anti-Communist "Law for the Protection of the Republic" complete the circuit. Finance capital is preparing the boot for its social democratic lackeys. It needs more "resolute" servants for its purpose in the period to come.

The entire German economic system of the immediate future will live in the shadow of the recent Wall Street crash. A German economic journal writes on this:

"It is probable that at least partially the economic cooperation of similarly constructed concerns of the countries involved will take place of the formerly customary loan grants, namely, those made to the large industrial states like Germany, for instance, which (economic cooperation) powerful American capitalist enterprises will finance." (Zeitschrift d. Deutsch-Amerl. Wirtschaft, Ver., December, 1929)...

The favorable German industrial conditions, to be made yet more favorable by the greater depression of the German working masses soon to follow, now attract all the capital that formerly went to the prosperity-promising American industry. This means an advanced internationalization of industrial capital and a firmer grip on the latter by world finance capital (Morgan and Co.). How this works out in Germany may be gathered from the growing dictatorial strength of Morgan's German representative, Hjalmar Schacht, the president of the Reichsbank. Herr Schacht is the man who tumbled Hilferding from his ministerial chair, because he was not far-reaching enough in his "reforms" and because, for reasons of political demagoguery, he didn't go in energetically for immediately carrying out these reforms. Schacht is also the leader in the movement for the "decommunalization" of Germany, i. e., for the abolition of communal expenditure. (An example of ringing success is Mr. Schacht's plans was shown recently in Berlin, where the city council voted a Christmas surplus for the unemployed, which the magistrate, under Schacht's direction immediately repudiated.

In German politics, the situation finds a mirror and barometer. The coalition government is nearing the end of its string. Its prospective collapse is on the order of the day. The national "Right" is in a deep crisis. Those elements backed by heavy industry, like the Landbund and Stahlhelm, are breaking way from the irreconcilable Rights around Hugenburg and Hitler and are going in for a policy of supporting the status quo of the republic, because "it is developing in a direction towards us". Even Hitler is willing to "listen to reason". His papers are full of praise for Schacht, and despite all their radicalism and sham "revolutionary socialism" they write that they are for such a payment of reparations as the "nation finds bearable."

The C. P. of Germany is thus facing a very serious but promising state of conditions. Its victory in the Berlin elections was a real one, all the more significant because the Party campaign program was altogether out of proportions to real affairs—to the "Left". It is no exaggeration to say that a considerable majority of the Berlin proletariat is behind the Party and places all its confidence in it. Whether the party will be able to hold this mass and increase it depends entirely upon how much sanity it will apply in its tactics in the trade unions and towards the increasingly disillusioned workers who still follow the S. P. while discontent within the reformist organization is growing, while rebellion against the treacherous leadership is brewing.

As a whole, the party seems to have sobered a good deal lately. The calls to arms echo very faintly in the press today. In the trade unions as well as in the party itself, the stress is being laid on organizational work. But the ultra-Left tactic of "revolutionary" kampfleitungen (struggle leadership) and separate factory councils lists has not been given up and may still do it much harm. In many factories (e. g., Ullstein, Simiens) where the largest Communist nuclei exist, these nuclei have pitted themselves almost unanimously against the party tactic. In the question of "social fascism", the Communist workers have solved the problem in their own way. They explain to the S.P. workers in discussion that the word is applied only to the social democratic leaders, to the "comrade"-ministers, etc.

The campaign of terror which the authorities and the bourgeois press have been conducting for some time against the party and the militant sections of the class is taking on ever greater proportions. Falsification, slander and provocation fill the air. The revolutionary masses are increasingly aroused to counteract violently to this terror, and the party functionaries sweat blood to keep the people in check at demonstrations and public meetings. The party's effort to connect the active discontent of the unemployed with solidarity actions of the workers in the factories is to be applauded. But here too it will not do to restrict oneself to phrases alone.

On the occasion of initiating a formal "Stalin cult", the Rote Fahne has not overlooked any opportunities to make personal attacks upon comrade Trotsky. It is significant to note who the attackers are, and how they attack. Heinz Neumann, accused by the social democrats and the Brandlerites (without any refutation up-to-date) of being in close connection with the German police is the star—using the occasion of a review of Willi Munzenburg's latest book "Die Dritte Front". He pits Munzenburg's "collective" spirit against Trotsky's "gnawing egotism". This is just too ridiculous, even when we overlook the incongruity of the comparison. For, as you know, upon Munzenburg's head hang the following charges made by Herzog, the editor of Das Forum: breaking the foreign trade monopoly of the Soviet Union, speculating with goods sent to relieve the Russian famine in 1921, misappropriation of W. I. R. funds—all for personal purposes. As far as I know Munzenburg has not as yet made answer to these charges.

While Willi does a thriving business with his newspaper-concerns, and lives in princely luxury in his home at "In den Zelten," comrade Trotsky, the "egoist" lives the life of exile in backward Turkey, refused a visum by the rest of the planet. Perhaps Heinz Neumann will make us believe that this ban is due to nothing more than Trotsky's "gnawing egotism". The workers know better. They know that in Trotsky, the bourgeois world fears the personification of that "haunting specter" that is rocking the foundations of the capitalist system, of victorious Communism.

The Brandlerites have had considerable success lately—in a material way: they have finally begun to publish a daily which appears in Leipzig. In Berlin, their publications have to be sought for with a search-light.

How Brandler goes about in organizing his international faction may be seen from his article on the amalgamation of the three Czecho-Slovakian opportunist groups. Brandler was present on the scene of action. His role can only be imagined. He writes, among other things:

"Only when the united opposition applies the united front tactic wrongly will the confederation (amalgamation) be, not a step forward, but a retreat. But there is no occasion to assume this, despite (!) the false formula of 'class conscious parties' (referring to united front with the social democrats.—S. G. See last issue of Militant.—Ed.) in the unity resolution." (Gegen den Strom, No. 1, 1930.)

Brandler reprints Lovestone's articles on the International, which are only an echo of his own and Roy's articles. Where Roy writes: "It is unfortunate that the factional struggle in the C. P. S. U. lost such valuable revolutionaries as Trotsky for the movement", Lovestone, for his own purposes, substitutes Zinoviev for Trotsky, and Brandler adds a little note, remarking that after Lenin's death, Zinoviev never played an independent role in the International. A similar instance of "differences" is Roys "polemic" against Wolfe, in which he criticizes the latter's theory that the resolutions of the Sixth Congress were correct, but were revised at the Tenth Plenum. Here too, the theory is made to fit "national" purposes.

I visited a Brandler meeting recently. Brandler gave a pretty accurate appraisal of conditions in Germany, from which there was much to learn. When he was asked in the discussion part how the Communist Party and the International came to be in such a position of impotence at present, he simply answered that this condition is due to the failure of the revolution to arrive in the rest of Europe and to the increasing difficulties in the building up of socialism in Russia. Almost in the form of asides, he remarked that the failure of the revolution in Germany in 1923 was due to the threat of the Entente to come to the aid of bourgeois Germany (!) and further: "Even the skilled leadership of Marx and Engels was not able to hold together the First International, built on centralized direction. Its decomposition showed that it is necessary that the proletariat of each country work out its own problems in the struggle for power."

Communist Injunctions. . . .

The 3rd period according to the 6th World Congress, represents a critical stage in the class struggle against capitalism... great industrial strikes, increasing unemployment, growing crisis, etc. etc.

In Canada, beginning with Aug. 1, 1929, the shades of the Third Period were more visible than ever before. The Party had openly challenged the Toronto police force on the issue of freedom of the streets, free speech and assembly. Unfortunately, the failure of the Party to mobilize the masses had doomed the struggle almost from the beginning as to its possible success in forcing reactionary powers in Toronto to withdraw their edict making the revolutionary movement semi-illegal.

But in spite of the buoyant boasting and revolutionary chatter of the Party leadership the membership and working class were soon to be treated to the spectacle of a form of the class struggle of the A. F. of L. fakers. On Oct. 9, Jack McDonald, secretary of the C. P. of Canada, R. E. Knowles, Jr., a petty bourgeois liberal and J. W. Gill, a social democrat and petty bourgeois storekeeper filled and filed an injunction against the Toronto police force, for trying to suppress the class struggle.

But fortunately for the powers that be, the bourgeoisie remains as class conscious in the Third Period as they had been in the previous periods and the injunction was squashed. It would seem that the police had taught the Party leadership a lesson in the A B C of Communism but no...

Another three months were hardly to elapse when Rev. A. E. Smith, secretary of the Canadian Labor Defense League and a Party leader, was to announce to a Convention of the Labor Circle, that at last the break in the fight for free speech had come. The police had prohibited the Freiheit Singing Society the use of a hall for a concert.

An application for injunction was once more filed against the police and again the courts of capitalism taught the party the same lesson they had taught them so short a while ago—the laws and constitution of a bourgeois state, are made to serve the interests of the capitalist class. Injunctions, even in the 3rd period, still remain a weapon in the hands of the capitalist class to suppress the workers and cannot be used as a substitute for the class struggle by the proletariat.

On the Chinese Revolution

Trotsky's Reply to the Letter of the Chinese Opposition Group

Dear Comrades:

On December 20 I received your letter of November 15: it took 35 days from Shanghai to Constantinople. For my reply to reach you, at least as many days must be allowed. Nothing can be done about it: neither air mail nor radio are yet at the service of the Opposition's cause.

The most important thing in your letter is the announcement that you have published a platform of the Chinese Opposition. You should immediately translate it at least into a European language. The whole International Opposition must have the possibility of knowing this highly important document. I will await your platform with the greatest impatience.

In your letter, you pose two questions connected with the platform: the Constituent Assembly and the United States of Asia. The second question is entirely new; I must put off my reply until I can devote a special article to it. On the question of the Constituent Assembly, I will answer in a few words:

The Constituent Assembly in China

The political task of the Chinese Communist Party, weakened and driven into illegality, is to mobilize not only the workers but also the broad social layers of the city and the country against the bourgeois-military dictatorship. It is to this end that the simplest and most natural slogan under present conditions, the Constituent Assembly, must serve. A tireless agitation must be carried on under this slogan, in correlation with other slogans of the democratic revolution: the transfer of the land to the poor peasants, the eight-hour day, the independence of China, the right of self-determination for the people that constitute it.

The agitation must be supplemented by a propaganda that will make at least the most advanced sections of the proletariat understand that the road leading to the Constituent Assembly can only pass through the insurrection against the military usurpation and the seizure of power by the popular masses.

The government that will issue from the victorious revolution of the workers and peasants can be nothing but a government of the dictatorship of proletariat, leading behind it the majority of the exploited and oppressed people. But the difference must be clearly understood between the general revolutionary perspective which we must tirelessly develop in articles and in theoretical and propaganda speeches and the present political slogan under which we can, beginning today, mobilize the masses by actually opposing them to the regime of the military dictatorship. Such a central political slogan is the slogan of the Constituent Assembly.

This slogan is dealt with briefly in the draft of the platform of the Chinese Opposition, drawn up in Constantinople by some Chinese and foreign comrades. My young friend N., I know, has transmitted this draft to you. With all the greater impatience do I await your platform so as to be able to judge, documents in hand, if there are differences between you and comrade N. and if the separate existence of two groups is justified. Up to the time that I am able to become acquainted with the facts and documents, I am obliged to refrain from formulating any judgement on this important question.

Stalinist Impotence and Violence

You report that the Chinese Stalinists have fired on an Oppositionist in the streets of Canton. Monstrous as this act may be, I do not consider it impossible. In his "Testament," Lenin accused Stalin personally of having a tendency to abuse power, that is, of violence. Since then, this trait has developed monstrously in the apparatus of the Russian Communist Party and has been extended to the Communist International. Naturally, the dictatorship of the proletariat is inconceivable without the use of force, against certain parts of the proletariat itself as well. The workers' State, however, also requires that workers' democracy exercise the most vigilant control in order to know who, how and in whose name violence is employed. This question presents itself in an entirely different manner in the bourgeois countries where the revolutionary party constitutes only a small minority of the working class and where it is obliged to fight in order to gain the majority. Under such conditions, the use of violence against ideological opponents—who are not strike-breakers, or provocateurs or fascists attacking treacherously, but ideological opponents, honest social democratic workers included—is an enormous crime and madness that must inevitably turn upon the revolutionary party itself. In the bitter struggle that Bolshevism conducted against the Narodniki and the Mensheviks for the 15 years that preceded the October revolution, there was never a question of employing methods of physical violence. As for individual terror, we Marxists rejected it even with regard to the czarist satraps. Nevertheless, in recent times the Communist parties or rather their apparatus people, have resorted more and more frequently to the disruption of meetings and to other methods of the mechanical suppression of adversaries, notably the Left Opposition. Many bureaucrats are sincerely convinced that this is what real Bolshevism consists of. They avenge themselves on other proletarian groups for their impotence towards the capitalist state, and thereby transform the bourgeois policy into an arbiter between us.

It is difficult to imagine the depravity engendered by this combination of impotence and violence. The youth becomes more and more accustomed to thinking that the fist is a surer weapon than argument. That is, a political cynicism is cultivated, which prepares individuals better than anything else for passing over into the fascist camp. An implacable struggle must be conducted against the brutal and disloyal methods of Stalinism, by denouncing them in the press and in meetings, and by cultivating among the workers a hatred and contempt for all these pseudo-revolutionists who, instead of appealing to the brain, take a crack at the skull.

As for the Tchen Du-Hsiu group, I am pretty well acquainted with the policy it followed in the years of the revolution: it was the policy of Stalin-Bucharin-Martinov, that is, in essence, a policy of Right Menshevism. Comrade N. wrote me, however, that Tchen Du-Hsiu, basing himself on the experience of the revolution, has come considerably closer to our position. It goes without saying that this can only be welcomed. In your letter, however, you categorically dispute this information of comrade N. You even contend that Tchen Du-Hsiu has not separated himself from the policy of Stalin, which presents a mixture of opportunism and adventurism. But here again, I have up to now read only one program-declaration of Tchen Du-Hsiu. I am therefore in no position to express myself on this question.

In other respects, I conceive a solidarity in principle in the Chinese question only on the basis of clear replies to the following questions:

So far as the first period of the revolution is concerned:

1. Did the leading role of the "national" Chinese bourgeoisie follow from the anti-imperialist character of the Chinese revolution (Stalin-Bucharin)?

2. Was the slogan of the "bloc of four classes"—the big bourgeoisie, the petty bourgeoisie, the peasantry and the proletariat (Stalin-Bucharin)—correct, even for a single instant?

3. Were the entry of the Chinese Communist Party into the Kuo Min Tang and the admission of the latter into the Communist International (resolution of the Political Bureau of the Russian Communist Party) admissible?

Wages Decline

Wages are also in a bad way, the state department reports. Payroll totals fell off 4.3% in manufacturing though showing slight gains in other industries, chiefly department stores and mail order houses that profit by the orgy of Christmas spending on the part of the comfortable classes. But normal manufacturing was impaired by widespread shutdowns or layoffs.

"The volume of unemployment is con-

4. Was it admissible, in the interests of the Northern Campaign, to curb the agrarian revolution (telegraphic directives in the name of the Political Bureau of the Russian Communist Party)?

5. Was it admissible to renounce the slogan of Soviets, from the moment that the broad movement of workers and peasants developed, that is, in 1925-27 (Stalin-Bucharin)?

6. Was the Stalinist slogan of a "workers and peasants" party, that is, the old slogan of the Russian Narodniki, acceptable for China, even for an instant?

So far as the second period is concerned:

7. Was the resolution of the Communist International which said that the crushing of the workers and peasants movement by the Kuo Min Tang of the right and left signified a "transition of the revolution to a higher stage" (Stalin-Bucharin), correct?

8. Under these conditions, was the slogan of insurrection, issued by the Communist International, correct?

9. Was the tactic of guerilla warfare, recommended by Ho-Lun and Ye Tin, and approved by the C. I., at the moment of the political ebb-tide of the workers and peasants, correct?

10. Was the organization of the Canton uprising by the agents of the C. I. correct?

So far as the past in general is concerned:

11. Was the struggle of the C. I. in 1924-27 against the Opposition in the Chinese question a struggle of Leninism against Trotskyism or, on the contrary, a struggle of Menshevism against Bolshevism?

12. Was the struggle of the C. I. against the Opposition in 1927-28 a struggle of Bolshevism against "liquidationism" or, on the contrary, a struggle of adventurism against Bolshevism?

So far as the future is concerned:

13. Under the present conditions of victorious counter-revolution, is the mobilization of the Chinese masses under democratic slogans, notably that of the Constituent Assembly, necessary, as the Opposition believes, or is there any ground for being limited to the abstract propaganda of the slogan of Soviets, as the C. I. has decided?

14. Has the slogan of the "workers and peasants democratic dictatorship" still a revolutionary content, as the C. I. thinks, or is it necessary on the contrary to sweep away this masked formula of the Kuo Min Tang and to explain that the victory of the alliance of the workers and peasants can only end in China in the dictatorship of the proletariat?

15. Is the theory of socialism in one country applicable to China, or, on the contrary, can the Chinese revolution triumph and accomplish its tasks to the very end only as a chain of the world revolution?

These are, in my opinion, the principle questions to which the platform of the Chinese Opposition must necessarily give a reply. These questions have a great importance for the whole International. The epoch of reaction that China is now passing through must become, as it has always been in history, an epoch of theoretical preoccupation. What characterizes the young Chinese revolutionists at the present time is the passion to understand, to study, to embrace the question in its entirety. The idealless bureaucracy, the Chinese vanguard of the proletariat will produce from its ranks a pleiade of notable Marxists who will render service to the whole International.

With Opposition greetings,

Hoover Prosperity Invisible in State of Illinois

CHICAGO—Figures of the Illinois department of labor do not show much hope of Hoover prosperity coming to this important industrial state. There were almost two applicants for every job listed, the ratio being 181 jobseekers for every 100 available jobs. A year ago there were only 14 applicants. Both figures apply to November, the latest month officially available. In October 1929 the ratio was 147 applicants for every 100 jobs.

Wages Decline

Wages are also in a bad way, the state department reports. Payroll totals fell off 4.3% in manufacturing though showing slight gains in other industries, chiefly department stores and mail order houses that profit by the orgy of Christmas spending on the part of the comfortable classes. But normal manufacturing was impaired by widespread shutdowns or layoffs.

"The volume of unemployment is considerable," the department asserts on the basis of its free employment service. Corn-husking machinery caused an unusually light demand for farm labor during the month. With road work also slacker the department says that "a large volume of common labor is idle, presenting a serious unemployment problem in practically every large city of the state."

The average weekly earnings of male workers in all Illinois industries were $32.21 in November. Females earned $18.94 a week on the average. In manufacturing the average was over a dollar lower, being $31.14 for males and $17.08 for female workers.

If a man were employed 50 weeks a year in Illinois this would give him $1,610.50 at the average rate, which is far below even the government's minimum decency standard as worked out by the U. S. bureau of labor statistics.

Mummery in Labor Unions

Very few workers are conscious of the destructive influence of secret and ritualistic work in their union meetings. The altar, with its open bible in the center of the lodge room, the chaplain with his reading of the prayer at the opening and closing, the juggling of pass words, signs and counter-signs, creates a stifling and depressing atmosphere of solemn mummery in workers' meetings. This is especially true in the division and lodge rooms of the Railroad Brotherhoods, where ritualistic mummery is practiced under the influence and support of the official bureaucrats who figure that it is a harmless way to spend their time when together. The officials know that as long as they can induce and compel the workers to practice these useless ceremonies at their meetings, it will naturally help to keep their minds and attention away from more serious and important problems, such as organization, amalgamation, labor party instead of labor lobby, repeal of gag laws and lowering of official salaries, etc.

Bosses are Wiser

What would be thought of corporation officials if they would open their meetings with altar, prayer, ritual, pass word, grips, signs and countersigns as the workers do in the Railroad Brotherhoods and many other labor organizations? It would be thought that they were crazy, wouldn't it?

Our useless and overpaid craft officials are also anxious to keep so many gag laws in our labor constitutions as they can, so as to stifle every impulse towards change that may place their fat meal ticket in jeopardy. Section 84, page 73, of the constitution of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers is a typical example of the kind of gag laws that are considered most precious by the labor fakers. This law forbids every member and local union in the B. of L. E. from printing anything concerning the Brotherhood or its leadership. Think of such ignorance enforced on the workers. It is this gag law which now protects the B. of L. E. officials from the wrath of the membership. It is section 84 that protects the officials in their game of robbing the membership by levying five dollar monthly assessments on the members without being compelled to render a definite account of the proceeds.

Lengthy obligations, incorporated in the rituals, administered to applications for membership, also contain a lot of gag rules which are practically hidden from the rank and file.

Militant Twice Expelled

The writer of this article has on two different occasions seen these gag laws in practical operation by the B. of L. E. bureaucrats and their henchmen in the ranks. In 1919, Grand Chief Warren S. Stone used Section 84 in ordering me expelled from Division 369 of the B. of L. E. because I published two articles on amalgamation which he refused to publish in the B. of L. E. Journal. Ten years later, in 1929, I was again expelled by Stone's successor in office, Alvanley Johnston, aided by his tools in Division 369, for spreading literature pointing out the injustice of the five dollar special assessment without the rendition of a definite account to the membership as to where the proceeds of this special assessment are going and why we are paying it. This time the obligation was brought into play as I had not violated Section 84. The obligation not only forbids the printing of literature but also forbids the giving out of literature pertaining to the Brotherhood. Thus, gag rule in the B. of L. E. is complete.

A systematic and organized fight must be carried on by the militant section of the labor movement against these gag laws. Raise these questions at your local and union meetings and at conventions. Send in amendments to the constitution calling for the repeal of gag laws like Section 84 and the abolition of obligations and secret work. Obligations and gag laws are always used by useless and crooked officials to protect themselves against the intelligence of the masses while in office. They never operate against the official bureaucrats. The B. of L. E. situation shows this plainly.

Obligations, gag laws and secret mummery belong in the garbage can, not in workers' meetings.

The Last Plenary Session of the Y. C. I.

Note: The author of this article is a member of the Young Communist League in New York, whose name cannot of course be revealed. At the time of our expulsion from the Party, he voted with the majority of the Party and League. Recently, he has written to us after a thorough study of the question, he has decided to support the Communist League (Opposition) working as much as possible inside the Y. C. L. and Party for our viewpoint. The course of comrade R. is only a sign of a steady movement inside the official Party in our direction.—Ed.

A most remarkable document, indicative of the trend of development in the Communist movement, and therefore deserving of the close study of every sincere Communist, is the theses adopted at the last enlarged Plenum of the Young Communist International (Daily Worker, 1-14 and 15-30). If the members of the Y. C. L. would give some deep thought to these theses many of them would see in the depths of the Communist stream much that they fail to see on the surface. It would enable them to begin the process of breaking through the thick shell of deception in which they have been steadily encased. They might then observe in the face of the Party, lines and features of a strange and peculiar nature—lines that run crooked, features that reveal sharp distortions.

The theses speak of "the unsatisfactory situation in the sections of the Y. C. I. which in some countries takes on a form of a crisis". The theses state that "there was to be observed during the past year an exceedingly dangerous lagging behind in the tempo of work of the Y. C. I. compared with the general tempo of revolutionary development". We are informed that there has been an average decrease of 20% in the number of members and factory nuclei in most countries and an even sharper decrease in some countries ("serious political and organizational crisis" in Czechoslovakia, England, Norway, Austria). We are made to understand that the decisions of the Fifth Congress of the Y. C. I. have suffered the fate of merely remaining decisions.

The Cause For The Situation — The Situation

What is the cause of this deplorable situation? "The main reason for the unsatisfactory situation in the Y. C. I. should be sought in the sectarian isolation and separation from the basic mass of the working class youth which dominates in the organizations of the Y. C. I." Can this be the reason? It must be plain to every intelligent Communist that what is stated here as a reason is no reason at all, but only the consequence of a wrong line. They have substituted the results of an ultra-Leftist policy for the cause. This is standing matters on their head. Why don't they explain the reason which has led to this sectarian isolation, and not tell us that there is an unsatisfactory situation and the reason for this is sectarian isolation?

The whole situation as described in the theses must lead every Communist to serious thought. And a series of questions must loom up in his mind:

How does it happen that the sections of the Y.C.I. reveal such a stubborn inability to adapt themselves to the "general tempo of revolutionary development"? Why is it that the sections are lagging behind, continue to lag behind and still lag behind? How does it come that this lagging behind has become such a universal phenomenon? Does this not lead one to believe that the roots reach deeper than is apparent to the eye? Is there not reason to believe that the cause of this crisis is not merely that there is no will, no determination on the part of the Leagues to accomplish their tasks in accordance with the necessities of the situation, but that there is something politically unsound at the bottom of the structure? The theses tell us that we lag behind. But what does it propose? It says: we must not lag behind. It tells us that the situation is unsatisfactory. What must be done? More of this kind of work and more of that kind of work must be done!

How does it happen that the Y. C. L.s

show such a sterility that they cannot create the forces to conquer their shortcomings and assure their growth?

What kind of a situation have we reached when leaders of the Leagues must be threatened like two-year olds to carry out their Communist duties? "The enlarged Plenum of the E. C. makes it mandatory for all Leagues to create in the immediate future strong working factory nuclei in the large enterprises employing many young workers. The failure to carry this out must bring with it a change in the composition of the leading organs of the League". Does this not resemble the last, strained efforts of people who feel helpless before a hopeless situation? And should this not put a spur to every Communist to start thinking seriously, and to stop shouting in chorus: "Trotskyist renegades"?

The theses speak of the Right danger. Then they go on to say: "Along with this danger there is also the so-called 'Left danger', namely: a tendency towards petty bourgeois radicalism leading to the divorce of the leadership from the masses and the mass organizations, its transformation into narrow groups of 'Left' phrasemongers." Then it goes on to say that this danger is either not seen or underestimated, "that they do not want to or are unable to carry on the struggle against it". Why is this so? Why cannot the Left danger be seen and fought against? The answer is: for the same reason that Lovestone saw the Right danger in "Trotskyism". He himself was the most typical and consistent representative of the Right danger in America. The enlarged Plenum looks into the

The Disruption of the Canadian Youth League

It is now one year since the first group of young Communist League Members in Canada challenged the arbitrary methods of forcing decisions down the throats of the membership. Since that time the leadership following out with servile obedience instructions from the Young Communist International, have plunged the league from one crisis into another till today the Canadian League is fighting for its very existence. The Y. C. L. membership continues to shrink; its influence wanes with dangerous rapidity; the Young Worker as a bi-weekly comes out at rarer intervals than when it was supposed to be published once a month. It is time the members of the Y. C. L. began seriously considering the reasons for the failure and degeneration of the League in Canada and also the Young Communist International.

Responsibilities With Y. C. I.

Basically responsible for this condition, of course has been the failure of the leadership of the Young Communist International and the Comintern on an international scale which undermined the revolutionary movement throughout the world, and contributed to the revival and growth of the socialist Reformism. Until the first fight inside the Y. C. L. about six months previous to our expulsion, a more homogeneous organization could have hardly been imagined or found in the Y. C. I. The progress of the League was good. We were able to strengthen the National Executive, organize sport units and form a National Workers Sports Association, increase the membership, and take on more activity in the trade unions and on the cultural field.

In spite of these redeeming features, the ideological level of the membership remained very low. Factional fights were practically unknown, and so far as political differences there hardly seemed to be any. The expulsion of comrade Spector on the issue of "Trotskyism" came like a bolt from the blue. The opposition squabbles of the American Party had been always regarded with disdain and cynicism. The fight inside the Comintern, the Anglo-Russian Committee, the Chinese Revolution, the differences inside the Russian Party, didn't directly bother anybody and were never discussed.

The issue inside the Y. C. L. had arisen from the insistence of the Toronto membership to criticize the N. E. C., and, while it led to the expulsion of 77 active members, had been confined solely to Toronto. There mirror and cannot see who is reflected there.

Many comrades will see in the theses the virtue of fearless self-criticism. But this in itself can lead us nowhere. Self-criticism which is not subordinated to Leninist political analysis is meaningless. It would be like the doctor who has the "courage" to inform you that you are suffering from a curable disease without telling you how to take measures to remedy it. The theses have the "courage" to inform us of an unsatisfactory condition in the Y. C. I., but they can give no political analysis for the basis of this situation, and can only propose artificial measures for the elimination of this situation.

What stage of political paralysis and stagnation has been reached in the Y. C. I. can be clearly seen from the methods by which the leaders hope to uncover the cause of the crisis. They are going to make an investigation in the Czechoslovakian, British, Norwegian and Austrian Leagues! Doesn't this show complete political impotence? Not to be able to analyze the political factors which are the cause of the unsatisfactory situation but to make an investigation as if trying to detect some technical irregularity! Yes, they have arrived at a blind alley, and do not know how to retrace their steps. The seeds of the struggle against "Trotskyism" have ripened into a pernicious plant.

It is plain. The poisonous opportunist course of the last six years could result in nothing but political demoralization. The road of bureaucracy, forgery and falsification, mockery of self-criticism, elimination of inner-party democracy, expulsion and exile of the Leninist vanguard could lead only to confusion, bankruptcy and disintegration. No number of revolutionary phrases about the brave young Communists can help. The brave young Communists can find a solution only beneath the banner of the Bolshevik-Leninists. Along this path they will find their way, even if at the present moment its direction is not yet clear to them. The course of events is bound to illuminate the road.—R.

had been no political principle at stake. The ideological reign of terror and provocations to which the expelled were treated, had, unfortunately, been a lesson only to the Toronto membership.

The Hypocrisy of the Stalinists

In the narrow development of the Canadian League, it is not at all surprising that the leadership was so easily able to force the bogeyman of "Trotskyism" down the throats of the membership. Instead of trying to raise the political consciousness of the rank and file, who were crying for discussion, the leadership demanded under threat of expulsion machine-like obedience. Those who protested were expelled. The leadership, playing on the ignorance of the League was able to defeat and deaden the fighting spirit of the membership. For the Smiths and the Bucks to come out now and blame the League and Party rank and file for passivity and disinterestedness in the fate of movement is sheer hypocrisy. They themselves are responsible. The League and Party membership repeatedly demanded discussion on the issues that were splitting the world Communist movement.

The cutting off of the Opposition has not strengthened the Y. C. L., as the leadership promised it would. On the contrary it has drained and continues to drain blood. It has opened up the organization to the attack of Police Chief Draper, which has ended in a miserable fiasco for the League and Party. Today the Party is not even able to organize an election campaign in Toronto, units don't meet, complete demoralization exists. The League has false policies due to the wrong estimation of the world situation. The Workers Sports of Canada has been completely wrecked due to the ridiculous irresponsible tactics.

In the trade unions the influence of the Y. C. L. has completely disappeared because of the adventurous Leftism of the leadership. The Socialist Youth Organizations, which had repeatedly met with failure in trying to organize the youth, has since our expulsion been successful in forming an Arbeiter Ring Club and a National Workers Alliance. In the Palestine affair, many former League sympathizers marched together with the Zionists and are today coming more under their influence. The main activity of the once leading Toronto League has been reduced to monthly social gatherings.

The answer to the question of what now is to be done is therefore more than ur-

The Curse of Mining Accidents

TAYLORVILLE, Ill.—Since the strike of December 9, after the underground wage slaves had been driven back to work by the united and unscrupulous forces of the Farrington-Fishwick gang, the Peabody Coal Co. officials, the tin soldiers of Governor Emmerson, the sheriffs and gunmen and the whole of the yellow press, two deaths by electrocution in the mines, several semi-serious and almost fatal accidents in which miners had their spinal columns fractured, have occurred.

Speed-up Causes Accidents

Let us see what is the cause of all this slaughter of the miners underground. The answer that any experienced miner will give is: the speed-up system, the arrogant handling of the men by the infernal officials and their lickspittles of the Peabody system, in conjunction with the Fishwick-Haywood officials of the company controlled union, the United Mine Workers.

The union double-crossers and the Peabody Simon Legrees know that thousands of miners are tramping the streets in search of work, and that those at work, who get only a scanty wage, fear to open their mouth to protest against the inhuman and brutal conditions and handling of the miners, for that would mean the loss of their jobs which is equivalent to a death sentence to many of them, as well as for their wives and children. If it is not direct death it is at least a slow death by starvation, since the jails and poorhouses are already overcrowded.

Now let us see the additional causes for accidents. In my experience, I have come in contact with men who have passed their examination before the Board of the State of Illinois, appointed by the Governor that did not know the rudiments of third grade arithmetic. Some of them had no or little practical experience in the mines. But they had a pull with the bosses who know that this ilk of numbskulls make good slave drivers. They generally pass the examination (we have some that can't even read or write) and then are turned loose to look after the miners' safety. Such violation of even the state mining laws and misconduct of coal company officials is general and rampant all over the Peabody system.

U. M. W. Officials Delinquent

The officials of the U. M. W. generally stand idly by and apparently don't care how many violations of the mining laws the coal companies commit, or how many deaths and accidents occur. They only watch the check-off system. So long as they can draw their fat salaries and hug and squeeze the fat lady, Miss Cellaneous Expenses, they are deaf and dumb to anything pertaining to the welfare of the hands that feed them.

The National Miners Union intends and strives to do away with this disgraceful and deplorable condition. But it has a tremendous front aligned against it, running from the officialdom of the old union to the state soldiers.

So the miners continue to be plucked and degraded with the aid of the invisible whips, Hunger and Starvation. The miners must wake up to the fact that the U.M.W.A. officials only want their dues and assessments to spend, as they are doing now, for court proceedings where they fight for the remnants of the loot that remains in the U. M. W. The U. M. W. treasury is virtually depleted, even the sick and death benefit fund is almost gone. The miners have nothing left to lose now, except bad mining conditions, but they have a new world to gain. A united battle by them, with the spirit of the old days of 1894 to 1898, when it was necessary to organize miners secretly, will win the miners their victory.

The New Industrial Unions

The Mass Organizations of the Workers or Narrow Party Sects?

By Arne Swaback

The new industrial unions organized under Communist Party leadership, have in the short period of their existence in several instances succeeded in inspiring workers to militancy; they have thrown fear into the hearts of the exploiters. But they also have shown serious failures caused by basically wrong policies.

The efforts to organize new unions in the unorganized industries remain as necessary and as correct as ever. But since the new line of the "third period" these efforts have become caricatures of what they should be, mainly through the basically wrong conception of "revolutionary unions", from which so many other mistakes flow. If this were merely a matter of grandiloquent phraseology with which this period is "enriching" itself, it might possibly be ignored. But unfortunately it has become an actual conception. The results of this can only be that the splendid opportunities available for organization become entirely neglected; the working masses, growing more ready for struggle, become alienated from these unions and the unions themselves will come to occupy a position of narrow sects, isolating the Left wing from the working masses.

Revolutionizing the Unions

Unions become revolutionary in revolutionary periods, and in general, when, having a mass basis, they reflect the degree of development of the workers. When separated in exclusive crafts of skill trades they naturally lag behind this development; but even the most backward ones can in such periods be pushed forward, though they usually remain several steps behind the working class. It is the duty of Communists to help and to guide this process of revolutionizing the unions. It will certainly require the most persistent, devoted activities and struggle of the revolutionists to organize new unions in the unorganized industries, but the false conception of "revolutionary unions" in the United States at the present degree of development of the working class, when even a revolutionary party does not yet exist as a mass factor, if continued, completely annihilates the necessary mass basis of the unions. This is what is happening now, made yet worse by extremely adventurist, Leftist enterprises, maneuvering without any regard for responsibility to the working class.

As a natural consequence of this essentially wrong conception, the Party appears in the role of exercising complete mechanical control over these unions. It prevents the development of a leadership coming from out of the ranks of the workers—a leadership which could stand on its own feet and gain the confidence of the membership. Selection of leadership thus becomes arbitrary, based exclusively upon the prerequisite of ability merely to accept orders and such leaders usually have the least experience. Independent views, in general conformity with the Left wing program of the unions, are not even tolerated. Communists and Left wingers who disagree with Party bureaucrats are arbitrarily removed from office and barred from participation in the work. These digressions are quite inevitable when mechanical control becomes substituted for the correct method of establishing Communist influence. Mechanical control has nothing in common with Communist leadership and the results cannot be without effect upon the union membership who see in it only a repetition of the A. F. of L. bureaucracy. It destroys the confidence of the workers in the unions, narrows its leadership basis and separates the Party ever more from many valuable experienced elements. This in turn becomes one of the important reasons for many mistakes in policy.

The Third C. I. Congress on Trade Unions

The correct relationship of the Communist Party toward the unions could not be more explicitly stated than in the theses of the Third Congress of the Communist International, then still under the leadership of comrades Lenin and Trotsky:

"To increase the union of the Party with the masses means above all a closer alliance with the workers' organizations. The task does not at all consist in mechanically and outwardly subjecting the unions to the Party and thereby denying them the autonomy required by the very nature of their work, but in the revolutionary, Communist elements within the unions giving them that direction which answers the general interests of the proletariat in its struggle for the conquest of power." (Emphasis in original.)

And further, under the heading "The Tasks of Our Parties":

"The real test of the strength of every Communist Party is the actual influence it has on the workers in the labor unions. The Party must learn how to influence the unions without attempting to keep them in leading strings. Only the Communist fraction of the union is subject to the control of the party, not the labor union as a whole. If the Communist fractions persevere, if their activity is devoted and intelligent, the party will reach a position where its advice will be accepted gladly and readily by the unions."

The establishment of the "revolutionary trade union center", the T. U. U. L. could have become an important factor in strengthening Left wing influence. The organization of a center for Left wing activity and groups is not only correct but a pressing necessity. Its basic conception, however leads it in the opposite direction. The conception of a center in the sense of a new federation at the present time, naturally means a head on clash with the old unions for the control of the workers, coming long before the Left wing has succeeded in establishing and extending its influence.

New Unions Everywhere?

From that follows competition for building of unions all along the line also in organized or partly organized industries. The fight of the Left wing becomes one not against the reactionary leadership of the existing unions but against the unions as such, and certainly it can appear in no other way to the workers. Where some Left wing elements are still within the old unions they split off—as the whole policy is a split policy—and completely withdraw all Left wing activities from the A. F. of L. and kindred unions. It is a split policy, not applied when it is necessitated by developments, but resulting in the "revolutionary center" getting the small fraction outside isolated from the mass section of organized workers while the reactionary bureaucrats, who are an integral part of the capitalist structure are enabled to solidify their influence over these masses.

One of the most recent examples of this development is the creation of a couple of small unions in New York with big pretensions to an industrial form and affiliated to the T. U. U. L., appearing as split off sections: the new Subway Workers Union and the new Building Service Union. Their course will be one of so many of its small split-off predecessors. They will lead a sectarian existence until they disappear, unless they grow sufficiently conservative to again become part of the organizations from which they split. In industries where the existing unions are more firmly established the result will just be much more fatal because such policy has nothing in common with the conquest of the majority of the working class by the Communists.

Of the new industrial unions none has escaped suffering under these wrong conceptions and wrong policies. The Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union is but a fraction of the once powerful Left wing influence among these workers. The National Textile Workers union is now facing a decline in the South despite the favorable objective conditions. In both instances may be noted the failures of the Left—which means the Communist Party—to attempt to develop united front actions with the workers in A. F. of L. unions. It might be objected that reactionaries oppose it, that they betray the workers or lead them in fake strikes, etc. These are not valid objections. The workers in both industries suffer intolerable conditions, they have been engaged in struggles which would give the Left wing the opportunity through efforts for united action to broaden their contact with the masses, better expose the betrayers, turn the demands of the struggles into more genuine accord with the interests of the workers and give them more political and revolutionary content. The growth of the National Miners Union has certainly suffered from the mechanical maneuvers. The recent experience of wrong policies preceding and during the Illinois strike is already making its effects felt more deeply.

Every mistake made strengthens the position of the A. F. of L. bureaucracy. But these mistakes are typical of the Centrist leadership as directed throughout the International by the Stalin regime. They zig-zag from Right to Left, from unity with the betrayers of the British general strike to extreme leftists chatterings, which in reality isolate and weaken the Left wing in the labor movement. It should be remembered that at the time we introduced the correct conception in to the Communist Party of organizing the unorganized industries, Foster joined with the Lovestone group in opposition. Ever since then the Centrist Party leadership has been feeding and strengthening the Right wing Lovestone group by giving it apparent justification for much of their criticism.

The Responsibility of the Right Wing

The Right wing in turn carries heavy responsibility for the present Leftist rantings and irresponsible mechanical maneuvering with workers interests. When in control of the Party, it proved itself master of such maneuvering. It consistently opposed the conception of organization of the unorganized into new unions. Now it is trying to take up our criticisms as a cover for the introduction of its own tendency toward social reformism into the labor movement.

The present epoch is the epoch of capitalist decay and proletarian revolution. It is now further accentuated by the present advancing industrial depression. If it teaches Communists anything in winning through the unions an influence over the majority of the working class, it teaches that the new industrial unions must have a mass basis and that the policies must be shaped so as to accomplish this. One necessary part of this is the correct coordination of the Left wing within the unions with the Left wing and opposition movements within the A. F. of L. There can be no disputing the necessity of taking up in earnest the work of building a revolutionary ideology and understanding within the existing mass organizations and giving it organized expression. We must also accept the duty of organizing workers into these mass organizations where they exist and stop the senseless split off of small sections.

The advancing period of depression poses many serious questions to the Communist movement; but especially does it pose the one of correctly applying the united front policy in such a manner as to bring the largest sections of both the old unions and the new unions into united struggle for their class interests. Once that is learned, a big step will have been taken toward extending Communist influence among the American workers.

Cleveland Labor News

By John Foley

CLEVELAND—The garment workers strike has been settled with a weak compromise, accepting the 42-hour week as against the 44-hour week they were working. They struck for the 40-hour week and as fine a display of solidarity of workers as ever existed was manifested in this struggle. The union shops came out to the man, and about 700 from the non-union shops are still trying to get recognition from the American Plan Shops, this city being the national headquarters of the American Plan Association.

As a spectator at the Garment Workers Union convention a couple of months back at the Public Auditorium, listening to resolutions calling for Bronze Convention Badges being turned into Gold Badges for spineless officers, I don't think that the American Plan Association will have much trouble defeating this jellyfish of the old International Ladies Garment Workers Union that once affiliated with the International Federation of Trade Unions of Amsterdam-Second International fame. But I don't think it makes much difference whether they are sold by International Ladies Garment Workers Union or driven by the American Plan Association.

In regards to the trial of 11 demonstrators arrested in the City Council on December 2nd the case was nolleed on account of capitalist hoodlums trying to get rid of the city manager in Cleveland. At the last two meetings of City Council, they turned this dignified, august sanctuary of priests into a bedlam, according to the daily murder sheets, into scenes similar to the French Revolution. The judge admonished the group of laughing Communists and said he had a sense of humor and would not allow them to martyr themselves in his court.

I wonder if the bourgeois judges think that breaking into jail is martyrdom. Their rotten system of starvation and eviction is the cause and jail is the only home the worker has got under capitalist production.

I had the American Civil Liberties Union defend me, the other ten the I. L. D. Because I employed the American Civil Liberties Union the I. L. D. sent me a letter that my bond would be withdrawn the next day! It seems that the worker that went my bond had more spirit of solidarity in the workers movement than the secretary of the I. L. D. in District 6 and refused to withdraw it. I suppose he will be disciplined for this breach of Stalinist Communism.

I travelled the slave market today looking over the situation. I find in Cleveland about one hundred unemployed for every single job that shows up.

On January 17, 1930, at three p. m. we held a meeting on Public Square. It was very cold but a couple of hundred unemployed stood in the cold to listen to speakers. One wobbly whom the workers have respect for, has been co-operating with the International Brotherhood Welfare Association, the Communist Leaguers, the Anarchists, the emergency program of the Industrial Workers of the World and the official Industrial Workers of the World members all responded to the call of organizing the unemployed and unorganized workers. I spoke at the first meeting and explained that these organizations represented flows of social forces in society and they all called for the class war, and we could all fight the common enemy together, use the movement for recruiting grounds for members, as no organization has a monopoly on unemployed and misery, and use the movement also as a training ground for dynamic rebels.

But of course, you know we have the remnants of Lovestoneism and Amerism and the hero-worshippers yet in Cleveland, although we have a new district organizer, Anthony Simba, and a Trade Union Unity League secretary, Douglas. They may or may not be responsible, but due to mechanical control and suppression of unemployed expression. All these elements mentioned above withdrew their cooperation. The burlesque tactics of artists and bourgeois-trained youth looking for careers and ego expression hung the crepe on the movement as far as real spirit is concerned. We have had the finest type of fighting spirit, the most dynamic individuals of past class battles all working together here. When these fellow-workers start organizational work, the comrades of Stalin fame become so jealous that they try to lightning-rod and smother the work

WHAT'S HAPPENED TO BLUMKIN?

Let Stalin and the American Party Leaders Answer!

The Paris organ of Miliukov, Latest News prints the following telegram:

"BLUMKIN IS SHOT"

"COLOGNE, December 28.—The Moscow correspondent of the Cologne Journal telegraphs: These days, there was arrested upon the order of the G. P. U. the notorious Blumkin, murderer of Mirbach. Blumkin was accused of maintaining secret relations with Trotsky. According to the sentence of the G.P.U., Blumkin was shot."

This telegram has been reprinted in many other papers, but up to the time this is written the entire Stalinist press has maintained an ominous silence: the story has neither been denied nor affirmed.

Is this horrifying report true?

When the Bolshevik revolution broke out, Blumkin was one of the leaders of the Left Social Revolutionaries. He did indeed kill the German ambassador, Count Mirbach. But immediately thereafter he joined the Bolshevik party and played a heroic part in the civil war. For a while he worked in the military secretariat of comrade Trotsky and helped edit some of his military works. For some time, in the last period, he has been carrying on work of a highly important character, from which he was never removed by his chiefs, Menzhinsky and Trillisser, despite the fact that they knew him to be a supporter of the Leninist Opposition from the very beginning. That he continued to maintain relations with comrades of his viewpoint was his right and duty, and a tribute to his devotion to the principles of the revolution.

Information that we have received leads us to believe now that Blumkin has simply been assassinated by Stalin for adhering to the Opposition. But the formal certainty is not yet established. We therefore demand of Foster, Bedacht and the others, of the leadership of the Communist Party of the United States, which supports the present regime in the Russian Communist Party:

If the report of Blumkin's killing is false, then make a public declaration to that effect in the Party press!

If the abominable crime has really been committed, do you take responsibility for it before the revolutionary working class together with Stalin?

If you assume joint responsibility for the assassination, will you make a corresponding statement in the Party press?

We await the reply of the leaders of the Party, for there is much to be said yet about this frightful deed!

City of Chicago Goes Bankrupt

Chicago, the "great" metropolis of the Middle West, is in a financial dilemma. Actually the city government, and the county government, too, have gone bankrupt, of course, without any official declaration being made. With thousands of workers tramping the streets in vain search for work this bankruptcy becomes but one more evidence of growing inability of capitalism to govern society.

Much excitement was stirred up throughout the city when by a majority vote the city council passed upon the 1930 budget, calling for an expenditure of $55,000,000. This was 7 1-2 million below the last two years budget but claimed to be within the revenue of the city which has suffered an indebtedness of $13,000,000 during these last two years. Twice the mayor, the "famous" Big Bill Thompson, vetoed this budget merely to have it pass as often in a slightly amended form. But then the cuts necessitated layoffs. The first to come under the axe were 473 policemen. The excitement became a panic among the "better" citizens. Various rescue "Citizens Committees", with which Chicago has been so much "blessed" in the past were again formed.

The "Poor Policemen"

Some of the "very best" citizens even thought it a damnable outrage that these alderman had voted a sum of $45,000 in the budget for their own automobile maintenance but would not appropriate enough to pay these "poor" policemen and thereby deliberately throw the city into "darkness and crime". Last year by their own efforts these "best" citizens had succeeded in adding 750 huskies to the city's force, and now—that seemed to have been all in vain—who would protect their property?

Meanwhile, 40,000 city employees are running far behind in wages. County employees have been voted a cut of 10 months pay for one year's work. These are the white collar workers being hit. In addition many white collar workers and regular city and county maintenance workers have been laid-off, increasing the ranks of the unemployed. The city government is short of funds because the large property owners, the big corporations have paid no taxes for 1928 and 1929, awaiting a reassessment of tax valuation. The city government in its place is peddling tax anticipation warrants to such bankers and corporations willing to take them over, receiving an interest of 6 percent. This interest paid by the city now amounts to $36,000 per day. Even at this handsome return the corporations have been very unwilling to buy. But now a ray of "hope" appears. The Down Town Property Owners Association has declared its willingness to take over $10,000,000 worth of such warrants, to be returned in tax payments when the reassessment some day shall be completed. Meanwhile they collect 6 percent on their own tax payments they are thus withholding.

As an example of tax valuation in Chicago, it suffices to mention a couple of instances—not, however, those of workers who happen to own a shack, and are assessed up to the hilt. The Union Stock-year company is assessed, upon its property covering 135 acres, a valuation of $11,000 per acre, making a total of less than a million and a half for taxation. The company's own appraisals, filed by the Department of Agriculture, shows a claimed valuation of $130,000 per acre, amounting to a total of $18,000,000. The Stevens Hotel claimed a property valuation of thirty one million dollars for bonding purposes; on the tax books it stands at a valuation of eleven million. These are but two examples.

Tax Valuation Cut

In 1926 and 1927 a big campaign started in the city, supported by the A. F. of L., for a reassessment of tax valuation to catch these big tax dodgers. A reassessment was finally granted, and although not yet completed, has already resulted instead of catching any dodgers, in further cutting tax valuations from 1927 to 1928

Dress Strike on Schlesinger and Bosses Cooperate

Left Wing Can Win Workers by Quitting its Isolationist Attitude

The long-awaited dressmakers' strike of the Right wing union, the International Ladies Garment Workers, has finally been called with the approval of the dress manufacturers. Thousands of workers have quit their shops. The dressmakers' strike, like that of the cloakmakers which took place last year, is pretty unique in labor history. It was not called until a virtual agreement had been reached between the Right wing union leaders and what the New York Times calls "the better element" of the manufacturers.

So far as the union leaders are concerned, the main purpose of the strike is to demonstrate to the bosses that the Right wing is able to rally the workers behind it, and draw them into one organization freed of all militant elements. The bosses want the elimination of the Left wing from the industry because the "red trouble-makers" defend the interests of the workers and carry out a policy of class struggle instead of class collaboration. They therefore hope that the present strike of the dressmakers will isolate the Left wing and reduce it to an inconsequential factor in the industry.

Workers Need Left Wing

A weakening of the Left wing in the present struggle would be a heavy blow to the needle trades workers. It is significant that at the head of the Right wing union strike committee are to be found the same ultra-reactionary forces—Schlesinger, Nadler, Hochman, Dubinsky, etc.—that dragged the formerly powerful organization into the deepest swamps of "peace with the bosses" at the expense of the workers, of class collaboration, the lowering of living standards the abolition of union control and continual defeats. The leadership of the Right wing today is the same outfit that split the old I. L. G. W. U., expelling militant members by the thousands in order to prevent a Left wing leadership, which had the support of the mass of the membership, from directing the activities of the organization.

To place the fate of the dressmakers into the hands of this discreditable crew would be to surrender the interests of the workers into the tender mercies of the manufacturers.

The bosses realize that they have nothing to lose by a victory of Schlesinger and Co. and a lot to lose by a victory of the workers, the rank and file. The various bosses' associations have already given a virtual endorsement to the strike. They want to drive the workers into the Right wing camp, under rigid Schlesinger control, in order to wean them away from any Left wing influence, to which they correctly attribute all their "difficulties". This attitude is taken not only by the dress bosses, but by the New York employing class as a whole, which speaks of the strike through the New York Times. This paper is notoriously an enemy of the workers, and of all strikes for the improvement of their conditions. But it designates the present strike as "the second step in the reconstruction of the garment industry" (2-3-1930) and points out that "the better element among manufacturers, jobbers and contractors is in sympathy with the step taken by the garment union".

What the bosses and their press endorse, the workers must be wary of. The dressmakers must understand that the essential purpose of the strike is to wipe out the Left wing, the main defense of the workers in the trade. If the Left wing makes the mistake of isolating itself from the main mass of the workers on strike, it will only fall in unconsciously with the plans of the bosses and their union agents. That is precisely why the present policy of the Left wing is so dangerous for its future and for the interests of the workers.

It is wrong for the Left wing union to keep its members at work during the strike in the shops where it has a "sacred contract" with a handful of cockroach manufacturers. This will only strengthen the hypocritical position of the Right wing bureaucrats. The Left wing

Enormous Profits in U. S. Steel

Every possessor of $6,000 of watered U. S. Steel stock "made" as much money through that ownership in 1929 as the average U. S. Steel worker got out of an entire year's employment. The owner of the 60 shares of golden steel stock got $1,270.80 for the year which is the average wage the steel trust pays the producers of the basic industrial metal.

The net profits of U. S. Steel for the year were $197,531,000, all available for dividends. Only half of the last quarter's earnings were paid out in dividends, the rest going into the surplus fund which for the year totals $108,003,000. It is all the property however of the stockholders who have the right to vote themselves the entire sum.

The 1929 earnings were twice those of the bonanza year of 1928 and focus attention on the steel trust as a main beneficiary in this country of low wages and high tariffs. In 1927 the company made $114,000,000 clear, turned into dividends and plant.

The traveler entering Pittsburg along the Ohio, Alleghany or Monongahela would little imagine that he was entering the territory of one of the world's wealthiest corporations. Drab, smoke-grimed shacks line the river banks for long miles. Badly clothed children play in muddy, rutted streets, their only playgrounds. Houses are long rows of dilapidated shacks and the horizon is relieved only by the tall stacks of mills and spires of Catholic churches.

The average weekly wage in these steel mill towns is $31.63 but tens of thousands according to federal labor statistics get under $25. Laborers' wages—and laborers are more and more typical of the steel industry as mechanization throws out skilled workers—get from $20.38 in the puddling mills to $27.03 in the tinplate mills. The maximum wage in the blast furnaces is $31.90 a week.

For 273,000 workers whose earnings were tabulated by the federal bureau of labor statistics, wages averaged $31.63. With 40 weeks work during 1929, the steel worker got $1,264, or the same as the holders of $6,000 stock in his company "earned" during the same period.

If a common laborer in the blast furnace could have worked the 62 hours a week he is credited with by the federal figures for 52 solid weeks of 1929, he would have earned about $30 more than the holder of the $6,000 U. S. Steel stock.

Dressmakers on Strike

must call down its own members in every dress shop.

It is not enough for the Left wing, which has been so seriously weakened in the last year or two to call upon the dress strikers to come to the Left wing halls. The fact is that the bulk of the striking workers are going in the other direction, and it is imperative to keep close contact with these workers so that the Left wing is not isolated. The Left wing must follow a conscious and persistent policy of mingling with the workers temporarily misled by Schlesinger and Dubinsky. It must work shoulder to shoulder with them.

Fighting side by side with the mass of the workers, gaining their confidence in struggle, the Left wing will be able to put a spike in Schlesinger's efforts to round up the workers without protest for sale to the bosses. By permeating the ranks of the Right wing workers, the Left wing will be able to reawaken their militant sentiments, and prevent a premature and treasonable conclusion of the strike.

Schlesinger has planned a parade of workers on his field in order to show the bosses that he is worthy of their hire.

The Left wing must establish fraternal contact with the strikers' ranks and turn the parade into a real struggle, prevent the dispersal of the forces of the workers. They will not win the sympathy and support of the strikers by remaining isolated in their own little Left wing halls. They will win them by fighting by their side to make Schlesinger's "strike" a real strike of the workers against the bosses and their emissaries in the labor movement.

MILWAUKEE—Wages of 32 to 42 cents an hour do not indicate "American prosperity" and constitute an indirect wage cut, contrary to the promise made by the bosses to Pres. Hoover, according to business agent Jac. Friedrick of the Milwaukee machinist union.

New men are being hired at this rate, though the previous rate was higher. This constitutes a wage cut because the ultimate effect will be to drag the other wages down to the 32-42 cents level. In spite of the low hourly rate there are up to 500 men seeking jobs at the plant every day.

NEW ORLEANS—(FP)—Bitter cold, and the hunger of the jobless, have sent a record number—100—of men, women and children daily to the Warrington House for food. At night the floors of the dormitories are covered with sleeping men and boys. Rugs and matting are used in place of beds. Early comers get chairs to sleep in.

Hoover and the Farmers

An intelligent member of the working class cannot help being astonished at the utter helplessness of the capitalist economists and their complete bankruptcy in ideas. Though not in so many words, they yet admit that they do not know how to solve the economic problem confronting the world today.

In the annual outlook report issued by the Bureau of Agricultural Economy of the Department of Agriculture published by the New York Times (1-27-30) farmers are warned against overproduction because of the period of industrial depression we are now experiencing. They are plainly advised not to plant too much and to economize in their expenditures. This—in the face of four to five million industrial workers unemployed or working on a part time schedule (also because of overproduction) who scarcely know where they are going to find the wherewithal to live from one day to the next.

The Capitalist "Solution"

The only solution, judging by this report, that the capitalist economists have to offer to the tremendous problems raised by this situation is for the proletariat to starve for want of surplus of food products in the farmers' warehouses, and for the farmer to economize on clothes, shoes, farm machinery, and other necessities of which the industrial proletariat in its turn has produced a surplus. Both are expected to continue in the hope that the almighty will find a way out that has so far escaped the attention of his apologists.

The farmer himself is certainly in a sad fix. "The world do move"; technical changes are going on, even in the most backward of industries, and with the introduction of power machinery in agriculture, and large scale farming, the farm hand and the small farmer have no alternative but to go to the city and join the ranks of the harrassed proletariat. Here again they are confronted with the ever increasing productivity of machinery, this time industrial, which has already made superfluous large sections of the working class.

The report from Washington at first raises the slight hope that conditions abroad will improve at a point somewhere between 1930 and 1931 and provide a market for the American farmer's surplus but immediately shatters the hope by announcing that export will be met by keen competition from Argentina and Canada and possibly Russia. This is bad news. But what can a poor economist—a capitalist economist—do about that? "Lie low and get along the best way you can. In a couple of years things may brighten up. May, mind you." That is the essence of what Hoover's economists have to tell a few million cultivators of the soil in the early moments of this era of "prosperity".

In other words, a bona fide capitalist document once more offers a proof of the Communist contention that the private-property system is obsolete, that it has served its historic function and the day is not far distant when it must give way to a cooperative commonwealth. Capitalist economists may issue reports and serve the interests of their masters in many a learned volume wherein they prove that Marx was wrong, but the accusing finger of the Communist will always point to the capitalist class and will say:

The Communist Answer

"You can't solve your own national or the world's economic problem, and sooner or later the millions of unemployed proletarians and the expropriated farmers as well will realize your failure. They are slowly learning that the Russian workers and peasants have managed to do without you. They will ask themselves, 'Why is it that in this country, though we have an abundance of fertile land, raw material of all descriptions, the most highly developed industrial and transportation systems in fact, everything to satisfy human needs, yet millions of industrial workers are denied the right to produce the things of which the farmers are in want, and at the same time, the farmers must let their land lie idle while millions in the cities starve?'

"And the Communist's answer to their question will be: 'The capitalist system can only allow industry to run when there is profit in it for the capitalist; his only interests are rent from the land and dividends from the factory—human beings don't count, for, under capitalism, property rights precede human rights.'"

Day by day the proletariat learns by experience that the Communists are right. The time will come when it will challenge the rule of the working class and the poison gas of the capitalist press will be but a puff of wind in its face.

Neither their paid intellectuals nor their armed strength will be able to save the capitalists' state. For the proletariat has the power and will know how to use it. Russia has taught us how.

Chicago Is Bankrupt

by over $400,000,000. The big down town properties alone cut over $300,000,000 with none of these taxes paid as yet. Injunctions, suits and political maneuvering keep this money in the pockets of the exploiters. As one City Hall authority stated significantly to a newspaper reporter in regards to the fight stirred up over the budget: "The finance committee group (who fought for the cut) will win a victory or two. The mayor will save his face. The appropriations may be a million or two above the estimated revenue, but no more. The battle was decided in advance by the bankers."

Oscar Nelson, the alderman who carries a union card, vice President of the Chicago Federation of Labor and floor leader for the Big Bill Thompson administration in the city council, has voiced aspirations to become candidate for mayor in the Spring elections. But such change of personality would mean not the slightest break in the continuity of capitalist politics. The Chicago workers are, of course, not so much stirred by the budget fight, one way or the other. While they could, by acting politically in their own name and using their own mass power, easily catch some of these big thieves and tax dodgers, their real task will still remain ahead until they chase all the capitalist politicians out.

Help Us to Sustain The Militant

A labor paper, particularly a revolutionary organ, does not receive the big advertisements and subsidies, without which a capitalist paper is unthinkable. The Militant is no exception to this rule. It must depend entirely upon readers and supporters for its existence and growth.

The Militant was founded because it fills a special and urgent need in the labor and revolutionary movements. It has been maintained by a group of devoted workers, who understand the value of adherence to the fundamental teachings of the great leaders of our movement, Marx, Engels, Lenin and Trotsky. These teachings are not strong if they are limited to small groups; they become a powerful weapon for labor's liberation when they are made known to the whole working class—honestly and truthfully. This is the task set itself by the Militant.

This great work can be carried out effectively only if the existence of the Militant is secured. For this purpose, it is necessary to establish and strengthen a systematic SUSTAINING FUND. Such a fund will not only enable us to print a whole series of most valuable books and pamphlets. The Militant has on hand a number of manuscripts by L. D. Trotsky. They include: "What Is the Permanent Revolution?" "The Struggle for the Chinese Revolution", "Europe and America", "The Great Organizers of Defeat: a Record of Five Years of the Comintern", and many others. If the SUSTAINING FUND of the Militant is assured, we can proceed to the immediate publication of these Bolshevik classics.

The sooner donations accumulate for the FUND, the more rapidly can we proceed with this important job. Every dollar counts doubly now. We are depending upon all our readers and friends to act with speed. The blank below is for your use. Fill it out now!

BOSTON—(FP)—More building trades workers are walking the streets in Boston today than at any time since the depression of 1920-21, concedes the Building Trades Employers Assn., in a public appeal for resumption of construction activities. Half the 25,000 men in the building crafts are jobless, according to the employers' figures.

Building Trade Council officers admit that the estimate is not overdrawn. The Carpenters District Council is broadcasting appeals throughout the country warning mechanics to stay away from Boston.

A Repast of Wild Beasts

A French Communist Viewpoint on the London Naval Conference

By Paul Sizoff

PARIS

On January 21, the imperialisms that divide the surface of the globe will meet in London to discuss ways and means of making war cheap. Naturally, the servile press is intoning the pacifist chorus: to believe it, the governments would ask no better than to make pickling cases with armor-plate, but there is "security" which requires or wants it, etc., there is the neighbor who has not had in its past the same traditions of "generosity" and humanity, etc.; the neighbors are responsible for everything: without them there would be no more war and the peace of the Lord would reign over the fleets... "Peace" in capitalist language means hegemony, absence of competitors, since the time when the word of the Lord was expressed in good English.

The Importance of Naval Transport

From the seventeenth century to the world war, English "peace" has actually prevailed uncontested over the expanse of the seas. First capitalist country in history, the United Kingdom has been, because of that, the first naval power of the world. Freedom of the seas plays a predominant role in commerce. Even today, when land communications are multiplied, when railroad lines are more and more contracted, maritime transportation remains the only means of access to the distant countries pounced upon by the capitalist ventures.

"Security" is needed for capital used to exploit raw materials; "security" is needed for the merchandise that the metropolitan factories throw on the market among the backward populations of the colonized lands. This "security" is demanded from the war fleets, the sharks of capital. The existence of a great imperialist country cannot then be conceived without a war-fleet in proportion to the extent of its world expansion: to that extent naval hegemony is synonymous with world hegemony.

England has had the first to the extent that she has been able to retain the second. The extraordinarily rapid growth of German imperialism having threatened her pretensions, she stopped at nothing, even war, in order to save decadent England from great peril and now, the formidable German fleet, the pride of the Kaiser, rests on a thick bed of shellfish at the bottom of a little bay of Scotland.

Despite that, the war did not save British hegemony. Before her has arisen the American colossus which little by little has forced her exhausted forces to retreat; and thus America has become the greatest imperialist power in the world. Her capital, her merchandise, her navies go everywhere. Even Europe and the Dominions, those ancient sacred shrines of British finance, are penetrated. A new star has arisen on the Far Eastern horizon, Japan, which in Asia vigorously competes with England and America. By means of her fleets she keeps watch over the Chinese ports on the Pacific. This causes grave concern to Wall Street and the White House; China, the outlet of enormous Asia, is under the Japanese menace and that makes it necessary for them to maintain a powerful fleet in the Pacific.

In Europe, France and Italy enviously spy upon each other; Italy suffocated within her national frontiers and on a poor soil requires land for colonization whereas France is firmly entrenched in the best parts of Northern Africa. Their colonial antagonism results in their naval antagonism and the victory will belong to the one that controls the Mediterranean.

Such are the naval powers which, periodically, in 1930 as in 1921 feel the need of limiting their armaments. Of course, peace serves, once again, as tinsel which functions to hide from the masses the intrigues of imperialism. On the day the naval conference at Washington decided to equalize the tonnage of British and American armament, the American Secretary of State Hughes declared that "A new era is opened for humanity." He should have been more exact and be satisfied with the statement that in actuality a new era is opened for American imperialism.

"Humanizing Warfare"

When Sir Arthur Balfour, British delegate to the conference, asked for the prohibition of submarines "in order to humanize warfare" France and Japan, which require a submarine fleet, replied that what was more necessary to "humanize warfare" was the suppression of capital ships. The proletariat will make these scoundrels agree by suppressing them together with capitalism which they represent!

The bourgeoisie whose domination is founded on the subjection of the working class, could not, without danger, lay before the masses the contradictions that torment it. It needs a whole front of abstract phrases, such as peace, humanity, civilization, right, disarmament, behind which to conceal its appetites and the resultant antagonisms.

Just as in its colonial enterprises, it makes use of pastors and other agents of God to persuade the natives that for their own good they ought to become Christians that is, wage slaves, so, in defense of its hegemony, it utilizes pacifists, socialists, and other agents of capital to persuade people that it is capable of bringing them a ray of hope in their misery.

We saw above that a war fleet was an indispensable instrument to any self-respecting imperialism. Unfortunately for it, it is a costly instrument. An armored ship having a crew of a thousand men is worth about 800 million francs; a well placed torpedo sends it to the bottom in a few minutes. At this price, and with less risks, one can equip an army. Besides with the lightning progress of industrial technique, the completed ship whose plans date back several years is almost out of style. The rival imperialisms have already conceived of more powerful, less vulnerable ones. After twenty years, it is useless and sold as a pile of junk. This involves considerable budgets: the United States spends 10 billion francs a year for its navy; England 7 billion, France 3 billion. There are hundreds of billions in capital tied up in all the fleets of the world, producing nothing, wasting themselves in smoke.

The Washington Conference

An economic power, however weak, must therefore have a relatively satisfactory economic perspective, to keep its rank in the great naval competition. This is no longer possible for England. In other days its Admiralty set itself the task of having a fleet at least the equal of the next two smaller fleets combined. Now, it must be satisfied with equality with the United States. It was at the Washington Conference (1921) that this first stage of British decadence was, so to speak, solemnly recorded. A vast economic crisis raged throughout the world; all the industrial powers were in a weakened condition. In order to lighten the excessively burdensome budgets, rising America and declining Great Britain agreed to fix the tonnage of capital ships at the same value, while preserving their privileges as regards the smaller ships, the cruisers and the submarines. At the same time Japan, the principal opponent of the United States in the Far East, abandoned by her former ally England, had to accept, under pressure, a smaller tonnage for its effective forces. France and Italy, which cut a figure with their fireworks at the repasts of wild beasts that these "disarmament" conferences are, had to be content with very little. Finally, the ship tonnages were fixed in the proportions 5-5-3-1.75-1.75 for the five powers. Since the position of England has not been re-established, it has constantly sought to obtain new naval agreements, but has failed because of American hostility. Yankee capitalism, being in good health could permit itself the construction of a dozen cruisers, while signing Kellogg Pacts at the same time.

Today the perspective of a new economic crisis, which seems bound to hit the United States; the technical revolution performed by the Germans in the construction and use of cruisers which, from auxiliary units become battleships—all these preliminary factors are required for the two Anglo-Saxon imperialisms to seek an understanding on a formula for cruiser limitation.

That is the real cause of the new conference which will be held in London. Such is the world hegemony of these two states that the others are so to speak constrained to come and talk. The large fleets swallow the small ones as small enterprises devour weak ones. So, each country will go to London but each will defend its own appetite; Japan wants more cruisers than the others will let it have; France develops the weapon, the submarine, and desires very much to keep that advantage; Italy, its immediate rival, seeks to come closer to America and will defend her theses: prohibition of submarines and freedom of commerce in times of war. We shall witness a great battle around the militaristic porringer, but there is no doubt about the victory of the strongest. America could, if it wished, construct a fleet capable of crushing all the others; England knows this and that is the reason which forces it to accept a formula of limitation which maintains in appearance a sort of equality between it and its rival. In appearance only; for what is decisive in a conflict is not the military power at the outset—it is the ability of a country at war to repair and construct new material. This is the "potential of war", and it requires capital, raw materials, and a highly developed capacity for production. It is for this reason that America obligingly lends itself to this disarmament comedy. With a little pacifist air, it makes sure of a superiority gotten at a bargain.

Thus, the "disarmament" conferences make ready for the war just as surely as do irrational programs of ruinous armament construction. They permit the release of non-productive capital to economic branches of construction, and force the militarists to perfect the technique of combat and to design weapons infinitely more murderous than those of the past.

That is the real, the productive side of conferences, but they also play a moral role which must not be neglected, in that they give a semblance of reality to the talk-fest at Geneva. The Socialist International avails itself of these conferences in order to spread its opium among the workers. It has formed a commission for disarmament (of the working class, we might add, through which it expresses the opinion that the London Conference will have lasting value, only "if it accomplishes its task in the general organization of peace sought at Geneva", in other words, only if the famous preparatory conference at Geneva, supposed to discuss above nations, confirms purely and simply the orders of American imperialism, which dictates them according to its momentary needs. Peace, according to our social democrats, still speaks English as it did formerly, but with a strong Yankee accent. All socialists are not Americanized. There are French ones like the social-chauvinist Paul Boncour, who worries over the limitation from "above" (at a "height" which French capitalism evidently cannot reach); he adjures the government to have "our rights" respected, to the applause of a hundred deputies of the French section of the Workers' International.

The genuine struggle against war is that of Lenin, of Rosa Luxemburg, that of the revolutionary struggle of the proletariat against capitalism. Any solution that will not exterminate capitalism, the sole cause of war, is like cauterizing a wooden leg. In order to save ailing humanity the proletariat must cast off the social democratic witch-doctors and bone-setters, together with their poisonous methods and join the school of revolutionary Communism in order to march along the sure road of the liberating revolution.

NEW KIND OF TRADE UNION WORK

Minneapolis, Minn.

Dear Comrades:

Yesterday I attended a conference and mass meeting called ostensibly to hear Otto Wangerin of Chicago explain why new unions on the U. S. railroads were necessary.

The call was circulated among as many railroad workers as they thought safe and those who would not bother them with Trotskyism. Out of the tremendous force that the C. P. boasts, only three bona fide railroad workers were present. But this did not stop the hoodlums from expelling those who are not converted to the third period. When I arrived in the hall the giant minds were set into motion to find out who can best interpret this period. A tremendous struggle was waged amongst themselves, which took up a good portion of an hour. Finally unity was achieved and I was ordered out of the hall. Poor Otto Wangerin, his soul is not in the best of condition. But what can a poor fellow do who always bows before the almighty apparatus? After I left the hall the formulae was developed in detail and now the unity-purity squad will go on as ever before.

United Front in Boston in the New Style

Boston is known as a historical city, particularly so to the working class. But unfortunately Boston can boast of a great deal more destructive work than constructive. So while this city is mentioned historically let us not forget to put in a page for January 19, 1930.

On that day a conference was called by the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, inviting all organizations in Boston and vicinity to build a united front of all workers for the defense of the union in the coming struggles. Two of the members of the Communist League (Opposition) branch came to 22 Harrison Avenue to participate in the conference. We came as ever before to help build the union and not to thrash out political differences.

What did we find? We found assembled in a hall a number of people most of whom were Communist Party members, each one giving his name as representative of a certain organization. Incidentally, the names of the various organizations were not disclosed to the gathering.

Everything is "Properly" Arranged

The meeting was opened by a member of the union who at once gave the chair to a man elected from the floor—not a member of the trade but a member of the party—before he had been seated as a delegate.

The same maneuver was exercised in electing a credentials committee. Here too, one of the five was not in the trade but a delegate who had not yet been seated. When the credentials committee appeared, it brought in a majority report against seating us at the conference because we were "Trotskyists". When we asked for the floor to explain our attitude towards the union, we were refused that also!

We were "cleverly" refused the floor on the ground that it is unconstitutional to grant the floor to any guest before the delegation is constituted as a body. If this is the case, I would like to ask those of the conference who are so constitutionally correct: How did it happen that the chair man was elected out of the delegation before its constitution as a body? And was there not a slight breach of good ruling when a guest from the floor was placed on the credentials committee to vote us out? What does this mean? Is this not a repetition of the expulsion policy employed by the reactionary International Ladies Garment Workers Union? How much more justified are these people in barring us than the bureaucrats of the International were in barring us? As Left wingers, we always fought and always will fight most bitterly against this policy of disruption.

I want to remind the members of the Needle Trade Workers Industrial Union—and particularly those who were so ready to expel us from the conference—to look back only a short time when the bureaucrats of the International expelled them for their political views. How bitterly we all fought against it! And when, in the summer of 1928, the call came to mobilize and build a new union of the workers and for the workers, a union that would embrace all workers regardless of their political views, we felt that this was a sacred task.

Joyous was the response of all our comrades, whether actually engaged in the needle trades or not, whether they were "Trotskyists" or Stalinists. We all took up arms to fight the bosses and their agents, the bureaucrats of the International. We took up arms to help build the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union.

Opposition on Side of Union

From the time of its coming into existence, throughout every strike conducted by the Left wing union, our comrades stood by its side on the picket line and everywhere else. Now the few party members who came up to give the keynote to the conference, suddenly declared us to be—not workers, but bosses, shopkeepers! Is this their conception of a united front? Is this their conception of how to build?

It is painful to see such work carried on by those who themselves were born in the struggle against just this type of work, which can prove nothing but detrimental.

No, it is not by expulsion, not by trying to push away those who come in earnest with the interest of the union at heart, that the union can be built, but by a real united front of all workers regardless of their political views. Only through such a united front can we build a strong union.

The «Third Period» of the Comintern's Mistakes

Where are the Symptoms of the Political Radicalization of the Masses?

The question of the radicalization of the masses is not exhausted, however, with the strike movement. How do matters stand with the political struggle? And above all: how do matters stand with the numbers and influence of the Communist Party?

It is remarkable that in speaking of radicalization the official leaders, with a striking light-mindedness, ignore the question of their own party. Meanwhile, the facts are that beginning with 1925 the membership of the party has been falling from year to year: in 1925, 83,000 members; 1926, 65,000; 1927, 56,000; 1928, 52,000; 1929, 35,000. For the past years, we use the official figures of the secretary of the Comintern, Platnitzky; for 1929, the figures of Semard. No matter how these figures are regarded, they are undoubtedly highly exaggerated. As a whole, they very vividly present the curve of the party's decline: in five years, the membership fell by more than half. It may be said that quality is more important than quantity, and that there now remain in the party only the fully reliable Communists. Let us assume that. But this is not at all the question. The process of the radicalization of the masses can by no means signify the isolation of the cadres, but on the contrary, the influx into the party of reliable and semi-reliable members and the conversion of the latter into "reliables." The political radicalization of the masses can be reconciled with the systematic decrease in party membership only if one considers the role of the party in the life of the working class the same as a fifth wheel to a wagon. Facts are stronger than words: we observe a steady decline of the party not only during the years 1925-27, when the strike wave was ebbing, but also during the last two years, when the number of strikes was beginning to grow.

At this point, the honorable Panglosses* of official Communism will interrupt, pointing to the "disproportion" between the numbers of the party and its influence. This is now generally the formula of the Comintern, created by the shrewd for the simpleton. However, the canonized formula not only fails to explain anything but in some respects even makes matters worse. The experience of the labor movement testifies that the difference between the extent of organization and the extent of the influence of the party—all other conditions being equal—is all the greater the smaller the revolutionary and the bigger the "parliamentary" character of the given party. Opportunism is a lot easier than Marxism, is based on the diffused masses. This is especially evident from the simple comparison of the socialist and Communist Party. The systematic growth of the "disproportion," with the decline in the numbers of organized Communists could consequently mean nothing but the fact that the French Communist Party is being transformed from a revolutionary into a parliamentary and municipalist party. That this process to a certain degree took place in the last years, of that the recent "municipal" scandals are incontestable witness; and it may be feared that "parliamentary" scandals will follow. Nevertheless, the difference between the Communist party in its present form, and the socialist agency of the bourgeoisie, remains enormous. The Panglosses in the leadership merely slander the French Communist Party when they discourse on some kind of a gigantic disproportion between its numbers and its influence. It is not difficult to prove that the political influence of Communism, unfortunately, has grown very little in the last five years.

* Pangloss is Voltaire's classic character for whom everything is at its best in this "best of all possible worlds"—Ed.

 On the eve of the legislative elections of 1924, the president of the E. C. C. I. in a special appeal to the French Communist Party pronounced the Socialist Party of France as "non-existent". The call emanated from the light-winged Lozovsky. I protested in vain, in a letter addressed to the president, against this light-minded evaluation, explaining that a reformist-parliamentary party may retain a very wide influence with a weak organization and even a weak press. This was looked upon as my "pessimism". Naturally, the results of the 1924 elections, just as the entire further course of development this time also light-mindedness of Zinoviev Lozovsky.

For Marxists—it is no secret that parliamentary and municipal elections sharply distort, and—always to the detriment of revolutionary tendencies—change the actual mood of the suppressed masses. Nevertheless, the dynamics of political development find their reflection in parliamentary elections: this is one of the reasons why we Marxists take an active part in parliamentary and municipal struggles. But what do the figures of the election statistics show? In the legislative elections of 1924 the Communist party polled 875,000 votes, a little less than ten percent of the total electorate. In the elections of 1928, the party polled a little more than a million votes (1,064,000), which represented eleven and one third percent of the votes cast. Thus, the specific gravity of the party in the electoral body increased by one and one-third percent. If this process were to continue further at the same tempo, then the perspective of Chambelland with regards to thirty or forty years of "social peace" would appear too... revolutionary.

The socialist party, already "non-existent" in 1924 (according to Zinoviev-Lozovsky) polled almost 1,700,000 votes in 1928, more than eighteen percent of the total, or more than one and a half times the Communist votes.

The results of the municipal elections change the whole picture very little. In some industrial centers (Paris, the North) the winning away, of votes from the socialists by the Communists undoubtedly took place. Thus, in Paris the specific gravity of the Communist vote increased in four years (1925-29) from 18.9 percent to 21.8 percent, that is, by three percent, at a time when the socialist vote fell from 22.4 percent to 18.1 percent, that is, by four percent. The symptomatic significance of such facts is undeniable: but so far they have only a local character, and are strongly discredited by that anti-revolutionary "municipalism" personified by Louis Sellier and other petty bourgeois like him. Generally, the municipal elections that took place a year after the legislative elections did not bring about any real changes as a result of the Selliers.

Other indications of political life speak just as fully against, to say the least, premature parrottings on the so-called political radicalization of the masses, which is to have taken place in the last two years. The circulation of L'Humanite, to our knowledge, has not grown in the past two years. The collections of money for L'Humanite undoubtedly represent a gratifying fact. But such collections would have been considerable, in view of the demonstrative attack of reaction on the paper, a year, two and three ago as well.

On the First of August—it must not be forgotten for a minute—the party was incapable of mobilizing not only that part of the proletariat which voted for it but not even all the unionized workers. In Paris, according to the undoubtedly exaggerated accounts of L'Humanite, about fifty thousand workers participated in the First of August demonstrations. That is, less than half of the unionized. In the provinces, matters stood infinitely worse. This fact proves, be it noted in passing, that the "leading role" of the Political Bureau among the C. G. T. U. apparatus men does not at all mean the leading role of the party among the unionized workers. But the latter contain only a tiny fraction of the class. If the revolutionary rise is such an irrefutable fact then what good is a party leadership which, in the acute moment of the Soviet-Chinese conflict, could not bring out an anti-imperialist demonstration even a quarter (more correctly stated, even a tenth) part of its electorate in the country. No one demands the impossible of the leadership of the party. A class cannot be seduced. But what gave the August First demonstration the character of a flat failure is the monstrous "disproportion" between the victorious shouts of the leadership and the real echo of the masses. So far as the trade union organizations are concerned, they went through the party's decline—judging by the official figures—after a delay of one year. In 1926, the C. G. T. U. numbered 475,000 members. In 1927, 452,000. In 1928, 375,000. The loss of 100,000 members by the trade unions at a time when the strike struggles in the country increased, represents an irrefutable proof that the C. G.

T. U. does not reflect the basic processes at work in the field of the economic struggles of the masses. As an enlarged shadow of the party, it merely experiences the decline of the latter after some delay.

The data cited in the present outline confirm with double strength the conclusions we made in a semi-priori order in the first article of the analysis of the strike movement figures. Let us recall them once more. The years 1919-20 were the culminating point of the proletarian struggle in France. After that, an ebb set in, which, in the economic field, began to change six years later by a new, but still slow tide: but in the political field the ebb-tide or stagnation continues even now, at any rate, in the main mass of the proletariat. Thus, the awakening, of the activity of certain sections of the proletariat in the field of economic struggle, is irrefutable. But this process too is only passing through its first stage, when it is primarily the enterprises of light industry that are drawn into the struggle, with an evident preponderance of the unorganized workers over the organized and with a considerable specific gravity of the foreign-born workers.

The impetus to the strike struggles was the rise in the economic conjuncture, with a simultaneous rise of the cost of living. In its first stages the strengthening of economic struggles is not accompanied ordinarily with a revolutionary rise. It is not evident now either. On the contrary, the economic rise for a certain time may even weaken the political interests of the workers, at any rate, of some of its sections.

If we take further into consideration that French industry has been experiencing a stage of rise for two years now; that there is no talk of unemployment in the basic branches of industry and that in some branches there is even an acute shortage of workers, then it is not difficult to conclude that with these exceptionally favorable conditions for trade union struggle the present swing of the strike movement must be acknowledged as extremely moderate. The basic indications of this moderation are: the depression in the masses that still remains from the last period, and the slowness of the industrial rise itself.

What Are the Immediate Perspectives?

Regardless of the rhythm of the conjuncture changes, it is only possible to foresee approximately the change in the phases of the cycle. What was said refers also to pre-war capitalism. But in the present epoch the difficulties of conjuncture prediction have multiplied. The world market has not attained, after the shake-up of the war, the establishment of a single conjuncture, even though it approached it appreciably compared to the first five years after the war. This is why one must now be doubly careful in attempting to determine beforehand the alternating changes in world conjuncture.

At the present moment the following basic variations appear likely:

1. The New York stock market crisis proves to be the forerunner of a commercial-industrial crisis in the United States, which reaches great depths in the very next months. United States capitalism is compelled to make a decisive turn toward the foreign market. An epoch of mad competition opens up. European goods retreat before this unrestrained attack. Europe enters a crisis later than the United States but as a result the European crisis assumes extraordinary acuteness.

2. The stock market crash does not immediately call forth a commercial-industrial crisis, but results only in a temporary depression. The blow at stock market speculation brings about better correlation between the course of paper values and commercial-industrial realities, just as between the latter and the real buying power of the market. After the depression and a period of adjustment, the commercial-industrial conjuncture rises upward once more, even though not as steeply as in the previous period. This variation is not excluded. The reserves of American capitalism are great. Not the last place among them is held by the government budget (orders, subsidies, etc.)

3. The withdrawal of funds from American speculation generates commercial and industrial activity. The further fate of this revival will in turn depend just as much upon purely European as upon factors. Even in case of a sharp economic crisis in the United States, a rise may yet be maintained in Europe for a certain time, because it is unthinkable that capitalism in the United States will be able in the period of a few short months to reconstruct itself for a decisive attack on the world market.

4. Finally, the actual course of developments may pass between the above-outlined variations and yield an equivalent in the form of a shaky, broken curve with weak deviations upward or downward.

The development of the worker, particularly through the strike movement in the whole history of capitalism, has been closely bound with the development of the conjuncture cycle. It is not necessary, however, to conceive this connection mechanically. Under certain conditions that overflow the boundaries of the commercial-industrial cycle (sharp changes of the world economic or political environment, sharp social crises, wars and revolutions), it is not the current demands of the masses evoked by the given conjuncture that find their expression in the strike wave, but their deep historical tasks of a revolutionary character. Thus, for instance, the post-war strikes in France did not have conjuncture character but reflected the profound crisis of capitalist society as a whole. If we approach the present strike in France with this criterion, it will present itself primarily as a movement of conjuncture character; the course and tempo of the labor movement will depend in the most immediate sense on a further movement of the market, on alternating conjuncture phases, on their fullness and intensity. All the more impermissible is it, in a changeable moment such as we are now passing through, to proclaim the "third period" without any regard for the real course of economic life.

There is no need to explain that even in case of a renewal of the favorable conjuncture in America and the development of a commercial-industrial rise in Europe, the coming of a new crisis is entirely unavoidable. There is not the least doubt that when a crisis actually arrives, the present leaders will declare that their "prognosis" was fully justified, that the stabilization of capitalism proved its weakness, and that the class struggle took on a sharper character. It is clear, however, that such a "prognosis" costs very little. One who started to predict daily the eclipse of the sun would finally live to see his prediction fulfilled. But it is doubtful if we would consider such a prophet a serious astronomer. The task of the Communists is not to predict crises, revolutions and wars every single day, but to prepare for wars and revolutions, soberly evaluating the situation, the conditions which arise between wars and revolutions. It is necessary to foresee the inevitability of a crisis after a rise. It is necessary to warn the masses of the coming crisis. But to prepare them for the crisis will be more easily possible the more fully the masses under a correct leadership, utilize the period of rise. At the recent (December) Plenum of the national committee of the C.G.T.U., quite healthy thoughts were expressed. Thus, Claveri and Dorelle complained that the last C. G. T. U. congress (May 1929) evaded the question of economic demands of the working masses. The speakers, however, did not stop to think how it could happen that a trade union congress passed by that which should be its first and most urgent task. In accordance with the so-called "self-criticism", the main speakers this time condemned the C. G. T. U. leadership more thoroughly than the Opposition ever did.

However, Dorelle himself introduced not a little confusion in the name of the "third period", in connection with the question of the political character of the strikes. Dorelle demanded that the revolutionary trade unionists, that is, the Communists,—there are no other revolutionary trade unionists in existence at the present time—show the workers in every strike the dependence of isolated manifestations of exploitation upon the whole contemporary regime, and consequently the connection between the immediate demands of the workers and the task of the proletarian revolution. This is an ABC demand for Marxists. But by this is not at all determined the character of a strike as such. By a political strike

A Step Backward by French Syndicalism

The *Revolution Proletarienne has just changed its label. Its first number of the year calls itself revolutionary syndicalist and no longer syndicalist-Communist. That makes for clarity. The editors of the R. P. consider moreover "that there can exist no more genuine proletarian revolutionaries, no more real Communists than the genuine revolutionary syndicalists". The formula would have been correct enough had there been added: before the war. But today, the substitution of the revolutionary-syndicalist label for that of the syndicalist-Communist, implies a very plain retreat, accomplished progressively, and materializing only today.

In the first number, Loriot takes it upon himself to show us that it is not a question of an external formality but rather of a new content, of a final rupture with Communism, that is, with the revolutionary experience of the last fifteen years. The article of Loriot, entitled "The Bankruptcy of the Communist International and the Independence of the Trade Union Movement" adds nothing essential to the arguments expounded two years ago in his pamphlet on "The Problems of the Proletarian Revolution". One finds developed there the same Utopia of a single trade union gathering, one class party of the proletariat (of the type of English Laborism). One finds there the same absence of political perspectives (does Loriot trust to the wholly false analyses of Chambelland?) the same errors concerning the course of the Russian revolution and the same appeal to the "politically enlightened" elements of the proletariat opposed to the "social elements whom ignorance and misery bring to consider violence more as an end than a means". In the meantime, there are in France many C. G. T. members to whom the newly organized minority of the C. G. T. U. has just been added, there is a Communist party and there is also the Communist Opposition. But Loriot does not dwell on these details. At any rate, he does not point out by what processes, thanks to what circumstances, there will issue from all this a single mass trade unionism supplanting all the parties in the accomplishment of the revolution.

However, Loriot has added something unimportant to his argument: the role of the Left Communist faction. He does not believe that "the present position of comrade Trotsky and the small groups of the Communist Opposition, which like him, are devoted to the task of regenerating the C. I., is correct." He gives only empirical reasons: few Communists come to us, for five years no substantial Communist nucleus has been able to organize outside the C. I., no influence has been obtained over the party from the outside, etc... The healthy elements are leaving the party and will be replaced by others "only to the extent that the Opposition groups will entertain the idea of the possible regeneration of the C. I." Finally, here is the preemptory conclusion: "The French workers are not content with being liberated from the command of the bureaucrats, who do not think that the party which generates the Communist bureaucracy is capable of ridding itself of this institution, who see the salvation of the proletariat and its revolution in a class and not a sectarian trade union organization, controlling its internal political formations and independent of parties on the outside, will leave the Leninist Opposition to pursue the chimera of the resurrection of a dead past."

We think quite the contrary, because for us "the resurrection of the dead past" is the resurrection impetus of the proletarian under the new capitalist crisis—and not the perspective or thirty or forty years of relative peace between the classes. The party or the trade union are not, for us, instruments of the working class created by the whim of a few individuals; they are the result of certain class relations in struggle. They arise in certain circumstances against which one cannot act, and live in the same manner. Like the trade unions, the Communist party corresponds to certain needs of the class struggle. In the present epoch, it corresponds to the necessity of accomplishing the proletarian revolution, of working immediately on the basis of the revolutionary post-war struggles in Russia, Germany, Austria and elsewhere.

We are entirely disinterested in the academic character of the discussion: which is the "better" proletarian organization to accomplish the revolution? We do not deny the importance and the role of the trade union. That would be foolish. We know that the reformist trade unions often play an important role in the orientation of the mass. But we also know that the reformist trade unions often play the role of a brake in revolutionary action. We want to base ourselves on the experience resulting from the development and the crisis of the Communist parties, that is, from the development of the class struggle itself.

The "degeneration" of the parties plays pretty nearly the same role for the pure syndicalists as "petty bourgeois opportunism" for the leadership of the party and the C. G. T. U. It is a hollow phrase. The Left Opposition gives it a precise and concrete sense. It designates by that a false policy. It is not a formal decrepitude, due to old age or disillusion. It is perseverance in a false political line, whose consequences can be fatal, and have in fact been fatal, notably in England and in China. Those who have only disillusion cannot profit by experience; they call everything into question again and admit having deceived themselves in the past. Those who assimilate the objective and subjective reasons that determine this false political line work to reconstitute the nuclei around which will be gathered subsequently the correctly orientated party.

Loriot and the R. P. turn their backs to Communism. That is a fact. They justify those who expelled them. Monatte has written that Sellier was right to expel him from the party. Thus, they also have no interest at all in the fate of the C. I., and consequently of the Russian revolution. It will be said that they have in mind to justify (if not to legitimize) the attacks of Monmousseau. At the same time, they abandon all political perspective, no matter how small. The speech of Chambelland at the last congress of the C. G. T. U. is lamentably weak in this respect. Louzon recommends the surrender of the Chinese Eastern Railway by Russia at the same time that he underlines the great success of Stalin in the collectivization of agriculture. Repelled by "Russian" Bolshevism, the R. P. retreats into a narrowly "French" attitude. It hardly seems to suspect the existence of millions of foreign-born workers in France and the unity of the international struggle, even with the scattered organizations.

Obviously, we fight on a different path. We do not speak of "regenerating" the C. I. as one re-infuses blood into an old organism. But we have no reason to abandon the general principles of the C. I. We want to make up for it in the revolutionary struggle which it is less and less capable of conducting properly, but which only an organization of its type can conduct. We do not prejudice its developments. It may be, and so far as France is concerned, it is probable, that the Communist organization as it exists today is incapable of recovery. But what is essential is to take a correct position under present circumstances.

The fact that the present cadres of official Communists are not susceptible to regeneration does not at all mean that we are not capable of development. Or development is not bound to the retrogression of the party or to its regeneration. It is bound to a correct revolutionary political line, different from that of the party. We do not address ourselves only to the healthy "nuclei" still existing in the party (they are few) but also and above all to the mass that stands outside the party. Our activity is bound to that of the workers who are not satisfied by the policy of the party, but who remain Communists, inside or outside the party. Loriot and his friends bind their fate to those who cannot be satisfied by the policy of the party, but who abandon Communist. There is every reason to think that their position will become still plainer in this sense.

Lovestone's German Friends

In the years that followed the defeat of 1923, the Right wing never stood up against the policy of Zinoviev or against that of Stalin. Its leaders formulated no political judgement on the subject of international questions, even though Brandler and Thalheimer, living in Moscow, were very well informed on the internal policy of the Comintern. Today they explain their silence by the obedience to discipline.

But the real reason for their silence was their desire to "conquer" the German party by means of this same bureaucratic apparatus whose faults they refrained from disclosing. Not knowing whether it was Stalin or Bucharin who would prevail, they dared not take a position for one or the other. Today, they convert this cowardice into a theory, saying: We have no business mixing in the internal affairs of the Russian Communist Party. That is a very singular attitude for internationalist revolutionaries. Why was it necessary to observe discipline up to 1928, and why does it cease, beginning with that date? And did not Brandler say during a meeting of his faction at Leipzig that he hoped to receive the German party from the hands of Stalin? Before his departure from Moscow Stalin is said to have told him that if, in the future, the Right wing should gain sufficient influence in the German party, he would conduct his policy with it.

The Right wing views the defeat of October, 1923 as a "legend". According to its spokesmen, there was no defeat and it maintains this point of view in spite of the flat refutation produced by the years that followed, by the economic and political stability of capitalism.

That is why they are always for the tactic of the united front with the social democracy, in the manner extolled by them in 1923. And logically, one of them, Paul Boettcher, applies this tactic to England and declares that the defeat of the C. I. there is due to the fact that this kind of a united front was not sufficiently realized there.

Thalheimer is hostile to the struggle against the Kulak. But generally speaking, the Right wing does not take a position in Russian questions.

In Saxony, its faction was very strong for many years; it nevertheless suffered a heavy defeat in the elections. It received only 22,500 votes and no mandate. Immediately after the electoral results, many functionaries of the first order belonging to the Right wing faction went over to the social democratic party.

In Leipzig, it attempted to form a party grouping together the remnants of the Independent Socialist party and the Ledebour group. At a meeting of these groupings, the representatives of the Independent Social Democratic "party" declared that the U. S. S. R. could not be defended while Social Revolutionaries and Mensheviks were imprisoned. And he is a member of the committee for the defense of the U. S. S. R.

The Right wing boasts, in Leipzig, of being in touch with the French Opposition. The French Opposition is the Alsatian group of Hueber, which is intimately connected with the clerical autonomists. To defend themselves for this relationship the Right wing leaders declare that they are not "completely" in accord with the Alsatians, but why not make use of the Alsatian organ while they have the possibility of writing in it!

The attempt of the Right wing to found a new party of the type of the Second and a Half International, will not succeed. That period is historically passed.

Our own task, the task of the Left Opposition, is to win the workers who have gone to the Right, driven by discontentment with the bureaucratic policy of the C. P. The Leninbund, not clear on the formal questions and the work to be accomplished, has not been able to assemble the revolutionary forces of the Opposition. It

The Results of the Soviet-China Conflict

1. In its last stage, the conflict revealed as is known the complete military impotence of the present Chinese power. This shows clearer than anything that we have in China not a victorious bourgeois revolution, as Louzon, Urbahns and others think, for a victorious revolution would have consolidated the army and power. We have in China a victorious counter-revolution, directed against the overwhelming majority of the nation, and therefore incapable of creating an army.

2. At the same time, it shows in a striking manner the inconsistency of the Menshevik policy of Stalin-Martinov based since the beginning of 1924 on the assumption that the "national" Chinese bourgeoisie is capable of heading the revolution. In reality, the bourgeoisie was only capable, with the political support of the Comintern and the material aid of the imperialists, of smashing the revolution and thus reducing the Chinese state to complete impotence.

3. The Soviet-Chinese conflict, in its military stage, revealed thus the enormous preponderance of the proletarian revolution, even though weakened by the wrong policy of the leadership for the last few years, towards the bourgeois counter-revolution, which had at its disposal the substantial diplomatic and material support of imperialism.

4. The victory of the October revolution over the April counter-revolution (the overthrow by Chiang Kai-Shek in April, 1927), can in no sense be considered a victory for Stalin's policy. On the contrary, the latter has suffered a series of heavy defeats. The very seizure of the railroad was Chiang Kai-Shek's payment for the services rendered by Stalin. Stalin's subsequent gamble on Feng Yu-Hsiang was just as completely inconsistent. The Opposition warned against the adventurist combinations with Feng Yu-Hsiang against Chiang Kai-Shek after April 1927, just as energetically as it protested against the bloc of Stalin with Chiang Kai-Shek.

5. The unprincipled gamble on the Kellogg Pact suffered a no less heavy blow. The adhesion of the Soviet government to the pact of American imperialism was just as shameful a capitulation of the Soviet government as it was useless. By his adherence to the pact, that pretended instrument of peace, Stalin openly assisted the American government to deceive the working masses of America and Europe. What was the aim of this adherence? Evidently to gain the good will of the United States and thereby hasten diplomatic recognition. As should have been expected, this aim was not achieved, for the American government had no reason to pay in cash for what it got for nothing. New York took the first opportunity, basing itself on the Kellogg Pact, to play the role of protector of China against the Soviet republic. Moscow was obliged to reply with a sharp rebuke. That was right and inevitable. But it is perfectly clear that the compulsory demonstration against the American government's attempt to intervene disclosed the whole criminal light-mindedness with which Stalin adhered to the Kellogg Pact.

6. There still remains the question of the revolutionary Communist detachment under the leadership of Tchu-Deh. Pravda reported about it on the eve of the transition of the conflict into a military stage. After that, we hear no more about those Chinese workers and peasants whom somebody sent into armed battle under the banner of Communism. What were the aims of the struggle? What was the role of the Party in it? What was the fate of this detachment? And finally, in what mysterious kitchen are all these questions decided?

On this last point, no less important than all the rest, a final balance cannot yet be drawn. But everything speaks for the fact that bureaucratic adventurism here, like everywhere else, bears the responsibility for the weakening and exhaustion of the reserves of the Chinese Revolution. The Proletariat and Peasantry in the Indian Revolution

The essence of the colonial nationalist theory is that the pressure of imperialism on the colonies has welded together a nation, all of whose native inhabitants have identical social and historical interests in a joint fight for liberation from the foreign yoke. This is a "theoretical" trait common to Chinese, Indian and all other petty bourgeois nationalist movements. According to them, the colonial domination of imperialism abolishes the class struggle in the colonies and creates a united front of all layers of the population. This conception, embodied for example in Sun Yat Senism, is the theoretical justification of the colonial bourgeoisie for its domination and suppression of the working class and peasantry in the struggle against imperialism.

It was reflected in the Communist International in the period of the Chinese revolution (1925-27) in the theory of the "national government of the bloc of four classes" (Martinov-Stalin-Bucharin-Roy), which was the "justification" for chaining the proletariat and peasants' movement to the war chariot of Chiang Kai-Shek. This theory, in any of its multitude of variations, is a gilt-edged guarantee in advance that the coming Indian revolution will be strangled in the blood of its own working class and land slaves.

In the previous article, we described the position of the Indian big bourgeoisie and feudal and monarchial lords, the full-fledged allies of British imperialism, and the petty bourgeois nationalists, at present dominating the movement and ready at any and every opportunity to make a compromise with the British in order to prevent the rise of a genuine mass movement. There remain the basic forces of the Indian revolution, the workers and peasants.

The Indian Proletariat

The Indian workers are among the most scandalously exploited in the world. The last Factory Amendment Act recognizes a maximum working week of 60 hours and an 11 hour day; needless to say, the actual working day frequently runs as high as 15 hours. Tens of thousands of women and children work not only in the light industries (textile, etc.) but in even heavy, dangerous industries, like mining. Wages are hideously low, frequently making anything but the barest existence impossible.

"Records of wages," writes Dutte in "Modern India", "show the average wage of a Bengal coal miner in 1922 as 12 annas (an anna is about 2 cents, U. S. coin) per day, of an Assam plantation laborer as 4 annas, and of Bombay skilled textile workers as 12 annas to rupees .8 (about 50 cents) per day. What these figures mean, even in the case of the better-off Bombay workers, is shown by the enquiry of the Bombay Labor Office into 2,473 working class budgets. The enquiry showed:

That no less than 56 percent of the income went on food. 2. That even so the quality of food obtained did not reach the prison standard. The general conclusion is that industrial workers consume a maximum of cereals allowed by the Famine code, but less than the diet prescribed in the 'Bombay Gaol Manual'. 3. That 97 percent of the families were living in overcrowded single rooms. 4. That 47 percent of the families were in debt."

Housing conditions in the city are frightful. "In the Bombay one-room tenements, the Medical Officer's Report for 1921 declared that 13 percent contained ten or more persons and 73 percent of the workers' children are born in these one-room tenements." (Ibid).

It is not surprising, therefore, that the profits of industrial enterprises in India rival the most gorgeous fantasies of the first conquerer of the country.

The Spoilation of the Peasantry

The conditions of the Indian peasantry are even worse if possible. The ryot (peasant) is constantly on the verge of physical annihilation. The ruthless destruction of all handicrafts, the driving of the artisan and even many thousands of industrial workers back to the land has resulted in an overcrowding of agriculture. In one section of the country, inquiry showed that the average holding had decreased from 40 to 7 acres in less than 50 years. The corollary to this situation is the immense expanse of land not placed at the service of the peasants, (in big landed estates, etc.) which is neither fallow nor cultivated, and amounts to practically 25 percent of the total cultivable and uncultivable acreage of British India. The land hunger of the Indian peasants is as acute as it is remediable.

Not only that, but the meager holdings of the 210 millions of peasants and landless laborers are usually squeezed to exhaustion by heavy rents, exorbitant taxation, and the ruthlessness of the village usurers. Any typical taxation year indicates the brutal exploitation of the peasantry. Where, in England proper, direct taxation for 1923-24 covered 54 percent of the tax revenues, it covered less than 10 percent in India. Indirect taxation in India for 1924-25 (customs, excise, stamps, salt, opium) brought in 63 percent of the whole, and taxation on land, an additional 2 percent. The results of this practical course are shown in the conclusions of a noted British investigator (Dr. Mann). In one of the first villages, he found that 81 percent of the buildings "could not under the most favorable circumstances maintain their owners." In another village, far from an industrial center, he found 85 percent of the population in literal misery. Further, the peasants are usually heavily in debt. Then they are attacked by the landlords, who frequently take half of what the cultivator is able to produce.

These are some of the reasons why the Indian masses have the highest death rate in the world. These facts account for holocausts of famine and epidemics sweeping the country, and as in the influenza epidemic after the war, killing off 13,000,000 people at virtually a blow.

A movement in India that does not place on the agenda as one of its leading tasks the solution of the agrarian problem (the agrarian revolution) cannot be designated a revolutionary movement, or even, for that matter, a movement that conducts a genuine struggle against imperialism. But what class can lead the struggle for the agrarian revolution? In the answer to that also lies the reply to the question of the character and leadership of the Indian revolution.

What is clear from all modern history is that the peasantry itself, as a "class" (a petty bourgeois layer of society whose social and economic base tends to diminish steadily), can play no independent role in the class struggle. The "peasant" government of Stambulinsky in Bulgaria, the Croatian "peasant" movement led by Raditch, the North-Western farmers' movement in the United States which is dominated by the bourgeoisie and its social conceptions (not to speak of the Russian peasantry in the March and November revolutions)—all these demonstrated that the peasantry is either an instrument of the bourgeoisie or an ally of the proletariat; any other position is a deception and a dream.

Peasantry and National Bourgeoisie

The more than 200,000,000 Indian peasants are today principally under the command of the national bourgeoisie, for whom they are nothing else—considered essentially—than troops. The nationalist bourgeoisie of India cannot carry out the agrarian revolution, and will not carry it out, for they are joint exploiters with imperialism of the misery existing in Indian agriculture. The "national democratic revolution" carried out by the "revolutionary democratic alliance" under the leadership of the petty bourgeoisie—the program for India envisaged by Roy (Revolutionary Age, No. 7)—cannot and will not solve the problem of the peasantry by carrying out the agrarian revolution.

All recent history proves this. The Chinese revolution, in which the workers and peasants were led by Chang Kai-shek and the national bourgeoisie (assisted, alas! by the Comintern) did not solve the agrarian problem, which is just as acute today as it was before the establishment either of the Canton, Nanking or Wuhan governments. The bourgeois democratic movement of Kerensky equally failed to solve the problem of the agrarian revolution. That task was executed only after the Bolshevik revolution, during its so-called "democratic" period, (1917-18) when the land program was put through by the collaboration of the Communists and the Left Social Revolutionaries. In Russia, the agrarian revolution was accomplished only under the leadership of the proletariat. That holds true with equal force for India, despite the fact that, unlike Russia, it is a colonial country. Otherwise the whole lesson not only of the Russian revolution but also of the Chinese revolution, has passed by unobserved by the revolutionary movement.

But for the Indian proletariat to be capable of leading the peasantry behind it, it must have, as its first pre-requisite, political and economic organization, i.e., trade unions and a revolutionary proletarian party. Without these all talk of the leading role of the proletariat is just so much wind. It is precisely in this capital question that the leadership of the Communist International has shown its most catastrophic bankruptcy in the last few years, to such an extent, in fact, that the whole immediate future of the Indian revolution is imperilled. At the present moment, there is no spokesman for the Stalin faction in any C. P. that can say with authority just what is the Comintern's policy in India. The Daily Worker is a typical instance of hopeless confusion. Its "specialists" write on India one day that the aim of the revolution is the "democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants", (Browder); and other day that the "Left wing" in the trade unions (!) will lead the masses of the workers and peasants to Soviet power (J. W. Ford).

The Absence of a Communist Party

The fact is that the decisive element required for a successful revolutionary struggle is lacking in India, primarily because of the policy pursued by the Comintern in the last five years: a revolutionary proletarian (i.e., a Communist) party. For years in which splendid opportunities for the creation of such a party were at hand, the policy of the Comintern in India was in no essential different from that followed in China, that is, the creation of a Kuo Min Tang on an Indian scale. The most prominent spokesman for the C. I. policy in India was M. N. Roy, the heat of whose nationalist passion burns through the thin coat of Bolshevik veneer acquired by rubbing shoulders with Lenin while the latter was alive.

It is pitiful to read the diatribes directed against Roy today by the very same people in the International who defended his views for four or five years previous to his expulsion. The only crime of which Roy is guilty is that he is faithfully continuing the policy officially sanctioned by Stalin, Bucharin and Martinov for the Chinese revolution, and for India as well, during the whole struggle against the Russian Opposition. Roy continues this policy; Stalin has not yet entirely dissociated himself from it. And the party members have every right to ask Stalin and Co:

Why is the policy of the Comintern in the Chinese revolution, never condemned or rejected, inapplicable to a similar situation in India today? Why is Roy wrong for advocating a "revolutionary democratic alliance, which under present Indian conditions will embrace well over 80 percent of the population"—without saying a word about working class domination of the bloc—when that is what Stalin-Bucharin-Martinov carried through in the Chinese "bloc of four classes"? Why is Roy wrong for warning that the "process must proceed in stages," when it was precisely with the same "theory of stages" that Bucharin and Roy justified the suppression by the Kuo Min Tang of the agrarian revolution and workers' strikes during the Chinese revolution? Why is Roy wrong for forgetting entirely the elementary requirements of proletarian leadership of the movement, of the creation and strengthening of a Communist Party, training the young movement to regard the nationalist bourgeoisie with suspicion, when Stalin and Bucharin overlooked all these requirements in the Chinese revolution? What is wrong with Roy's completely "forgetting" the slogan of Soviets in India, when the official Comintern virtually expelled the Russian Opposition for demanding that slogan in China at the moment of a rising revolutionary tide? Finally, what is wrong with Roy's conception of providing the masses "with a program of National Democratic Revolution and (leading) them by stages in the struggle for the realization of that program"—a conception that conceals the real aim of the victory of the bourgeois counter-revolution and the subjugation of the workers and peasants—when that was precisely the conception that animated all the activity of the C. I. in the Chinese revolution?

Where Roy is Right and Wrong

Considered from the standpoint of the officially endorsed policy of Stalin in the Chinese revolution, Roy is to this day consistent and correct, while his Stalinist contics are wrong. Considered from the standpoint of revolutionary Marxism, Roy remains what he has been for years; a Menshevik of the colonial type, i.e., shot through with nationalist ideology.

That the ruling regime in the C. I. has changed its position from the days of the Chinese revolution, is incontestable; that it has not, however, adopted the correct revolutionary standpoint,—which would be an acknowledgement that the whole struggle against an alleged "Trotskyist deviation" in the Chinese revolution was a monstrous fraud—is equally true. Every possible course has been adopted by the Centrists and the Right wing in the International—except that of the burningly urgent formation of a Communist Party. The "Communist Party of India" is today a myth; it is non-existent. No serious attempt has been made by the Comintern to aid in its organization. On the contrary, it has been deliberately neglected. The policy of the C. I. in India, as expressed officially by Roy for years, has been:

"What is needed is a revolutionary People's Party which is alone capable of defending the immediate as well as the ultimate welfare (so!) of the toiling masses."

Or else: "The organization of a party of the workers and peasants has become an indispensable necessity. The Communist Party of India (?) is called upon by history (!) to play this role."

And: "We will endeavor to push the middle class nationalists forward in the struggle . . . We will force the (National) Congress to declare boldly for a Republican India."

And more: "Where then is the 'Bolshevism' in our programme? Wherein lies its danger to the established order of capitalist society?"* (Yes, that is what we would like to know: Wherein?)

Roy's Line Was Stalin's Line

This was not Roy's line of thought and action; it was the line of the whole official Comintern (Stalin-Bucharin) applied in India and in China. Through Roy, the Comintern flirted with the national bourgeoisie for years. It proposed an alliance with the bourgeois League for Independence. It formed and assisted the hybrid caricature of Marxism, the "All-India Workers Party" to "lead" the Indian revolution, and kept it going until less than a year ago, when it died of theoretical and social mal-nutrition. It gave the clever bourgeois politicians at the head of the Indian Trade Union Congress innumerable opportunities to refresh their fading reputations at the apparently inexhaustible fountain of the so-called "League against Imperialism" in order to protect them with a "Bolshevik" coloration from the attacks of the masses. In short, every subterfuge has been tried to avoid the only possible road to revolution: the consolidation of a Communist Party which alone can lead the proletariat, and through the working class entrain the peasantry behind it and utilize the lower sections of the urban petty bourgeoisie. The absence of a Communist Party to this day is objectively the greatest obstacle in the road to a victorious advance of the Indian revolution.

But for that, there is a revival of the exploded theory—which also breaks with Bolshevism—that the trade unions or a section or wing of the unions will lead the revolution. This theory tentatively advanced in 1924 by Zinoviev, was applied to England. It is not certain, wrote Zinoviev, whether the revolutionary movement will come through MacManus (i.e., the British Communist Party) or through the General Council of the British Trade Unions. The British General Strike two years later removed even Zinoviev's doubts.

A variation of this theory is now being advanced in India. The Stalinist press speaks of the Left wing in the Indian Trade Union Congress as of the organizing and directing center of the proletarian revolutionary movement. The only thing that can come out of such a conception is incalculable harm. The proletarian political party can not take the place of the trade unions; but the trade unions—or any section of it—can certainly not take the place of the revolutionary party. The political party of the proletariat is its principal arm in the strug-

Foster's Return and the «New Wind» in the Comintern

Centrism is a parasite in the revolutionary movement. Having no firm foundations in the working class, and no ideas of its own, it must perforce live alternately on the Right (reformist) wing and the Left (Bolshevik) wing, falling back in the end into the camp of reformism. The most "perfect" example of Centrism in the revolutionary movement is the Stalin faction in the Russian Communist Party and the International. That it has been conducting a pseudo-Left course for the past year or more only brings out into bolder relief the course towards Menshevism it pursued together with the Right wing (Bucharin-Tomsky-Rykov) for the four or five years previous. But just as Centrism has never been capable of conducting a consistent line, so also has it been essentially incapable of holding to a course to the Left for an extended period. The Centrist helmsman may hold the rudder to the Left under the storm of a proletarian wind but he has a fatal yearning for the reposeful shores to starboard.

Stalinist Centrism is now preparing to make the turn to the Right which has been inherent in the whole situation since the most recent course was undertaken. The first indications are already at hand. The record of Centrism in the past enables us to illuminate the factors known, to connect them, and to draw the necessary conclusions. In this manner, we will be able to observe the similarities between the present trend of events and the developments in the International and the Russian party after the year 1923.

The fatal blunders of the leadership of the International and the German party in October of that year (Zinoviev, Stalin, Brandler, Thalheimer) ruined the revolutionary opportunities in Germany. The leaders of the Russian party, who bore the main responsibility, made first-rate scapegoats of Brandler and Thalheimer. Only later, through the work of the Opposition, was it revealed that the German leaders had merely carried out the timid, opportunist instructions of Stalin and Zinoviev who played no different role in the German revolution than did the latter and Kamenev in October 1917.

The «Leftism» of the 5th Congress

The Fifth Congress that followed inaugurated an epoch of sham Leftism in the International, remarkably similar to that instituted by the Sixth Congress and the Tenth Plenum, and causing just as much havoc in the revolutionary movement. The similarity extends even to the question of the leadership foisted on the various sections of the International: the ultra-Leftist leadership of the period of the Fifth Congress (Ruth Fischer, Maslow, Treint, Suzanne Girault, Neurath) have their replica in the creatures of the Sixth Congress and the Tenth Plenum (Thaelmann, Neumann, Monmousseau, Bonte, Gottwald, etc.) So far to the «Left» did the post-Fifth Congress regime in the International go that it chided the Bolshevik Opposition (Trot-

gle for power. It absorbs, concentrates and crystallizes the experiences of past struggles. It illuminates the path to power with its theoretical clarity and precision. It is at once the vanguard and the directing staff of the workers. Without it, they are like a lance without a point. There is no substitute for the revolutionary party: that is one of the basic—if not the principal—distinctions between the Marxist and the syndicalist.

The failure of the Comintern under its present leadership to help establish a Communist Party—rather, the prevention of its establishment—has been one of the severest possible blows to the Indian revolution. This criminal defection must be overcome immediately. Without a Communist Party, without a revolutionary political instrument of the proletariat, the national revolutionary movement will have a «Chinese ending». Without it, it will be impossible for India to go through a «non-capitalist development», that is, to pass beyond the «democratic» revolution to the dictatorship of the Indian proletariat, which is already schooled in bitter battle. Without it, all talk of Soviets is a stupid mockery with possible reactionary consequences. Without it, the Indian revolution may have an Indian 1848—i. e., a vic- of the bourgeoisie and a set- for the working class because of its immaturity or organizational-political unpreparedness, but never an Indian 1917.

But the Left jag did not last very long. Before they had much of a chance to warm the seats of power, the Fischers and Maslows were turned out into the cold as ultra-Leftists. In their place were injected little cliques of characterless individuals—of whom Heinz Neumann is the perfected type—who are so little encumbered by spines that they can adjust themselves to a corkscrew if the ruling regime gives the necessary orders. The brief «Left» swing was followed by a deep and lasting swing to the Right which had such catastrophic results as the policies of the C. I. in the British miners and general strikes, in the Chinese revolution, and in Russian domestic affairs. It was the hey-day of the Bucharins, Peppers, Lovestones, Smerals, Roys, Martinovs, Tascas, etc.

In this period also, however, the Right-Centre bloc (Stalin-Bucharin) had to suffer the most biting lashes of criticism from the Bolshevik Opposition. Each compromise, each step away from the revolutionary road encountered the powerful obstacle of the detested «Trotskyists». Goaded on by the equally powerful Right wing, the Center collaborated with it in the Thermidorian act of cutting the Opposition from the Party. But with this act, the «equilibrium» was rudely upset, and the Center found itself confronted by even more outspoken demands of the Right on the one hand and growing pressure from the Russian workers on the other.

The Centrists calculated: Now that the Opposition is organizationally liquidated by expulsion, a swing to the Left will not only be in harmony with the mood of the proletarian masses, and bring no credit to the Opposition, but will unleash sufficient mass force to destroy the organizational power of the Right wing. Thus, the apparatus zig-zagged to the «Left», and instituted a period of spurious «Leftism» in the International which has lasted virtually since the Sixth Congress, and particularly since the Tenth Plenum.

But Stalin's «Leftism», induced by the pressure of the Opposition and its ideas that were permeating the workers, has no more essential resemblance to the platform of the Left Opposition than a delicate operation performed by a cobbler has to one executed by a master surgeon. Just as the latter tends to discredit the very institution of genuine surgery, Stalin's debacles only tend to discredit a genuine Bolshevik course. In other words, prostrated as the whole Comintern was by the pre-Sixth Congress regime, it has only been more severely struck by what followed. Loss of influence of the Communist Parties, loss of members, decline of the press—these are but some of the results of the «new line» in little more than a year, which cannot be concealed by all the screeching proclamations of Stalinism put together.

The Change in the Russian Situation

Moreover, there has been a change in the Russian party situation. The «struggle» against the Right wing (Bucharin-Rykov-Tomsky) has been appreciably moderated since their temporarily inevitable «capitulation». The Center, which undertook the largely bureaucratic, apparatus-like, behind-the-scenes fight against the Right wing belatedly and with considerable timidity, is greatly relieved. It can now turn its attention more and more to crushing the ever-present «remnants of Trotskyism». It is, in fact, compelled to make this new turn because the necessities of the struggle against the Right wing unleashed social forces which threaten not only the Right wing but the Center itself: the most advanced sections of the working class and the basic layers of the peasantry. Thus, there is an increasing resistance among the workers to the bureaucratic measures taken by Stalin to deprive the workers' councils and the party nuclei in the factory from a decisive voice in management and the transfer of the latter prerogative to the technical and managerial staff. There is a movement among the poor peasantry for the formation of poor peasants' leagues to combat the Kulak and «economically powerful» peasant effectively—a movement so strong that it was reflected high up in the apparatus in the demand for such organizations made months ago by Lominadze and Schatzkin, who borrowed the idea from the Opposition Platform of 1927.

All these «alarming» (for the Centrist faction) symptom form the growing basis for a change in the present course in this direction. The principal, and most already enough indication to show that the dominant group is preparing to bear down in this direction, recent, is the speech of Manuisky, the representative of the Comintern, to the Plenum of the Young Communist International. (Communist International, Vol. VI, No. 28). For the first time in almost two years, we have what amounts to a programmatic speech in which all the polemics of the speaker are directed, not against the Right, but against the «Left danger». Using the reports of the Y. C. I. itself, Manuisky paints a picture of organizational and political decline in the International that is drearier than anything yet attempted by an Oppositionist.

«Comrade Furenberg», he says, «says that the decline is no less than 20 percent, and that these figures are a little out of date. Note that this decline is occurring in a situation of a rise in the revolutionary wave. Not in circumstances of a reaction, but in circumstances of a radicalization of the working youth. (Khitrov: The same applies in the Communist Parties.) Their turn is coming. We shall deal with the Comintern also.»

The attack is not only directed against the Y. C. I., but also against the sections (never the international leadership!) of the C. I. «On August 1st all our parties had big possibilities of showing their readiness to put this decision into force. In reality, with the exception of Greece and France, where was there any attempt to call a mass political strike on August 1st? In not one country did we see any serious attempts to carry out even a one-hour general strike.»

Manuisky Warns the Apparatus!

Further: «We have certain parties where the Central Committee has not taken a single step towards winning the masses, and it does not enter the head of any member of the party to demand of such a C. C. why the party directed by such a C. C. does not develop... Take the imperialist war which the bourgeoisie is organizing: when any general suffers a defeat, he is replaced; but we can lose half the membership of a party and the members of the C. C. remain in their posts.» (Foster, Bedacht and Co.—take heed of the warning!)

And the conclusions: «The Y. C. I. always struggled splendidly against the right-wing deviations, no one has any right to utter a word of reproach against you in that regard. But the struggle against the «left-wing» zig-zags was not so well carried out by you.»

To whom does Manuisky refer? To Scatzkin, who at one time leaned towards the Trotsky Opposition, and together with Lominadze put forward the idea of poor peasants' unions; to Nasanov, who was recalled from China by Stalin a few years ago for signing the famous «Letter of Three Comrades from Shanghai» which criticized the C. I.'s Menshevik policy in the revolution along the lines of the Opposition. But not even these comrades are meant primarily; they are only the whipping boys for others to come. Manuisky's (read: Stalin's) offensive against the so-called «Left deviation» in the Y. C. I. is the direct forerunner to an even stronger attack on the various sections of the C. I., which will initiate a swing from the present ultra-Left course all the way to the Right, just as definitely as the famous «Open Letter to the German Party», directed against Fischer-Maslow in 1924, was a step on the road to the alliance with Chiang Kai-Shek and Purcell.

The slogan of the Y. C. I. Plenum, under the aegis of Stalin's spokesman, was not Fire to the Right, but Fire to the Left. Chitarov, the head of the Y. C. I. has already written a programmatic article in Pravda which declares that the «main fire in the Youth» must be directed «against the Left».

In Czecho-Slovakia, the Political Bureau has adopted a decision which for the first time in more than a year not only mentions the «Left danger» but is directed essentially against it: «It (the C. I.) has condemned all along the line the false standpoint, injurious to the party, of this group (Fried), and has set the party the task of carrying out the inner-party struggle on two fronts: against the Right danger, which remains the main danger on an international scale as well as with us, and against the Left, exaggerated and sectarian tendencies, which are dangerous because they balk and frustrate the struggle against the main Right danger.» This resolution is another harbinger. There is every reason to believe that «Fried groups», that is, scapegoats for Stalin's past policy will be discovered and officially condemned in virtually every party in the C. I.

The Right Wing Approves

The central organ of the German Right wing, Gegen den Strom, devotes almost half of its entire issue to the «new change» and hails it as a justification of its whole line, criticizing it only because it is a «half-change» in the direction of the Brandler program. It writes: «We, the expelled «renegades», at all times adopted a standpoint in the questions touched on by Manuisky which the Executive now suddenly claims for itself.» And, fearful of the disintegrating effects the new change will have in its ranks, it ends with the appeal: «Strengthening of the Opposition! Change from below and not command from above! A complete—and not a half change!»

That the American party will not escape the consequences of the new wind in the C. I. is to state a commonplace. Foster has just returned from across with the «new line» in his inside pocket and God knows that he feels more at home with a course to the Right than he ever did or could while he gave obedient lip-service to the «Left» jag for which—constitutionally—he had no heart at all. The Party press may soon be expected to harp on a new string, to discover—by command—the danger from the Left, whose banner bearers may be found in either Joseph Zack, or Browder, or Amter, or any other convenient victim of the latest change.

New Attitude towards Right Wing

The Party membership, which has been turned in the direction of sharp antagonism to the Lovestone faction, will be turned the other way just as arbitrarily, just as unexplained, just as mechanically and bureaucratically as it was last year when Lovestone was thrown out over night. A line of rapprochement towards the Right wing elements (ostensibly for the winning over of the rank and file) will be instituted. The first signs of this are not lacking, particularly in the needle trades where the Right wing is strong: For the first time since the official anti-Lovestone fight, the party fraction in the millinery workers' union just a few days ago nominated an expelled Lovestoneite for a position in the local—an absolutely inconceivable action two months ago!

That the whole Comintern needs a change from its present ultra-Leftist adventurism (with which Stalin is paying off his opportunist debts) to a Bolshevik line goes without saying. But Centrism cannot conduct such a change without inevitably swinging over to the camp of the Right wing. This is a fact taught every Communist by the experiences of the last six years. Unless the party membership compels a discussion of the basic causes for the present situation and adopts the proper measures for unifying the party on a correct revolutionary line, it will continue to remain bewildered by the renewed zig-zags and befuddled by its apparatus leaders who act only on command from the Stalin faction. Otherwise the newest «new line» will only worsen the chaos and disintegration of the movement.

After this article was written and just before going to press, we have been informed of even more definite steps by the American Stalinists in the direction of «conciliation» with the Lovestone group. At the last meeting of the general party fraction in the needle trades, some comrades objected to the fact that the party fraction nominated a number of expelled Lovestoneites for positions on the Executive Committee of the shop delegates Council of the N. T. W. I. U. Replying to the critics, who took seriously the diatribes of the Daily Worker against the «counter-revolutionary Lovestoneites», Rose Wortis and Joseph Burochovitch, leaders of the fraction declared that after the slate for the Council had been made up, Foster, «who has just returned from Moscow» instructed the fraction to put a number of Lovestoneites on the slate, which, therefore, had to be changed at the last minute. Needless to say the new line was not extended to the «Trotskyists» and our comrade Ber- man received 18 votes—practically all the non-party delegates, but not a single vote from the party fraction.

Leadership in the Coming Struggles

By Arne Swabeck

That increasing working class struggles will grow out of the present advancing industrial depression is a foregone conclusion. As to their present extent and rapidity of development we might only cast a glance back at the historical tradition of struggles of the American workers, marked by their convulsive but determined expressions. This may be said to be the prospect made possibly so much more acute by the rapid violent development of industrialization, its increasing class distinctions and the sharpness of the class struggle, which today makes up a special part of the internal contradictions of American imperialism.

This was strikingly set forth in Comrade Trotsky's letter to the American Opposition:

"We must not for a minute lose sight of the fact that the might of American capitalism rests more and more upon a foundation of world economy with its contradictions and crises, military and revolutionary. This means that a social crisis in the United States may arrive a good deal sooner than many think and have a feverish development from the beginning. Hence the conclusion: It is necessary to prepare."

The Workers in the Basic Industries

The unskilled and semi-skilled workers in the basic industries compose the great majority of the working class and must naturally be the main basis of new union organization activities. Particularly during times of exceptional conditions, such as industrial crises, when many of the regulations of "normalcy" disappear, can these workers be expected to move readily into action. Their moves will not be hampered by special privileges. While today almost entirely unorganized, yet they are potentially the most revolutionary. But the American Federation of Labor and similar unions, even as now constituted, will not remain immune from changing economic conditions.

It is well to remember the widespread Left wing and progressive influence, particularly in its more elementary aspects, as represented by the movement for amalgamation, a labor party and recognition of the Soviet Union, growing out of the period of industrial depression and great strikes from 1919 to 1922. Many A. F. of L. local unions, and even higher bodies, were swept by that sentiment. The tactics pursued by the Left wing were correct. True, since then many expulsions have occurred. Yes, but is that not a certain form of proof attesting the correctness and effectiveness of the tactics of the Left at the time?

Our objects in endeavoring to arrive at a correct union building program today are mainly twofold: actually to organize the workers for the struggle and to extend Communist influence through the unions to the masses. Hence the conclusion that it is necessary to initiate organization of the unorganized, to give them fighting leadership as well as to build the Left wing movement within the existing unions in opposition to the capitalist policies of the reactionary leadership. These two tasks go hand in hand. This should be the essence of a correct Communist union building program. While this is today half-heartedly acknowledged by the Communist Party—on paper—it is entirely negated by its practice.

Just now can be noted the first effects of the pledges made to the Hoover industrial conferences. The big employers gave "promises" of extended activities and of no wage cuts. The A. F. of L. heads gave promise not to initiate any movements for wage increases, without even attempting to demand such elementary guarantees as: No further lay-offs, no further speedups and support for the unemployed. The employers naturally broke their so-called "pledges", never seriously made, and a few hours later the offensive against the workers began. It will become more intense as capitalism endeavors to overcome its economic difficulties by increased exploitation. As it proceeds, although contented swine can be moved only with a heavy stick, even the A. F. of L. "leaders" will have to answer to a rank and file becoming more critical.

Communist and Conservative Unions

The next important question then arises: Should Communists help to organize unorganized workers into the existing conservative unions? The answer must be, YES: wherever these unions can be made to move. The inevitable pressure from below in that direction should be intensified and unorganized workers drawn into the unions on the basis of the program of the Left as an additional reservoir for the necessary struggle against the domination and ideology of the labor lieutenants of capitalism. With such activities must be combined the fight for the organizations to be transformed to an industrial basis (amalgamation), which is absolutely indispensable; the fight for ordinary trade union democracy, for divorcing them from the capitalist political parties; for militant methods, etc.

Foster argues in his book "Misleaders of Labor" (published 1927) for the organization of the unorganized into the existing unions, as well as in some cases independently of them. He states in part (page 319) as follows: "...Besides, it must not be overlooked that, with the close of the present era of industrial activity and the precipitation of the inevitable industrial crisis, the trade unions, under capitalist attacks, will despite the reactionary bureaucracy veer sharply to the left, slough off many of their present conservative aspects, and tend to become very much more proletarian fighting organizations. The arguments of Lenin, Losovsky and others in 1920-22 against dual unionism applies today. Under present conditions there is no room for a general dual union movement in the United States, reactionary and decrepit though the existing unions may be."

Here we have the matter stated, although with some exaggerations, fairly correctly. Yet the party leadership, headed by Foster, in its official policy and practice carries on the exact opposite. What has happened since to make this prediction, estimation and conclusion, in its main aspects, incorrect? Have the existing unions disappeared or become worse than stated above? That is impossible. These unions have even made, under pressure, the first slight moves toward organization of the unorganized. True, the working class has shown unmistakable signs of radicalization; but that was implied in Foster's prediction from which the conclusion was drawn. Still it could not be claimed that in the United States, political, economic or working class developments have reached a point (or seriously approached it) where a mass basis can be secured for a (dual) independent "revolutionary union" movement. The major section of the workers have not even had actual experience in ordinary trade unionism; not to speak of being able to correctly estimate the strike-breaking role of the present trade union "leadership". What then has happened? Oh yes—we have entered the "Third Period" with its blatant drivel about social fascism.

With the Stalin leadership of the Comintern the case stands no better. The thesis of the 10th Plenum shows utter confusion particularly on this important point of conservative mass unions and "revolutionary unions". It is characterized by the complete absence of a definite line.

Problem of the United Front

The third question of importance to consider is that of the united front policy. Unity of organized and unorganized in times of struggle is always essential. Of similar importance is the need of unity of action between employed and unemployed. Carried out correctly the united front becomes an important medium in certain important stages of the class struggle. It can unquestionably become so in the organization of the unorganized and particularly where a situation exists of rival unions—new industrial unions and old conservative unions. The struggle of the textile workers in the South is about the best example. Violent assaults upon both unions as in Gastonia and Marion; the rank and file defending themselves and fighting back, in Gastonia under militant leadership, in Marion under reactionary leadership, from which a sell-out could be expected more readily than a forward move, for such was the record established.

Practical Strike Demands

A fourth question which, because of recent experiences, requires consideration is the one of correct slogans for organization and demands in strikes, for there can be no doubt that organization of the unorganized will be closely connected with strikes. In the recent Illinois miners strike for instance, led by the N. M. U., most of the demands were entirely too general and even too abstract in character. There was little or no concentration on the simple demands most closely connected with the actual working conditions and corresponding with the most outstanding grievances. Slogans and demands must not overshoot their mark.

Perhaps the best example of such wrong direction can be found in the manifesto of the party at the time of the murder of Ella May Wiggins in Gastonia, calling upon the workers to "Prepare for a strike of protest and sympathy for the heroic fighters in Gastonia who are fighting your battles". The best test of this overshoot aim is the fact that there was no response anywhere. The workers, not even the new industrial unions, were by no means prepared for such a political strike. A far more correct way would be to stress particularly the issues of the workers in industry, the grievances at the job, to lay the proper basis for extension of strike action in order to, on that basis, impart more political content. From such experiences lessons should be learned.

Very closely connected with this also is the necessity of actually giving the new industrial unions a mass basis. Without that they will become impotent sects and will not serve the cause of the general advance of the revolutionary movement.

To conclude from the few points emphasized here that revolutionists may hold out hopes or possibilities that the existing trade unions can be captured, in so far as taking possession of the apparatus is concerned, is, of course, ridiculous. While this may or may not be accomplished in certain instances, it is not the issue. As stated at the outset, the real object is to actually organize the workers for the struggle and to extend Communist influence through the unions to the masses. And these points here emphasized, in harmony with the Communist Opposition platform, certainly go in the direction toward a correct solution of the problem.

must not be understood a strike during which the Communists carry on political agitation, but a strike in which the workers of all trades and enterprises conduct a struggle for definite political aims. Revolutionary agitation on the basis of strikes is a task of Communists under all circumstances; but the participation of workers in political, that is, revolutionary strikes, presents by itself one of the sharpest forms of struggle and occurs only under exceptional circumstances, which neither the party nor the trade unions can manufacture artificially according to their desires. To identify economic strikes with political strikes creates chaos which prevents the trade union leaders from correctly approaching economic strikes, from preparing them and working out an expedient program of workers' demands.

Matters stand still worse with the general economic orientation. The philosophy of the "third period" demands at all costs and immediately an economic crisis. Our wise trade unionists, therefore, close their eyes to the systematic improvement of the economic conjuncture in France for the past two years at a time when without a concrete estimation of the conjuncture it is impossible, in turn, to work out correct demands and to struggle for them with success. Claveri and Dorelle would do well if they would think the question through to the end. If the economic rise in France should last for another year (which is not out of the question) then primarily the development and deepening of the economic struggles would soon be on the order of the day. To be able to adapt themselves to such circumstances is a task not only of the trade unions but also of the party. It is insufficient to proclaim the abstract right of Communism to a leading role; it is necessary to conquer this by deeds, and at that not within the narrow frame of the trade union apparatus but on the whole field of the class struggle. To the anarchist and trade unionist formula of autonomy of the trade unions, the party must oppose serious theoretical and political aid to the trade unions, making it easier for them to orientate correctly in questions of economic and political developments, and consequently, the elaboration of correct demands and methods of struggle.

The unavoidable change in the rise produced by a crisis will change the tasks, taking the ground from under the successful economic struggles. It has already been said above that the coming of a crisis would serve in all probability as an impetus to the political activity of the masses. The strength of this impetus depends directly on two factors: on the depth and duration of the previous rise, the sharpness of the crisis that has come. The sharper and deeper the change will turn out to be the sharper will be the action of the masses. The reason for this is not difficult to understand. By the power of inertia, strikes generally acquire the greatest impetus at the moment when the economic rise begins to pass into depression. It is as if in the heat of running, the workers encounter a solid wall. With economic strikes you can then accomplish very little. The capitalists, with the depression under way, easily utilize the lockout. It is natural if the class consciousness of the workers which has risen begins to seek other roads for itself. But which? This already depends not only upon conjunctural conditions but on the whole situation in the country.

To declare in advance that the next conjunctural crisis will create an immediate revolutionary situation in France, for that there is at present no basis. Under the juncture of a series of conditions overflowing the boundaries of conjunctural crisis, this is quite possible. On this count only theoretical suppositions are thus far possible. To put forward today the slogan of a general political strike as an actual one, on the basis that the coming crisis may push the masses on the road of revolutionary struggle, means to attempt to appease the hunger of today with the dinner of tomorrow. When Molotov stated at the Tenth Plenum that the general strike has already practically been put on the order of the day in France, then he only showed once too often that he does not know France nor the order nor the day. The anarchists and syndicalists do not a little to compromise the very idea of a general strike in France. Official Communism apparently travels the same road, attempting to substitute goat-leaps of adventurism for systematic revolutionary work.

The tide of political activity of the masses, before it assumes a more decisive form, may, for a certain and for that matter a lengthy period, express itself in a greater attendance of meetings, in a wider distribution of Communist literature in the growth of electoral votes, increase in the number of Party members, etc. Can the leadership adopt in advance a purely a priori orientation on a stormy tempo of development at all events? No. It must have its hands united for one and for the other tempo. Only under this condition can the party, not deviating from the revolutionary direction, march in step with the class.

At the expense of the above-developed considerations I can already hear the caresing voice of the tin rattle accuse me of "economism" on the one hand and capitalist optimism on the other, and of course of social democratic deviations. For the Molotovs, everything they cannot grasp, that is, a great deal, is related to the domain of social democratic deviations, just as to barbarians, ninety-nine percent of the universe is related to the domain of the activity of bad spirits. Following Molotov, Semard and Monmousseau will teach us that the question is not exhausted with shakings in conjuncture, that there are many other factors, for example, rationalization and the approaching war. These people talk about "many" factors all the more readily when they are incapable to explain a single one of them. Doubtless, we will reply to them, the war would have overthrown the whole perspective and would have opened, so to speak, a new chronology. But in the first place, we do not yet know today when the war will come, nor what gates it will come through. Secondly, in order to enter a war with open eyes, we must carefully study all the curves in the road that leads to it. War does not fall from heaven. The question of war and its date is connected most closely with the question of the processes of the world market.

Dressmakers Again Betrayed Imperialist Powers Quarrel at London

« Impartial Commission » Formed to Sell Out Workers

The New York dressmakers' strike of the International Ladies Garment Workers, the Right wing union, is nearing an end. The end of the strike, called with the agreement of the manufacturers, brings as its major result and "accomplishment" the establishment of a so-called impartial machinery for the adjustment of disputes between the bosses in the cloak industry. Its actual function is to hamstring the workers, to destroy their militancy and reliance upon fighting means to gain better conditions in the industry. The "Impartial Commission" makes it simple for the union fakers and the bosses to betray the worker in any impending struggle by delaying or preventing any strike action, and makes easier the intervention of the governmental agencies on the side of the employers.

No Militancy Displayed

Little if any militancy has been displayed during the walkout except so far as Left wing and class-conscious workers have injected it and made efforts to energize the strike. The "mass picketing" and demonstrations of the Right wingers, looked upon quietly by the employers and nonchalantly by Whelan's police, were not even well staged. Where Left wingers mingled among the workers and tried to develop a fighting spirit among the apathetic workers, then the police did not hesitate to club and arrest the workers. In the course of one of these sham demonstrations, Right wing guerrillas and gangsters, expecting to attack Left wingers, were responsible for the death of a dress manufacturer mingling in the crowd.

Working Conditions Unchanged

The workers are about to return to their shops. The class collaboration agreement of the I. L. G. W. U. and the Manufacturers, in addition to the "impartial machinery" for the adjustment of disputes, calls for the formation of a commission to "study" the dress industry with a view toward "stabilizing" the trade; in other words, a commission to study long and plenty and to delay indefinitely any actual improvement of the dressmakers' conditions.

The reported agreement calls for a two year contract with no changes in the wage scale except overtime rates. With an increasing unemployment in the dressmakers and the needle trades generally, and at the same time with an increase in the cost of living, no actual wage increase means in reality a wage reduction. With workers unemployed and starving or eking out a miserable existence, the proposed agreement defers discussion for unemployment insurance for one year.

Schlesinger, Dubinsky, Hochman and Co., the manufacturer and the state government, represented by Lieutenant-Governor Lehman worked like a holy trinity in binding the dressmakers to miserable conditions.

The Left wing, represented by the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, had an opportunity to do effective work among the rank and file workers who responded to the call of the Right wing union, but sectarian and isolation tactics rendered the efforts of the militants less effective. To keep Left wing union members at work in "controlled shops" behind locked doors was even worse. No efforts or proposals were made in the name of the Left wing to the I. L. G. W. U. and the rank and file strikers to effect a fighting front against the manufacturers, to abolish the sweat shop to gain the 40 hour week, to develop a militant spirit among the striking workers other than Left wingers. The N. T. W. I. U. lost a chance to show up effectively the Right wing officialdom through united front proposals for a struggle for these and other specific demands. Denunciation of the officials is insufficient. Nor, likewise, is a demand upon the workers who went out under the Right wing call to go instead to the halls of the Left wing and strike under their banner. This call was simply not heeded by the workers. It is necessary, imperative to find and utilize every means to gain contact with all workers and to influence their thoughts and actions. The isolation policy of the Left wing has not gained forces for the N. T. W. I. U. It is time to end an ostrich policy and existence.

The struggle to build a mass union of the dressmakers, of needle trades workers, to smash company union, class-collaboration agreements, "impartial commissions", Schlesinger and the other I. L. G. W. U. reactionaries; to instill a new fighting spirit among the exploited needle trades workers; to rally them to industrial union; to the organization of the forces for a genuine struggle for the 40 hour week, increase in wages, shop committee control—this remains as before. It can be done, if proper tactics are adopted and pursued. In addition to the work of building the Left wing

N. T. W. I. U., it is necessary to begin seriously and with well-laid out plans to build a Left wing in the I. L. G. W. U. to undermine the Schlesinger machine, the bosses' agents.

By a policy of isolation and the abandonment of the united front tactic, the N. T. W. I. U. is in danger to lose its last base in the needle trades, this despite the fact that the Right wing union is again betraying and selling out the workers. But the sectarian policy and the mechanical Communist party control of the N. T. W. I. U. has been of such a character that many of the workers have lost confidence in it. This needs to be remedied at once if a successful fight against the Right wing union is to be waged. Not a reflex of the Party struggles, but toward a broad Left wing organization of the mass of workers, is what the N. T. W. I. U. must consciously direct its steps. Only with such methods and aims will the N. T. W. I. U. be able to fight and defeat the betrayers of the workers and the agents of the bosses—Schlesinger, Hochman Dubinsky and Company, and to build a union functioning in the interests of the mass of needle trades workers.

YES OR NO! HAS BLUMKIN BEEN ASSASSINATED?
More Facts on the Disappearance of the Fighter for the Russian Bolshevik Revolution

The Stalinist press is ominously silent! Has Blumkin been shot "in conformity with the orders of the G. P. U.", or not? The question has been put to it publicly, before the whole revolutionary working class. It refuses to reply to it. Why?

Why is Stalin himself silent? Why does the Russian Party press, directly controlled by him, fail to breath a word about Blumkin's fate? The assassination of Blumkin would be a new stage in the "ideological struggle" against the Russian Bolshevik Opposition. Will Stalin, Yaroslavsky and Co. find it difficult to explain to the Russian and international working class why the "exterminated Trotskyists" now have to be fought by being stood against the wall in secret and shot down? Is this difficulty the reason for the silence?

Blumkin was an irreproachable revolutionist. Early in the revolution, he transferred his allegiance from the Left Social Revolutionaries and joined the Communist Party. He was one of the heroes of the Red Army in the civil war and the struggle against imperialist intervention. Despite the fact that he avowed his support to the Russian Opposition from the very beginning, never concealing his views at any time, he was entrusted with the most important and confidential work of the revolution to the very end. Menzhinsky, the head of the G. P. U., and Trilisser, former head of the foreign section of the G. P. U., were both aware of Blumkin's views, but he continued to fulfill his important revolutionary function because Menzhinsky and Trilisser considered him irreplaceable, and that was correct.

Now he has been shot—the Militant is in a position to state this from unquestionably authentic sources. Why? On whose responsibility, on whose orders?

On hearing the news, thousands and tens of thousands of Russian workers and Communists will whisper in horror at the deed. They know that such an act could never have been committed in Lenin's day. At that time, the Tcheka (now G. P. U.) carried out a rigorous task. But its activities remained subordinated to the control of the Bolshevik Party. At the head of the Tcheka stood Dzerzhinsky, a man of superior moral power. He remained subordinated to the Political Bureau of the Party, composed of members who had clear ideas on every question and knew how to defend them. All this was a guarantee that the Tcheka would rest an instrument of the revolutionary dictatorship.

Now the Party is stifled. At the head of the G. P. U. stands Menzhinsky, not a man, but the shadow of a man! The principal role in the G. P. U. is played by Iagoda a detestable careerist, who has bound his fate with Stalin's and carries out the latter's orders unquestionably. The Political Bureau does not exist—of that the recent revelations of Bucharin bear incontestable witness. Stalin holds the Political Bureau in his palms and uses the G. P. U. to collect such material against them as will insure their obedience. Under such conditions, the execution of Blumkin is a personal affair of Stalin.

Has Blumkin been assassinated? Why? William Z. Foster, the head of the American Communist Party, who has just returned from Moscow, should know. Does he assume joint responsibility with Stalin for this unheard of crime? Do Browder, and Bedacht, and Minor and the others in the Party leadership? Let them speak out publicly! Or do they want the Blumkin affair to become the Sacco-Vanzetti case of the Communist movement?

YES OR NO! HAS BLUMKIN BEEN ASSASSINATED? TELL US, FOSTER! AND TELL US WHY!

The undertone of dissatisfaction that has characterized the attitude of the British Japanese, French and Italian capitalist powers at the London conference on naval reduction with the arrogance and demands of the United States imperialist representatives, is now coming sharply into the open. The conference of pirates is showing dissent.

The rift has taken place with America's proposal that she be permitted to build a modification of the proposed capital ship new battleship of 35,000 tons. This is a better America's battleship standing with "holiday" until 1935, and would actually Great Britain, with whom the United States expresses disagreements on replacements. The London Daily Times, organ of the Conservatives and the Daily Herald, organ of the Labour Party and the MacDonald Government, together protest on behalf of British imperialist privileges. The Times protests that the American proposal really give an advantage to the United States; and the Daily Herald refers to naval parity as "Parity disease" and "If the American suggestion is accepted it will mean the conference will be a prelude to, not a cessation of battleship building.

Each has its special capitalists interests to preserve, and each demands its share of cruisers submarines, battleships or other naval armaments. All make plans for war equipment for years ahead.

The French paper, Figaro, complains, "The United States obstinately pursues her plans...All she cares about is to have the kind and size of navy she wants", and goes on to add that France's freedom of action is preferable to agreement. "The Americans started in after the war to build the largest fleet in the world but found it too expensive. Now they think they can achieve the same result by forcing others to reduce. Britain has agreed to impose limitations on other naval powers. They are to be equal but all others are to be inferior and they intend to fix the size of the French, Italian and Japanese navies. Moreover, in condemning submarines in theory, they are trying to force us to accept an unsatisfactory minimum."

America Spreads Her Wings

But America is insistent and feels that her strength and resources will prevail. Formal parity with Great Britain under the circumstances actually means that America supersedes Great Britain as mistress of the seas. Stimsons' proposals have the design to place the American delegation in a dominant role at London.

The Japanese are bitterly hostile, but know not where to turn for relief. Small concessions have been made to the Mikado government in the way of submarines.

So the pirates quarrel and fight for the spoils, and politely ask the other fellow pirate to walk the plank. The scared petty-bourgeois pacifist sees his hopes going up in smoke. First secretly, now openly the imperialist powers reveal that all their maneuvers are but paper talk and are actually laying the basis and strengthening themselves for the next imperialist war, first through diplomacy, and finally in the extension of diplomacy into the reality of scourging war. Reduction and disarmament are just talk. These capitalist representatives feel more comfortable that they hear nothing of an actual program for total disarmament in all fields, as proposed by the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. But the road toward total disarmament and the abolition of war lies through the struggle for the abolition of capitalism...And so the London Conference will talk reduction and peace—and prepare for war.

Unemployment Stalks The Middle West

Charity organizations and welfare departments in middle western cities face a situation in February, 1930 which is without parallel except for the winter of 1921-2. Tens of thousands of unemployed men and women walk the streets looking for work, with rent overdue and food credit exhausted.

The Chicago "slave market" is thronged with men. All day long they crowd the sidewalks in West Madison St., spilling over into the side streets and alleys and gathering in mobs in front of any employment office that advertises for help. Most of the employment office windows have chalked up the sign "No Shipment Today".

Only 44% Work in Toledo

A census of employment taken in Toledo shows that for every hundred men working in February, 1929 there were 44 men working in February, 1930. Some of the more important plants are practically closed down and there is no chance for work outside of an occasional snow-shovelling job.

Estimates place the number of unemployed in Detroit somewhere between 100,000 and 125,000. Day after day they gather before employment offices in lines four deep that extend for blocks. An ad for one man will bring a thousand applicants.

Cleveland has faced hard times for the last three years. Unemployment there is as severe as it is in other neighboring cities, but since it is of longer duration many of the "out-of-works" have drifted to other places, looking for jobs.

The Charities of Louisville, Ky. are facing a late winter and spring in which relief demands from the unemployed, evicted and other distress cases are overtaking their budgets. Present demands indicate a need for the year 1930 of about double the amount of money available.

"Welfare" Dept. Jammed

The Detroit Welfare Department, a city institution, cared for about 7,000 families in November, about 9,000 in December and about 11,000 in January 1930. Toward the end of January the office of the department was daily jammed with applicants of whom about one in eight received assistance. In addition to the charity distributed by this public organization, the usual private agencies in Detroit found their hands more than full.

Hoover's prosperity conferences have received far more public notice than the lines of unemployed waiting outside the factory gates all through the industrial section of the United States. They do not provide jobs, however, as hundreds of thousands of desperate workers know to their cost. Many of the jobless are loyal supporters of the Republican machine. Most of the balance voted for Al Smith in 1928. Empty stomachs and eviction notices provide the basis for disillusionment.

Men versus Machines

HILL STATION, Pa.-(FP)—A veteran pick miner, experienced through over 20 years of coal mining in the Pittsburgh coal area, has figured out the operator's book-keeping in deciding whether to use cutting machines at the coal face or a miner with the old time pick. It's the question of leath versus replacement cost.

"We used to do all the mining by hand," he says, nursing a foot on which 150 pounds of slate had fallen in a mine entry. "Then the machines began to come in but they were expensive and not always efficient. We still had them on even terms. But the machine cutters constantly got better and faster. We began to lose out.

"Now the machine does almost all the work in the pit where I work. We pick miners still get a small share but it does not cheer us much to know why. Anywhere that a machine can safely go we have no chance. But if it is dangerous for the machine, the boss sends us in.

"In some places a fall of rock might smash the machine and that would be a loss of $4,000 to $5,000. But if we get killed the maximum compensation under Pennsylvania is only $3,000. So the company saves at least $1,000 by taking a chance on a miner's life instead of on its expensive machinery.

35'000 Jobless in New Jersey Industrial Center

TRENTON, N. J.—Investigation of appalling unemployment in New Jersey is proposed in a bill introduced in the state legislature. Estimates of unemployment in this state run into the six figures, with 35,000-40,000 jobless in Newark and surrounding cities. The situation is most severe in Camden, Newark and Jersey City. In Caldwell, a Newark suburb, hundreds of colored workers are jobless and almost starving.

Both the Johnson & Johnson medical supplies plant at New Brunswick and the U. S. Metals & Refining Co. at Carteret are reported to have laid off hundreds.

Taxi Maintenance Men Join Strikers

PITTSBURG—This city's embattled taxi drivers are standing firm in the fourth week of their strike for union and better wages. Maintenance crews in the scab Parmalee garages have joined the strikers.

Although cars that venture on the streets carry large signs that interference with their operation is a violation of a strikebreaking injunction, the order is cheerfully ignored. Deputies, privately paid at $10 per day, accompany the cabs in their occasional sorties on downtown streets.

An interesting sidelight is thrown on the character of these deputies by the arrest of one who relieved a friend of the change from a $50 bill after he had paid for the guard's dinner. Strikebreakers imported from Philadelphia and New Orleans are involved in arrests for traffic law violations and figuring in smashups caused by their ignorance of Pittsburgh traffic.

CLEVELAND—Five hundred taxi drivers have signed up and affiliated with the Cleveland Federation of Labor.

REPORTS BODE ILL FOR AUTO SLAVES

DETROIT—Two reports, appearing here over the week-end, bode ill for employment prospects of Detroit auto workers. One from Chicago, states that "the Chicago Automobile Show drew a record attendance, but available data on sales indicate a sharp decline in comparison with last year".

The other, from the Oakland plant in Pontiac, states: "As a result of the recent installation of a new machine in the sheet metal plant of the Oakland Motor Car Co., production of hood rod clips has been speeded up to 220 a minute.

"Previous to the installation of the machine, hood clips were produced on four machines at the rate of 150 per hour. With the new installation only two hours work is required to turn out a months supply."

BIRMINGHAM WAGES MISERLY

By T. S. RAWLINGS

BIRMINGHAM, Ala.-(FP)—In this steel city a worker is lucky to have any job at all in January, and doubly lucky if he is making enough to keep out of debt. Common labor, mostly colored, is getting as low as 20 cents an hour; carpenters, as low as 35 cents, bricklayers are being offered 50 cents and machinists 45 cents. Young men and women in offices are getting $7 to $10 a week. The cost of living though in Birmingham, is as high as anywhere else in the country.

Perhaps the Chamber of Commerce is no different than similar bodies elsewhere. At any rate they can tell you where John Smith moved when he left his previous address (for the benefit of the credit houses and loan sharks), where he works and how much the various open shop firms pay. But on constructive information concerning economic conditions in the district the Chamber is mum as an oyster.

No easy going organizing methods will catch on here. Real fire will be needed to fight back at the long unchallenged sway of the iron and steel, coal and textile barons who shaped this Alabama into a heaven for profiteers and a purgatory for labor.

WEAVERS WALK OUT IN CAROLINA MILL

WILMINGTON, N. C.—Forty weavers of the Delgado cotton mill in Wilmington have walked out in protest against the stretchout system.

The strikers refused to accept their pay checks after they had read a bulletin posted at the mill announcing the wage cut. They are unorganized.

Help Us to Sustain The Militant

A labor paper, particularly a revolutionary organ, does not receive the big advertisements and subsidies, without which a capitalist paper is unthinkable. The Militant is no exception to this rule. It must depend entirely upon readers and supporters for its existence and growth.

The Militant was founded because it fills a special and urgent need in the labor and revolutionary movements. It has been maintained by a group of devoted workers, who understand the value of adherence to the fundamental teachings of the great leaders of our movement, Marx, Engels, Lenin and Trotsky. These teachings are not strong if they are limited to small groups; they become a powerful weapon for labors liberation when they are made known to the whole working class—honestly and truthfully. This is the task set itself by the Militant.

This great work can be carried out effectively only if the existence of the Militant is secured. For this purpose, it is necessary to establish and strengthen a systematic SUSTAINING FUND. Such a fund will not only enable us to print a whole series of most valuable books and pamphlets. The Militant has on hand a number of manuscripts by L. D. Trotsky. They include: "What Is the Permanent Revolution?" The Struggle for the Chinese Revolution", "Europe and America", "The Great Organizers of Defeat: a Record of Five Years of the Comintern", and many others. If the SUSTAINING FUND of the Militant is assured, we can proceed to the immediate publication of these Bolshevik classics.

The sooner donations accumulate for the FUND, the more rapidly can we proceed with this important job. Every dollar counts doubly now. We are depending upon all our readers and friends to act with speed. The blank below is for your use. Fill it out now!

The Socialist Party and Radicalization of the Masses

By James P. Cannon

The ten year period following the end of the war was marked by an integration and growth of the American Communist movement and a concurrent decline in the organization and influence of the Socialist Party. For the past year or so we have been witnessing a reversal of this process. The relation of forces between the two contending tendencies—of revolution and reform—has undergone a change. These are the important facts which merit consideration and analysis.

It profits the revolutionary wing of the labor movement nothing to evade or deny this state of affairs. On the contrary it will do harm, for the radical workers see what is going on before their eyes and are apt to draw false conclusions regarding the efficacy and future prospects of revolutionary ideas. Such indeed is the meaning of the recent noticeable shifting of allegiance of many workers, particularly in the needle trades, who had conscientiously supported the Left wing and the Communist Party for several years. The Communist workers are entitled to an appraisal of the situation.

I

The advance of Communism in the struggle against the Socialist Party, and to a large extent at its expense, over a ten-year period is undeniable. A few facts: The Left wing gained a majority in the party struggle of 1919 and the Hillquit-Berger machine was able to prevent its capture of the convention only by wholesale expulsions (aided, however, as has so often been the case, by stupidities of the Left wing leadership). Even after the split in 1919, which reduced the Socialist Party membership from 100,000 to less than 20,000, a new Left wing developed within it under the pressure of Communist sentiments in the ranks. This culminated in the second split—a weak one, it is true, with still weaker leadership—of the "Workers Council" group at the end of 1921. The Communists became organizationally stronger than the Socialists despite the terrific handicaps of the Palmer terror and the three-years' period of underground organization. The C. P. extended its operations throughout the country while the S. P. influence and strength were confined to isolated localities, notably New York and Milwaukee. The superior strength and fighting ability of the Communists were graphically demonstrated in the big movements which engaged the attention of the workers: The Labor Party campaign, the organization of the Left wing in the trade unions, the Passaic strike, the Sacco-Vanzetti movement, the needle trades struggles. The collapse of the New York Call, the daily paper of the S. P., just preceding the establishment of the Daily Worker, symbolized the waning power of one party and the upward swing of the other.

A Period of Communist Growth

Over that entire ten-year period our party continued to win recruits, individually and in groups, from its Socialist rival, with no shuffling in the other direction. The tides in those days swept out of the S. P. and into our ranks with such eminent pillars of present day Communism as Engdahl, Schneid, Olgin and almost the whole Freiheit staff, not to speak of Kruse, who has begun to drift back by way of the Lovestone detour. Scott Nearing left the S. P. in 1923 and joined the C. P. in 1926. Weisbord, who became justly renowned as the Communist organizer of the Passaic strike in 1926, had been the Secretary of the Young Peoples Socialist League and a campaigner for La Follette in 1924. All of these people, and many others who could be mentioned, were, in one sense of the word, weather-cocks indicating the way the wind was blowing.

Now, after ten years of stagnation and decay, the Socialist Party is showing manifest signs of a revival, partly at the expense of the C. P. The facts which demonstrate this trend are as incontestable as are the reasons which explain it. The greatly increased Socialist vote in the recent New York municipal election, while the Communist vote was reduced to insignificance is one of these signs. The re-establishment of the Right wing unions in the needle trades is another. The increased recruitment of new members is a third sign. (For example, the report of the secretary at the latest meeting of the National Executive Committee claimed more members enrolled in 1929 than in the whole five preceding years). Socialist influence in the C. P. and renewed activity in the general trade union movement are a fourth sign. The reformist Socialist Party confronts the revolutionary Communists in 1930 as a stronger foe than at any time since the split in 1919.

II

Weather-cocks also reflect the new situation. The first of these was Schneid, president of a Chicago local of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers union, who came to us from the S. P. on the tide of Communist influence in the union in 1922. Last year the reaction carried him back to the S. P. A recent convert to reformism is Hendin, once a member of the C. E. C., who demanded "armed insurrection"—nothing less—at the first underground convention of our party in 1920. (He overestimated the "radicalization" at the time.) There are many others less prominent travelling the same path; one in particular named Streit, who led a squad of Stalinists to break up a meeting of the Communist Opposition in Philadelphia less than a year ago.

The Course of Lovestone's Faction

Besides those individuals who desert Communism and pass over directly into the reformist camp of the S. P.—and—more significant—are those who have started on an indirect route, by stages, to the same place. Speaking from the standpoint of political logic—which is decisive—and disregarding personal intentions—which are not—this is the destination of the Lovestone faction. We do not see any ground for the permanent existence of a political party half-way between Communism and reformism which is the sum and substance of Right wing wisdom. The example of the 2-1-2 International and all similar national groupings excludes such a prospect. That Lovestone and Wolfe understand this as well as anyone, cannot be doubted. The Forward's estimate of Lovestone's present "work" as the "most useful he has ever done for the working class" is, from their standpoint, a quite intelligent judgement.

It ought to be easily understood why Lovestone and Wolfe cannot proceed directly to their political destination. Conscientious worker-Communists, revolting against the stupidity and brutality of the Foster regime have been caught in Lovestone's trap. Deception and maneuver are necessary to keep these workers together on a graduated reactionary course. Lovestone and Wolfe need time, but they are known for speed and they are making headway. They have already succeeded in leading their followers to Brandler and his program of "National Communism" without a centralized international. They have already translated "Socialism in one country"—the slogan under which they expelled us from the party—into "Communism in one country". This is progress enough for six months. The rest will follow.

III

A number of factors contribute to the phenomena of a Socialist Party revival after ten years of retrogression. The most important is the beginning of a "radicalization" of the workers about which so much is being written these days. The fearfully accelerated exploitation involved in the development of industrial technique which goes by the name of "rationalization" plus wage-cuts, plus swelling unemployment and its attendant horrors, stimulates a labor discontentment which is beginning to grope for expression. It is of decisive importance to have a precise estimate of the character and degree of this discontent. In this field nothing is helpful but actual facts. In the light of such facts there is no ground whatever for the assumption that this "radicalization" of the American workers has anything approaching immediate revolutionary implications, or that the masses are ready for Communist leadership. So far it is possible to speak of tentative movements in the worker masses as "radicalization" in a strictly defined and limited sense. The traditional lack of class consciousness of the American workers, and their specific indifference to social questions as they record it on every occasion (the elections, for example) absolutely preclude the attempt to fit them into any European or world formula of "radicalization". This term can be used intelligently only on an American scale, in comparison with the recent years of "prosperity"; and then only with the reservation that this "radicalization" is shown in its first stages, as symptoms of deeper movement to come.

The Strike Barometer

This is the only possible conclusion which ascertainable facts will allow. Take the record of recent strikes, always a good barometer of working class militancy. Exact figures of strike movements over a period of years are not at hand at the moment, but the general outline is well known. The textile workers' strike in the South, the sporadic strikes of auto workers and similar outbursts certainly show an awakening mood of the workers involved. But altogether they have so far involved only a few thousand workers, a number in no way comparable to the hundreds of thousands who took part in the great strike movements in coal and steel and on the railroads in 1919 and 1922. Moreover, the responsiveness of the workers generally all over the country, to these strikes was negligible. The elections, another yardstick of proletarian class development, show a Communist debacle, a Socialist gain and a reactionary victory. The various political demonstrations organized by the Communist Party have yet to show serious working class support. They are real "Communist" demonstrations in the sense that only Communists take an active part in them. It is self deception to represent curious spectators as participants in these actions. The unemployment movement shows promise but is, as yet, only in its initial stages.

The most pronounced expressions of the symptoms of radicalization of the workers has been through reformist channels. Such is the meaning of the increased socialist vote insofar as it came from the workers; of the general revival of S. P. influence among the workers; of the appearance of "progressive" movements in the trade unions under S. P. leadership. Such is the real explanation of the fact that thousands of workers in the needle trades are turning to the reorganized Right wing unions. The signs of Socialist Party revival appearing simultaneously with the beginning of working class radicalization is no contradiction. It appears so only to those who grossly exaggerate the extent of the radicalization process and attempt to substitute noisy and flamboyant proclamations for actual moods of the masses. They cannot reconcile these imaginary revolutionary moods with a growth of reformist influence and they try to dispose of the latter by ignoring or denying it. The refusal to see things as they are has always been a fool's dangerous game. Nobody, least of all revolutionaries, ever yet won a war against facts. But this is precisely the whole military strategy of the Foster generals.

IV

A second reason for the recent prosperity which has overtaken the long insolvent firm of Hillquit and Company, bound up with the symptoms of labor radicalism which the capitalists see as clearly as we do and which they fear as much as we welcome, is the patronage of the liberal wing of Capitalism. The more far-sighted elements of American capitalism, profiting by European post-war experience, fear a revolutionary influence on a radicalized working class and wish to prepare a buffer against it in advance. For this purpose they are not unwilling to "build up" the liberalized Socialist Party of which they have no fears whatever. The "good press" which the S. P. received in the New York municipal campaign, including the direct support of several papers, had far deeper implications than a mere gesture of protest against the crudities of Tammany Hall. The New York papers were helping to prepare a safety valve before the social boiler has begun to steam.

On its part, the gaining of this capitalist patronage has been facilitated by the deliberate movement of the Socialist Party to the Right. It has spared no effort to establish respectability and harmlessness to the existing social order. It is more and more becoming the haven of inoffensive liberals as well as the shield of labor reactionaries such as the Black Hundreds in the needle trades. Norman Thomas, as spokesman who makes no pretense of Marxism, is a perfect symbol of this metamorphosis of a Party which once proclaimed in words always, and some times in deed, the doctrine of the class struggle.

A third important factor which has aided the Socialists is the crisis in the Communist Party and the incompetent leadership by appointment, which is made to order for Socialist progress at Communist expense.

The Party crisis which grows deeper from day to day has had a profound effect on the radical workers. Without understanding the principle issues, they see only the splits and get an impression of disintegration and decay. They see a once formally united party appearing as three separate factions, each publishing its own organ. In such circumstances the official assurances of "unity" sound to them like a scared boy whistling in the dark. The recruiting power of the movement is paralyzed and thousands of party members fall away in discouragement and despair. Some of them have become victims of reformist illusions—a fate for which they have been prepared by the reign of opportunism in the Party and in the Communist International.

The Fosterite Contribution to the S. P.

The incredible weakness of the appointed leadership, which piles blunder on top of blunder in a vicious system, robs the party of its opportunity to plunge forward on the basis of the new trend in the working class and thus facilitates the game of the reformists. The substitution of noise for thought and vituperation for argument—the political method of Foster and Company—hurts nobody but the workers' vanguard and is grist to the S. P. mill. Many of the new recruits of the S. P. are Foster's contribution to Hillquit.

It is quite the fashion these days for the Party overseers to remind the workers of the overwhelming importance of the "leadership" they are receiving, like a gift, as it were, from the skies. The idea appears in the Party press again and again in the most offensive and patronizing manner. Leadership undoubtedly has a great importance in the proletarian struggle. But it works both ways, and in stressing this question the bureaucrats of the day are only helping, unwittingly, to furnish an explanation of Communist defeats and Socialist victories. An ignorant and corrupt leadership, such as now afflicts the party, can deal the heaviest blows against the cause of the workers' vanguard, and is dealing them. Looking back over the ten years record of the Party, with its ups and downs, its often sad experiences with leaders who have come and gone, one can say with complete assurance that history—insofar as it takes note of the matter—will sustain the judgement, that the present leadership of the Party is the worst it ever had. We say this without forgetting any past experience at any stage of the Party's evolution. The Foster regime has all the stupidity of the Hourwich group without their principle, and the corruption of the Lovestone group without their intelligence.

The Communist workers, staggering under defeat after defeat in times when progress ought to be the rule, will do well to take the usurping bureaucrats at their word when they urge them to remember the decisive importance of leadership. The first conclusion they will come to after a serious consideration of this question will be the necessity of overthrowing the present leadership and organizers of defeat. They will find—since the American bureaucrats are simply the appointed agents of the Stalin E. C. C. I.—that the first steps in this direction will lead them toward participation in the great international struggle over the foundation principles of Communism which the Bolshevik-Leninists are defending against the new revisionists. The disintegration of the American Communist movement is bound up with an international situation and cannot be isolated from it. A real fight against this disintegration can be conducted only under the banner of the International Opposition, for that is the banner of Communism.

VI

The spectacle of Socialist Party advancement and Communist retrogression at a time when there are many signs of a new upward trend of working class activity are transient phenomena based on illusions of the workers, cleverly exploited by the reformists, and misleadership and internal crisis in the Communist movement. In the temporary fluctuation in the class struggle there is no cause for alarm, to say nothing of despair in the revolutionary ranks. The ultimate victory belongs to Communism, but there is no law that it will proceed to this victory on a straight ascending line.

The Fundamental Principle Errors of Syndicalism

(To Serve in the Discussion with Monatte and the Pure Syndicalists in General)

By L. D. Trotsky

When I arrived in France in October 1914, I found the French socialist and trade union movement in a state of the most complete demoralization. In the search for revolutionists, with lantern in hand, I made the acquaintance of Monatte and Rosmer. They had not succumbed to chauvinism. It was thus that our friendship began. Monatte was an anarcho-syndicalist; despite that he was immeasurably closer to me than the French Guesdists who were playing a pitiful and shameful role. At that time, the Cachins were knocking at the servants' entrance to the ministries of the Third Republic and the Allied embassies. In 1915, Monatte left the Central Committee of the C. G. T., slamming the door behind him. His departure from the trade union centre was in essence nothing but a split. At that time, however, Monatte believed—and rightly so—that the fundamental historical tasks of the proletariat stood above unity with chauvinists and lackeys of imperialism. It was precisely in this that Monatte was loyal to the best traditions of revolutionary syndicalism.

Monatte, one of the first friends of the October Revolution, nevertheless, unlike Rosmer had held aloof for a long time. That was well in keeping with the character of Monatte, as I was later convinced, of standing aside, of waiting, of criticizing. At times this is absolutely unavoidable. But as a permanent line of conduct it becomes transformed into sectarianism which has a close affinity with Proudhonism, but nothing in common with Marxism.

Lenin and the Syndicalists

When the Socialist Party of France became the Communist Party, I frequently had occasion to discuss with Lenin the onerous heritage the International had received in the person of leaders like Cachin, Frossard, and other heroes of the League of the Rights of Man, of the Freemasons, of parliamentarians, careerists and babblers. Here is one of these conversations—which I have already published in the press, if I am not mistaken: "It would be good," Lenin said to me, "to drive out all these weathercocks, and to draw into the party the revolutionary syndicalists, the militant workers, people who are really devoted to the cause of the working class. And Monatte?" "Monatte would of course be ten times better than Cachin and those like him", I replied. "But Monatte not only continues to reject parliamentarism, but to this day he has not grasped the significance of the party". Lenin was astounded: "Impossible! Has not grasped the significance of the party after the October Revolution? That's a very dangerous symptom."

I carried on a correspondence with Monatte in which I insisted that he come to Moscow. He was evasive. True to his nature, he preferred, in this case too, to stand aside and wait. And besides the Communist Party did not suit him. In that he was right. But instead of helping to transform it, he waited. During the Fourth Congress we succeeded in taking the first steps towards cleansing the C. P. F. of Free-masons, pacifists and office seekers. Monatte entered the party. But it is not necessary to underline the fact that this did not mean to us that he had adopted a Marxian viewpoint; not at all. On March 13, 1923, I wrote in Pravda: "The entrance of our old friend, Monatte into the party was a great day for us; men of his stamp are necessary to the revolution. But it certainly would be wrong to pay the price of confusion and lack of clarity of ideas for this rapprochement." In this article I criticized the scholasticism of Louzon on the relations between the class, trade unions and the party. In particular, I explained that pre-war syndicalism had been an embryo of the Communist Party, that this embryo had since become a child, and that if this child was suffering from measles and rickets it was necessary to nurse it, but that it would be absurd to imagine that it could be made to return to its mother's womb. I may perhaps be permitted to say in this regard, that the arguments of my 1923 article, in caricature, serve to this day as the main weapons against Monatte in the hands of Monmousseau and the other anti-Trotskyist warriors.

Monatte joined the party; but he hardly had time to turn about and accustom himself to a house far vaster than his little shop on the quai de Jemmapes, when the new "Etat" in the International burst upon him: Lenin was taken ill, the campaign against "Trotskyism" and the Zinovievist "Bolshevization" began. Monatte could not submit to the careerists who, by leaning upon the general staff of epigones at Moscow, and disposing of unlimited resources, carried on by means of intrigue and slander. Monatte was expelled from the party. This episode, important, but still only an episode, was of decisive moment in the political development of Monatte. He decided that his brief experience in the party had fully confirmed his anarcho-syndicalist prejudices against the party in general. Monatte then began insistently to retrace his steps towards abandoned positions. He began to seek again the Amiens Charter. For all that he had to turn his face to the past. The experience of the war, of the Russian Revolution, and of the world trade union movement were lost upon him, leaving hardly a trace. Once again Monatte stood aside and waited. What for? A new Amiens Congress. During these last few years I was unfortunately unable to follow the retrogressive evolution of Monatte: the Russian Opposition lived in a blockaded circle.

Monatte's Fetishisms

Out of the whole treasure of the theory and practice of the world struggle of the proletariat Monatte has extracted but two ideas: trade union autonomy and trade union unity. He has placed these two pure principles above sinful reality. It is on trade union unity that he has based his newspaper and the Syndicalist League. Unfortunately, these two ideas are empty and each one of them resembles the hole in a ring. Whether the ring be made of iron, silver or gold, Monatte does not care in the least. The ring, you know, always hampers the trade union's activity. Monatte is interested only in the hole of autonomy.

No less empty is the other sacred principle: unity. In its name Monatte even stood up against the rupture of the Anglo-Russian committee, even though the General Council of the British Trade Unions had betrayed the general strike. The fact that Stalin, Bucharin, Cachin, Monmousseau and others supported the bloc with the strike-breakers until the latter gave them a kick does not lessen in the least Monatte's mistake. After my arrival abroad I made an attempt to explain to the readers of the Revolution Proletarienne the criminal character of this bloc, the consequences of which are still being felt by the worker's movement. Monatte did not want to publish my article. And how could it have been otherwise, since I had made an assault upon the sacred trade union unity, which solves all questions and reconciles all contradictions?

When strikers run up against a group of strikebreakers in their path, they throw them from their midst without sparing blows. If the strike-breakers are union men they throw them out immediately, without worrying over the sacred principles of trade union unity. Monatte surely has no objections to this. But the matter is entirely different when it is a question of the trade union bureaucracy and its leaders. The General Council is not composed of starving and backward strikebreakers, no, these are quite experienced and well-known traitors; who found it necessary at a certain moment to stand at the head of the general strike in order to decapitate it all the more quickly and surely. They worked hand in hand with the government, the bosses and the princes of the church. It would seem that the leaders of the Russian trade unions, who were in a political bloc with the General Council, should have immediately, openly and relentlessly broken with it at that very moment, before the masses it deceived and betrayed. But Monatte rises up fiercely: It is forbidden to disturb trade union unity. In an astonishing manner, he forgets that he himself upset this unity in 1915 by leaving the chauvinist "General Council" of the C.G.T. (General Confederation of Labor).

It must be said squarely: Between the Monatte of 1915 and the Monatte of 1929, there is an abyss. To Monatte it must seem that he is remaining entirely faithful to himself. Formally, this is true, up to a certain point. Monatte repeats a few old formulae, but he ignores entirely the experience of the last fifteen years, richer in lessons than all the preceding history of humanity. In the attempt to return to his former positions, Monatte simply fails to notice that they have disappeared a long time ago. No matter what question is raised, Monatte looks backward. This may be seen most clearly in the question of the party and the state.

The Dangers of State-ism

Some time ago, Monatte accused me of underestimating "the dangers of state-ism" (Revolution Proletarienne, No. 79, May 1, 1929, page 2). This reproach is not a new one; it has its origin in the struggle of Bakunin against Marx and it shows a false, contradictory and essentially non-proletarian conception of the state.

With the exception of one country, state power throughout the world is in the hands of the bourgeoisie. It is in this, and only in this, that lies the state danger from the point of view of the proletariat. Its historical task is to wrest this most powerful instrument of oppression from the hands of the bourgeoisie. The Communists do not deny the difficulties, the dangers that are connected with the dictatorship of the proletariat. But can this lessen by one iota the necessity to seize power? If the whole proletariat were carried by an irresistible force to the conquest of power or if it had already conquered it, one could, strictly speaking, understand this or that warning of the syndicalists. Lenin, as is known, warned in his testament against abuse of revolutionary power. The struggle against the distortions of the dictatorship of the proletariat has been conducted by the Opposition since it existed, and without the need of borrowing from the arsenals of the anarchists.

But in the bourgeois countries, the misfortune lies in the fact that the overwhelming majority of the proletariat does not understand as it should the dangers of the bourgeois state. By the manner in which they treat the question, the syndicalists, naturally against their intention, contribute to the passive conciliation of the workers with the state of capital. When the syndicalists chant to the workers oppressed by the bourgeois power their admonitions against the dangers of the state for the proletariat, they play a purely reactionary role. The bourgeois will readily repeat to the workers: "Do not touch the state because it is a snare full of dangers for you." The Communist will say to the workers: "The difficulties and dangers with which the proletariat is confronted the day after the conquest of power—we will learn to overcome them on the basis of experience. But at the present time, the most menacing dangers lie in the fact that our class enemy holds the rein of power in its hands and directs it against us."

In contemporary society there are only two classes capable of holding power in their hands: the capitalist bourgeoisie and the revolutionary proletariat. For the petty bourgeoisie has long ago lost the economic possibility of directing the destinies of modern society. Now and then, in fits of desperation it rises for the conquest of power, even with arms in hand, as has happened in Italy, in Poland and other countries. But the Fascist insurrections only end in this result: the new power becomes the instrument of finance capital under an even more naked and brutal form. That is why the most representative ideologists of the petty bourgeoisie are afraid of state power as such. The petty bourgeoisie fears power when it is in the hands of the big bourgeoisie, because the latter expresses and ruins it. It also fears it when it is in the hands of the proletariat, for the latter undermines all the conditions of its habitual existence. Finally, it fears power when it falls into its own hands because it must inevitably pass out of its powerless hands into those of finance capital or the proletariat. That is why the anarchists do not see the revolutionary problems of state power, its historical role, that is why they see only the "dangers of state-ism". The anti-state anarchists are consequently the most logical, and for that reason, the most hopeless representatives of the petty bourgeoisie in its historical blind alley.

Yes, the "dangers of state-ism" exist under the regime of the dictatorship of the proletariat as well, but the substance of these dangers consists precisely in the fact that power can actually return to the hands of the bourgeoisie. The best known and most obvious state danger is bureaucratism. But what is its character? If the enlightened workers' bureaucracy could lead society to socialism, that is, to the liquidation of the state, we would be reconciled with such bureaucracy. But it has an entirely opposite character: by separating itself from the proletariat, by raising itself above it, the bureaucracy falls under the influence of the petty bourgeois classes and can by that very fact facilitate the return of power into the hands of the bourgeoisie. In other words, the state dangers for the workers under the dictatorship of the proletariat are in the final analysis nothing but the danger of restoring the power to the bourgeoisie.

The question of the source of this bureaucratic danger is no less important. It would be radically wrong to think, to imagine that bureaucratism rises exclusively from the fact of the conquest of power by the proletariat. No, that is not the case. In the capitalist states, the most monstrous forms of bureaucratism are to be observed precisely in the trade unions. It is enough to cast a glance at America, England and Germany. Amsterdam is the most powerful international organization of the trade union bureaucracy. It is thanks to it that the whole structure of capitalism now stands upright, above all in Europe and especially in England. If there were not a bureaucracy of the trade unions, then the police, the army, the courts, the lords, the monarchy would appear before the proletarian masses as nothing but pitiful and ridiculous playthings. The bureaucracy of the trade unions is the backbone of British imperialism. It is by means of this bureaucracy that the bourgeoisie exists, not only in the metropolis, but in India, in Egypt and in the other colonies. One would have to be completely blind to say to the English workers: "Be on guard against the conquest of power and always remember that your trade unions are the antidote to bureaucratic dangers." The Marxist will say to the English workers: "The trade union bureaucracy is the most powerful instrument for your oppression by the bourgeois state. Power must be wrested from the hands of the bourgeoisie and for that its principal agent, the trade union bureaucracy, must be overthrown." Parenthetically, it is especially for this reason that the bloc of Stalin with the strikebreakers was so criminal.

From the example of England, one sees very clearly how absurd it is to oppose as two different principles trade union organization and state organization. In England more than anywhere else, the state rests upon the back of the working class which constitutes the overwhelming majority of the population of the country. The mechanism is such that the bureaucracy is based directly on the workers, and the state indirectly, by the intermediary of the trade union bureaucracy.

Up to now we have not mentioned the Labour Party which, in England, in this class country of trade union, is the simple transposition of the same trade union bureaucracy. The same leaders guide the trade unions, betray the general strike, lead the electoral campaign and later on sit in the ministries. The Labour Party, the trade unions—these are not two principles, they are only a technical division of labor. Together they are the fundamental support of the domination of the English bourgeoisie. This latter cannot be overthrown without overthrowing the Labourite bureaucracy. And that cannot be attained by opposing the trade union as such to the state as such, but by the active opposition of the Communist Party to the Labourite bureaucracy in all fields of social life: in the trade unions, in strikes, in the electoral campaign, in parliament and in power. The principal task of a real party of the proletariat consists in putting itself at the head of the working masses, organized in trade unions and unorganized, to wrest power from the bourgeoisie and striking a death blow to the "dangers of state-ism".

Throughout the World of Labor

The Crisis in the Spanish Labor Movement

The formula: "Seventy five percent of our activity for trade union unity" had a tremendous echo in Spain and, it can be said, was the only slogan of the Comintern accepted practically by the Spanish working masses in general. The Communist Party of Spain, always at the tail of events and the masses, devoted itself one hundred percent to the application of instructions, blindly, without a clear vision of the problem, driven by the Spanish proletariat which is so inclined to impetuous but momentary actions. A guide was lacking, which would have canalized this strong movement of sympathy for trade union unity, which attained its peak in the very midst of dictatorial repression, during the convocation of the Congress for unity which was to have been held at San Sebastian in May 1926.

The masses demanded trade union unity at all costs. The Spanish Communist Party with the exception of a small group of competent militants who were grouped to be dominated by events and to be over-around the comrades of San Sebastian, among whom was the director of the Party's central organ, comrade Jean Andrade, was unable to establish itself as the guide and vanguard of the proletariat. The leadership of the party did not understand and was incapable of canalizing organically the aspirations of the masses; it allowed itself to be dominated by events and to be overcome on the unity wave that passed over the Spanish labor movement. La Antorcha, the central organ of the Party, was taken away from the competent direction of comrade Andrade and given to the political adventurer, Oscar Perez Solis, and, at the same time, the campaign for trade union unity and the daily La Antorcha came to a complete halt.

Had the masses already become "radicalized"? According to the calculations of the leaders of the Communist International, the "radicalization" already commenced. The poor petty bureaucrats of the Spanish C. P. were ready to comply with all the orders of Stalin and Co. without worrying over the result that their stupid, selfish submission would have for the Spanish labor movement. Inevitably, the masses of the workers who sought and hoped to meet a guide, saw their hopes deceived, and, taking place under the full repression of the dictatorship against the labor movement, they retreated; their militant spirit declined appreciably. Now the labor movement is entering into a real stage of crisis which the leaders of the C. I. and the Spanish C. P. designate as "radicalization of the masses".

The Spanish labor movement, based on the principle of the class struggle, had close to a million and a half organized workers in 1919. The C. N. T. (National Federation of Labor), with an anarcho-sindicalist tendency, counted a good million members. The U. G. T. (General Union of Workers), with a social reformist tendency, had more than two hundred thousand members. There existed besides a few independent trade unions which awaited the fusion of the two central organizations in order to give their adherence to the united trade union organization of the Spanish proletariat.

The repeated betrayals of the reformist general staff, the disruption of the united front which the social reformists perpetrated, the organized sabotage of the C. N. T. made the fusion of the two organizations a distant possibility to a large extent. The false tactic and the methods of struggle employed by the anarcho-sindicalists of the C. N. T., together with the repression of the bourgeois authorities, of which this organization was the object, rapidly weakened this giant that appeared invincible. The U. G. T. stood by impassively, arms folded, while the government attacked the C. N. T. Even more, the organizations fought each other with violence and the blood of the proletariat was spilled in various parts of Spain, at Bilbao particularly, during encounters between partisans of the two camps.

The C. P. of Spain, always slow to get moving, never succeeded, despite its contention into a single Communist Party, to adopt a correct and really Communist position. For its leaders, the whole problem was reduced to denouncing the heads of the U. G. T. and the C. N. T. without giving any concrete directives that might facilitate unity by putting the masses on the right track. Thus, the leadership of the C. P. S. fulfilled the role of a buffer between the leaders of the two organizations without knowing what to do with the masses who detested the false course of the leaders. And then the coup d'Etat of 1926 took place.

"The crisis in the dictatorship is sharpening", "Primo de Rivera is retiring", "a new constitutional era is approaching"—these are the themes developed by the leaders of the Spanish labor movement. All of them await the fall of Primo de Rivera as the triumph of their ideal, await it in order to begin the elaboration of a program for the "struggle for organization" and what is worse, to begin again the "war of the generals" and the aspiring generals in order to determine who was the most ardent, most clear-sighted and most discreet during the dictatorial period.

For us, the Communist Opposition, the problem and its solution does not lie in the fall of the Primo de Rivera dictatorship. Primo de Rivera can, in one of his eccentricities, pass the baton of orchestra director to Martinez Anida or some other lackey of capitalism. And even if he formed a government of the type of those of the "old regime", the Spanish working class would always be confronted by a capitalism determined to oppress it and strangle it.

The reorganization of the Spanish working class, the reorganization of the Communist Party, the trade union unity of the Spanish proletariat based on the principles of the class struggle, the struggle against the dictatorship and against the Spanish capitalist regime, the struggle for the liberty of the small oppressed nationalities, the methodical organization of the peasant masses, in short, for the emancipation of the Spanish working class, must be undertaken immediately without waiting for Primo de Rivera to yield his place to another butcher of the proletariat, without hoping for so-called political transformations which can take place in the "last stage of capitalism" only as an insurrection of the proletariat. Whether Primo de Rivera falls or not, the battle against the Spanish bourgeoisie must begin. There can be no waiting until Primo opens the road for us, as some seem to hope.

The Spanish Communist Opposition warns the Spanish workers against the stark optimism of those who see in the "crisis of the dictatorship" the perspective or almost the triumph of our class aspirations. The workers must not await the fall of the dictatorship in order to organize, to undertake the struggle for their emancipation.

The Spanish Communist Party must be the guide of the working class of Spain, its vanguard. Its leaders paralyze its development, prevent its reconstitution. The Communist Opposition has a great task to realize and it will accomplish it along the ideas of Lenin. The perspectives are favorable.

The League against Imperialism

The All-Indian National Congress was presided over by Jawaharlal Nehru. Nehru, with Gandhi, is the representative of the various vacillating and petty bourgeois masses; driven by the masses, the predominant element of their policy is fear of the masses, of the revolution against which they are fighting today with all ideological means; tomorrow, when the revolution raises its head in spite of Gandhism, the internal logic of their attitude and their policy will lead Gandhi and Nehru into the camp of the avowed enemies of the revolution.

The road that Nehru and Gandhi will take is already clearly indicated in the declaration of Gandhi appearing in Young India, the review of the nationalist Indian intellectuals. This is what it says: "For the introduction of passive resistance, the choice of the moment and the methods have been left to the Committee of the All-Indian Congress. But I must declare that I do not see the atmosphere propitious for such a measure."

And Gandhi does not conceal the reason for which the atmosphere does not appear to him. It is that every measure of struggle, even if it is conceived pacifically, is exceeded by the masses and can provoke revolutionary struggles.

But Jawaharlal Nehru, charged with expounding this policy, is one of the most eminent celebrities of the "League against Imperialism."

But in the meantime, Mme. Sun remains one of the luminaries of the "League against Imperialism."

The development of all these "heroes of a day" of the anti-imperialist struggle is obviously not due to chance. The Fengs and the Chiang Kai-Sheks became counter-revolutionaries the moment the worker and peasant masses entered spontaneously on the field of history and formulated their class demands. The same will happen with all the heroes of the Anti-Imperialist League.

It would be ridiculous to demand the exclusion of the already compromised "leaders" of the "League Against Imperialism." Not only must the Sandinos, the Nehrus and Company be removed from the revolutionary community of the world proletariat, but what must also be destroyed is the monstrous illusion, cruelly belied by history, according to which such a "League" can play leading, progressive role in the national revolution of the colonial peoples.

The "League against Imperialism," as a political center comprising Communist and bourgeois organizations, is a constant danger to the Communist International, to which it represents a competitor.

Things are similar if not worse in the Peasants International, which a European Peasants Congress is planned to draw out of its lethargy. For several weeks, the "revolutionary awakening" of the peasantry has been on the order of the day; in Germany, in Austria, etc., there are "revolutionary peasants demonstrations" for the election of delegates to the European peasants Congress. It therefore appears that we have arrived at a new edition of the "peasant policy" of the first "Leftist" period (1924-5); all the more necessary is it to recall to the revolutionary workers what Trotsky says in his criticism of the draft program of the Comintern:

"The peasantry will play a decisive role in the revolutions of the East. But this role will be neither leading nor independent. The poor peasants of Hupeh, Kwantung or Bengal can play a role not only on a national but on an international scale, but only on the condition that it supports the working class of Shanghai, Hankow or Calcutta. That is the only way out for the revolutionary peasant on an international road. The attempt to unite the peasant of Hupeh with the peasant of Galicia or the Dobrudja, the Egyptian fellah with the American farmer, has no chance to succeed."

What International Communism needs is not the creation of independent organizations of peasants and the unification of the bourgeois colonial parties into a "League against Imperialism," but a return to the teachings of Marxism-Leninism, the "outlived" teaching on the hegemony of the proletariat and the leading role of its party. "The village inevitably follows the city. The question is only to know which of the 'city classes' will be able to lead the village behind it." That is Lenin's formulation.

KURT LANDAU.

The British Daily Worker

The Communist Party now has its daily paper. It is a present given it by Moscow. It must be said that it was received without enthusiasm. At the Leeds Party Congress, T. A. Jackson, who is himself a capable journalist, declared: "The question is not to launch the paper—that's very easy—but to maintain it."

The first number contained a message from the Communist International, which has caused some stir, for the Conservative press immediately used it to sharpen its campaign against the re-establishment of diplomatic relations. It underlined the passage which said that the paper will be a "new and powerful organ in the hands of the working class in its struggle against capitalism, against rationalization and against the social-fascist Labor government."

That it is a "powerful weapon", only the leaders of the Communist International can believe. The Daily Worker is actually deplorable to the point where the bourgeois papers make fun of it and scoff at "Moscow's parsimony." The embarrassed Communists lay the blame to the press monopoly and the too high wages paid to the printing plant workers. One actually reads in the Communist Review: "It is a characteristic of this monopoly that the trade unions share in it. In the London daily press, there prevails the system of exceptionally high wages not only for the prostitutes of journalism but also—relative to the wages of other sections—for the typos, the pressmen, etc. In this way, the special interest of the unions is assured for cooperation with the capitalist trusts against the independent press and particularly against the workers' press." The leaders of the Party must be pretty ill at ease to resort to such arguments. Moreover, they have short memories: they forget that in 1926, on the eve of the outbreak of the general strike the linotype operators of the Daily Mail, in spite of the so-called exceptional wages, refused to set up a lying article directed against the workers, which still remains a pretty rare gesture.

The Clyde "rebels" have just suffered a serious defeat at the conference of the Scotch section of the Independent Labour Party, meeting in Glasgow on January 12, Maxton and his friends who voted against the government in an important debate—modification of the insurance law against unemployment—asked the approval of the conference. This approval was refused them by 103 votes against 94. If one considers that it is in Scotland that the Laborite Left has its strongest positions, the importance of this defeat will be understood.

Maxton's defense was very weak. He complained of having been cast off in the course of the discussion, by most of those who had signed his declaration: "I was thrown against the cannons," he exclaimed, "and when I looked about nobody was there any longer." That is the language of the "leader" of the I. L. P. He and his friends are full of excellent intentions; they have a faint desire to do something against the policy of abdication of the labor government, but they always halt before decisive deeds. That is why MacDonald always wins so easily over them.

The «Third Period» of the Comintern's Mistakes

The Art of Orientation

The art of revolutionary leadership is primarily the art of correct political orientation. Under all conditions, Communism prepares the political vanguard, and through it the working class as a whole, for the revolutionary seizure of power. But it does it differently in different fields of the labor movement and in different periods.

One of the most important elements in orientation is the determination of the moods of the masses, their activity and readiness for struggle. The mood of the masses however does not fall from the skies. It changes under the influence of certain laws of mass psychology, which are set into motion by objective social conditions. The political condition of the classes is subject, within certain limits, to a quantitative determination (press circulation, attendance at meetings, demonstrations, strikes, elections, etc., etc.) In order to understand the dynamics of the process, it is necessary to determine in what direction and under the influence of what reasons the mood of the working class changes. Combining the subjective data with the objective, it is possible to get to a certain degree the perspective of the movement, i. e., the scientifically based prediction without which a serious revolutionary struggle is in general inconceivable. But prediction in politics has the character, not of a rigid schema, but of a working hypothesis. Directing the struggle to one or the other direction, it is necessary attentively to follow the changes in the objective and subjective elements of the movement, in order to introduce opportunely into the tactics corresponding corrections. Even though the actual development of the struggle never fully corresponds with the prognosis, that does not absolve us from having recourse to political prediction. One must not however, get intoxicated with finished schemas but continually check up the course of the historic process and conform oneself with its indications.

Centrism, which now rules the Comintern, as an intermediary tendency living on the ideas of others, by its very nature is incapable of historical prognosis. In the Soviet Republic, Centrism attained its domination under the conditions of reaction against October, at the descent of the revolution, when empiricism and eclecticism constituted the warrant that permitted it to swim with the stream. And since it had previously been proclaimed that the course of development automatically leads towards socialism in one country, this in itself was enough to liberate Centrism from the need of a world orientation.

But the Communist Parties in the capitalist countries, which still have to struggle for power or to prepare for such a struggle, cannot live without prediction. A correct, every-day orientation is a question of life or death for them. But they do not learn this most important art because they are compelled to leap and skip interminably at the command of the Stalinist bureaucracy. Bureaucratic Centrism which is able to live for a time off the interest on the capital of already captured proletarian power, is entirely incapable of preparing the young Parties for the conquest of power. In this lies the principal and most formidable contradiction of the present Comintern.

The history of the Centrist leadership is the history of fatal mistakes in orientation. After the epigones missed the revolutionary situation in Germany in 1923 which profoundly changed the whole situation in Europe, the Comintern went through three stages of fatal mistakes.

The years 1924-25 were the period of ultra-Left mistakes: the leadership saw an immediate revolutionary situation ahead of them at a time when it was behind them. In that period they called us Marxist-Leninists "Rights" and "Liquidators"

The years 1925-27 were the period of open opportunism, which coincided with a stormy rise of the labor movement in England and the revolution in China. In this period they called us nothing else than "ultra-Leftists".

Finally, in 1928, the "Third Period" is proclaimed, which repeats the Zinoviev mistakes of 1924-25 on a higher historical plane. "The Third Period", has not yet come to a close: on the contrary it continues to rage, laying organizations and minds to waste.

All the three periods are characterized, not accidentally, by a systematic decline in the level of the leadership. In the first period: Zinoviev, Bucharin, Stalin. In the second period: Stalin, Bucharin. In the third period: Stalin and ... Molotov. There is a regularity to be seen in this.

Let us look closer at the leadership and theory of the "third period".

Molotov «Enters With Both Feet»

The Plenum of the E.C.C.I. which met a year after the Sixth Congress (July 1929) could not simply repeat what the Sixth Congress had already said but had to take a higher note. Already on the eve of the Plenum, the theoretical organ of the C. P. S. U. wrote:

"In the whole capitalist world the strike wave is rising. This wave is occurring in the highly developed imperialist countries as well as in the backward colonies at times and in places which interlink with elements of a stubborn revolutionary struggle and civil war. Into the struggle are drawn and actively participate the masses of the unorganized... The growth of dissatisfaction and the Leftward swing of the masses also embraces the millions of the agricultural workers and oppressed peasantry". (Bolshevik, June, 1929, No. 12, page 9).

The picture leaves no room for doubts. If the strike wave is actually traversing the whole world, drawing even "the millions of agricultural workers and oppressed peasantry", and interlinking with "revolutionary struggle and civil war", then it is clear: the revolutionary situation is at hand and the task of an outright struggle is on the order of the day. Whether to call such conditions the "third period" or to leave them unnumbered on this count we would agree not to quarrel.

The tuning fork at the Tenth Plenum appeared, as is known, in the hands of the maestro Molotov. In his programmatic speech before the leaders of the Comintern, Molotov said: "One must be a dull opportunist (!), one must be a sorry liberal (!), in view of the facts of the world labor movement, not to see that we have entered with both feet into the realm of most tremendous revolutionary events of international significance." (Pravda, No. 177). "With both feet"—what power of argumentation!

Harmonizing with Molotov's tuning fork, Bolshevik, the theoretical organ of the Russian Communist Party wrote in August 1929:

"On the basis of the analysis of the working class struggle in the principal capitalist countries, the Tenth Plenum established the development and deepening of the processes of the Leftward turn and revolutionization of the masses, which grows, already at the present time into a beginning of the revolutionary rise, (at least in such countries as Germany, France, Poland)". (No. 15, page 4).

There can be no doubt: if not with his head, then with his feet, Molotov has decisively established the revolutionary character of the period we are living through. Since nobody wants to be called a "dull opportunist" or a "sorry liberal", then Molotov's argumentation appears to be immediately insured against the criticism of the Plenum. Not burdening himself with economic nor political analysis, for reasons which it must be admitted are very valid, Molotov limited himself to a short catalog of the strikes in the different countries (Ruhr, Lodz, Northern France, Bombay, etc.) as the sole proof of the fact that "we have entered into the realm of most tremendous revolutionary events". This is how historic periods are created!

There only remained for the Central Committee and the papers of the national sections to see to it that their own feet, getting ahead if possible of their heads, should be immersed as quickly as possible into "most tremendous revolutionary events". But is it not a suspicious circumstance that the revolutionary situation appears simultaneously in the whole world, in the metropolises and the colonies, completely ignoring in this period "the law of uneven development", that is, that single historic law which, at least in name, is known to Stalin? In reality, there can be no talk of such simultaneousness. The analysis of world conditions is substituted for, as we have just seen, by the summing up of isolated conflicts occurring in different countries and for different conditions. Of the European countries, Austria alone, perhaps, has gone through a crisis in the past year which, with the presence of an influential Communist Party, might have assumed an immediately revolutionary development. But it is precisely Austria that is not even mentioned. What are mentioned are France, Germany and Poland as "those countries which —(according to Molotov)— find themselves at present in the front ranks of the revolutionary rise". In a series of articles we examined the strike wave in France, in order to determine its actual place in the development of the proletariat and the country. We hope to analyze in the same detail, in the nearest future, the basic indicators which characterize the struggle of the German working class. But the conclusions we arrived at with the French example, which is included by the Tenth Plenum among the least of the three most revolutionary countries of Europe, already show that Molotov's analysis is a combination of three elements: theoretical ignorance, political irresponsibility and bureaucratic adventurism. However it is not "the third period" that these elements characterize, but the Centrist bureaucracy —in all periods.

Are Economic Strikes Called Forth By Crises or Rises?

"Wherein lies the basis of this revolutionary rise?" Molotov makes the attempt to reflect, and right here presents the fruits of his deliberations: "At the basis of the rise can only lie the growth of the general crisis of capitalism and the sharpening of the basic contradictions of the capitalist system."

Whoever does not agree, is a "sorry liberal." But where is it written that at the basis of economic strikes "can only lie" a crisis? Instead of analyzing the actual economic conditions and finding on the basis of them a correct place for the present strike movement, Molotov proceeds in reverse order, enumerating a half a dozen strikes, comes to the conclusion about "the growth" of the capitalist crisis and—lands in the clouds.

The rise of the strike movement in a series of countries was caused, as we already know, by the improvement of economic conjuncture in the course of the past two years. This refers primarily to France. True, industrial revival which is far from general for the whole of Europe remained until now very retarded even in France and the tomorrow is far from secure at that. But in the life of the proletariat, even a small turn of conjuncture in one direction or the other does not take place without leaving its mark. If they continue daily to lay off workers in the factories, then those at work will not have the same spirit which is bred with them by the hiring of new workers, even though in limited numbers. The conjuncture has no less an influence on the ruling classes. In the period of an industrial revival which always breeds hopes for a still greater revival in the future, the capitalists are inclined to a softening of the international contradictions precisely in order to secure the development of a favorable conjuncture. And this is the "spirit of Locarno and Geneva".

In the not distant past, we had a great illustration of the correlation of conjunctural and basic factors.

The years of 1896-1913 were with few interruptions years of a powerful industrial rise. In 1913, this changed to depression, which for all informed, clearly opened the long and drawn out crisis. The threatening break of conjuncture, after the period of an unprecedented boom, created an extremely nervous mood in the ruling classes and served as a direct impetus to the war. Of course, the imperialist war grew out of basic contradictions of capitalism. This generalization is known even to Molotov. But on the road to war, there were a whole series of stages when the contradictions either sharpened or softened. The same applies also to the class struggle of the workers.

In the pre-war period, the basic as well as the conjunctural processes developed much more regularly than in the present period of brusks turns and steep breaks, when comparatively steep breaks, when the comparatively less important vacillations in economy breed tremendous leaps in politics. But from this it does not at all flow that it is possible to close one's eyes to the actual development and to repeat three incantations: "Contradictions sharpen", "the working masses are turning to the Left", "the war is imminent"—every day, every day, every day... If our strategic line is determined in the last analysis by the inevitability of the growth of contradictions and the revolutionary radicalization of the masses, then our tactics, which serve this strategy, proceed from the realistic evaluation of each period, each stage, each moment, which may be characterized by a temporary softening of contradictions, a Rightward turn of the masses, a change in the correlation of forces in favor of the bourgeois, etc. If the masses were to turn Leftward uninterruptedly, then any fool could lead them. Fortunately or unfortunately, matters are more complicated, particularly under the present inconstant, vacillating "capricious" conditions.

The so-called general line is a phrase, unless we correlate it with each alternating change in national and international conditions. How does the leadership of the Comintern act? Instead of evaluating conditions in all their concreteness, it smashes its head at every new stage and then satisfies the masses for its subsequent defeat with a change and even expulsion of those on guard duty in the Central Committees of the national sections. We firmly advise Cachin, Monmousseau, Thaelmann and all the Renmeles (and Foster!—Ed.) to prepare themselves in advance for the role of the victims for the theory and practice of the Third Period. This will happen when Stalin has to correct Molotov—naturally after the fact.

The Rise of the U. S. S. R. as a Factor in the «Third Period»

As the first reason for the "revolutionary rise" in the last two years, Molotov sees the economic crisis which, by the way, he discovered deductively. The second reason he sees in the economic successes of the U. S. S. R. and he even accuses the Plenum of the E. C. C. I. of not having sufficiently appreciated the revolutionizing effect of the Five Year Plan. That the economic successes of the Soviet Republic have a gigantic importance for the world labor movement does not require any proof. But from this it does not at all follow that the Five Year Plan is capable, in an a priori manner, of causing the revolutionary rise in Europe and the whole world. The broad working masses do not live by the prospective figures of the Five Year Plan. But even if we leave aside the Five Year Plan, and take the figures of factual successes of industrialization, we still cannot see in them the reason for the strike of the dock workers in France or the textile workers in India. Millions of workers are led in their actions by conditions which immediately surround them, not to speak of the fact that the greatest majority of the workers learn of the successes or failures of Soviet economy from the lying articles of the bourgeois and social democratic press. Finally, and this is more important than all the rest, what would immediately impress the broad circles of foreign workers is not the abstract figures of statistics but the actual and substantial improvement in the conditions of the workers in the U. S. S. R. It is clear that the conditions of severe food difficulties in Moscow and Leningrad cannot inspire tens of millions of workers in the capitalist world with revolutionary enthusiasm. It is a fact, unfortunately, that only about 100 workers came to hear the triumphant report of the last French delegation to return from the U. S. S. R. A hundred workers—for the whole of Paris! This is a menacing warning; but the noisy and boastful bureaucrats do not consider it necessary to reflect upon it.

The Slogan of the General Strike

Entering so heartily into the "most tremendous revolutionary events" Molotov five minutes later returns to the same strikes and unexpectedly declares, "However, these manifestations against capital and reformism that serves it, still bear an isolated and fragmentary character".

It would seem that isolated and fragmentary strikes occur in different countries for quite different reasons, but in general, arising as they do out of a conjunctural

For an International Conference of the Left

The Need For Organizing the World Opposition

There is need now to begin preparations to convene an International Conference of the forces of the Left Opposition. Many factors make such a conference both necessary and possible. It is not even a "forced march"; the world situation, the status and policy of the Communist International throughout the world. Economic and political struggles, arising out of the depressed and receding strength of international capitalism, are taking place on an increasing scale. In these the Opposition plays its part, but it must consider in what manner its role can be more decisive, both directly and through pressure by correct policy and tactics upon the Communist International and its sections in each country.

A steady and growing number of defeats have been inflicted on the proletariat and the Communist Parties in every country (alleviated only by incidental victories of a not very marked character here and there), in the past six years under the influence and direction of the Stalin-Bucharin regime. These range from the catastrophe in the Chinese Revolution (1925-1927); Anglo-Russian Committee debacle; the pro-Kulak policy, until recently in the Soviet Union; up to the May 1st, 1929 adventures in Germany and the washed-out August 1st international demonstrations against war—to mention a few of the outstanding events. For these defeats, Stalin and Stalinism, leaning strongly in these years upon the Right wing, bear the main responsibility. Trade union policy and activity, as embodied in the resolutions and theses and decisions of the Second and Third Congresses of the Communist International and the Red International of Labor Unions, when under the leadership of Lenin and Trotsky, have become a caricature coupled with either the abandonment or grotesque modification of tested united front tactics, have brought isolation of the militants from the mass unions, and sectarianism into practice on a world scale. There is need for a conference of the Leninist-Bolsheviks, of the Left wing, under the leadership of L. D. Trotsky, to examine thoroughly the situation before the world's working class and in the Comintern, and to elaborate a program of action that will more quickly defeat Stalinism and turn the Communist movement again on a correct path. That the bureaucrats are subject to proletarian pressure, even though yielding more comfortably and easily to the opportunists and revisionists of the Right wing, is a fact of experience. But the Left wing must turn the screws still tighter.

Opposition Problems Need Elaboration

A conference is needed to elaborate the position of the Left Opposition toward the Comintern, the U. S. S. R., and Stalinism. That there is wanted more clarity is evidenced by the differences that arose in some sections of the Opposition (German Leninbund, Belgium) on the Sino-Russian conflict; the attitude toward the recent capitulators to Stalinism (Radek, et al); Thermidorism; etc.

At the same time the Left Opposition has reached the point and possibility where it is necessary and able to establish an international political platform as a guide for the Oppositions in the various countries. Some of the Oppositions, among them the Leninbund (Germany), Bordiga group in Italy, Communist League (United States and Canada), China have drawn up platforms and given their estimate of the international situation and the tasks of the Communists. The basic conceptions of the Left Opposition on the theory of socialism in one country; the Chinese Revolution; role of the Party; party democracy, etc. are incorporated soundly in the Opposition forces. What is needed is to clarify as much as possible such differences as may and do exist; to draft the general platform for all the Opposition; to assist one another in the specific tasks of each country; to lay the basis for the unification and centralization of the organization and activities of the Left Opposition on an international scale.

In little more than a year of the past, the Platform of the Opposition in the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the activities of the Left Opposition in other countries have made a definite and good impression on the rank and file workers in the Communist Parties. This too, on an increasing scale among the proletarian forces in the C. P. S. U., among the Russian proletariat generally, and particularly among the party members and workers in the large factories in Leningrad, Moscow and other large cities. Opposition determination, the needs of the workers there, are more and more breaking through the Stalinist suppression and terror. The voice of the Leninist-Bolshevik is being heard and his message read. A major task of the International Opposition is to assist the Russian Leninist-Bolsheviks in their tasks with propaganda, material aid, etc.

Opposition Growing

The correctness of the views of the Left Opposition are accepted by larger numbers in the Communist Parties and the proletariat each day, by open declaration or silent acquiescence, or a waiting policy. The zig-zag Stalinist line fools less and less. Even now, the sudden dizzy "Left" zig-zag of the Stalinists in the Soviet Union and internationally, a course undertaken without conviction or understanding by the chinovniks, apparatus-men, shows signs of weakening and again gradually yielding (later a collapse?) to the Right wing opportunists (the removal of the so-called ultra-left, Fried, in Czecho-Slovakia, the speech of Manuilsky against the Left are the first straws). Only the active intervention of the genuine Left Opposition everywhere can serve to try to push the apparatus of the Stalinist Centrists and the Right wing onto a proletarian course. To do this more effectively, coordinated international activity and policy of the Opposition is required.

The Stalinist apparatus-men and the Right wing alike proclaim our "death" and have many times chanted our swan song. They may bow to ikons if they want to. The Opposition has its life in historic need and revolutionary activity. The more that Stalin and Bucharin maintain their revisionism of Marx and Lenin by the theory of socialism in one country as against an international revolutionary movement, the broader grows the international ring of the Left Opposition, encircling and isolating this social-democratic theory and Stalin in the narrow confines of national reformism. Stalin, through terror and suppression, makes his way yet in the Soviet Union. But the growing International Left, the increase of its press in the past year, the formation of new Left Opposition movements throughout the world indicate its growing strength and influence.

There is need to cite only the organization and development of the Left Opposition in the United States and Canada, Argentine, Mexico, China and other countries, not to mention the older European Oppositions. The capitulators find little comfort in the increasing proletarian cohorts of the Opposition. These found their way to the Opposition through understanding, and the pressure of the Stalinist chinovniks will not avail against them. It is this very growth of the Oppositions, with their own special problems, the need to define the particular roles of each Opposition (the United States and Belgium as contrasted, for instance, with Germany and France); the problem of the illegality of the Opposition (C. P. S. U.); the acute difficulties of work of the Opposition in China (illegality under Chiang Kai-Shek together with Stalinist suppression) that make advisable an international conference to work out our problems. The extreme conditions under which the Opposition operate make sectarian practice and an incorrect attitude toward the Comintern and the Communist Parties an easy swamp into which to fall. A conference which will discuss how we can increase our influence and activity among the masses and energize our movement in the Communist Parties will help greatly.

The open discussion of such issues as have arisen in the Left Opposition in some countries have helped to clarify our tasks. There is no need to wall about that. However sharp these discussions have been, they will aid the development of unity on a commonly accepted platform. An International Conference should make it possible for ALL groups and tendencies in the Left Opposition to be present and fully heard as an aid toward unity. Secondary issues, which tend to obscure main lines, can then be brushed aside.

An International Opposition Organ

An exchange of views in the press of the Opposition is required. At the same time, we must discuss ways and means to transform into reality an International Opposition organ, published in three languages at least, if at all possible, and to develop plans for a wide circulation. Such an organ will go a long way toward the theoretical education of the Left Opposition and the Communists generally.

At this conference should be elected an Executive Committee of the International Opposition to centralize the work of the Opposition. If possible representatives of a few of the European countries and also one from America and China should remain rise in the world market, are not yet in any way—precisely because they are isolated and fragmentary—"tremendous revolutionary events". But Molotov wants to combine the isolated strikes. A praiseworthy task. But in the meantime, only a task, and not an accomplished step. To unite isolated strikes—Molotov teaches—is possible by means of mass political strikes. Yes, having at hand the necessary conditions, the working class may be united by revolutionary mass strikes. The problem of the mass strike is then, according to Molotov, "that new, that basic and most characteristic problem which stands in the center of the tactical tasks of the Communist Parties at the given moment". "And this means"—continues our strategist—"that we have approached (this time only "approached"—L. T.) new and higher forms of class struggle". And in order definitely to affirm the Tenth Plenum religion of the Third Period, Molotov adds: "We could not have advanced the slogan of a mass political strike, if we had not found ourselves in a period of ascent." This trend of thought is truly unexampled! At first both strategic feet entered the most tremendous revolutionary events, later on it appeared that before the theoretical head stands only the task of the general strike—not the general strike itself, but only its slogan. And from here alone, by the inverse method, the conclusion is made that we "have approached the highest forms of class struggles". Because, don't you see, had we not approached them, then how could Molotov advance the slogan of the general strike? The whole construction is based on the word of honor of the newly made strategist. And the powerful representatives of the parties respectfully listened to the self-confident blockhead and upon roll call reply: "Right you are!"

At any rate, we find out that all countries, from Great Britain to China—with France, Germany and Poland at the head have now attained the slogan of the general strike. We are finally convinced that not a trace is left of the unhappy law of uneven development. We might manage to be reconciled to this, if they would only tell us in the name of what political aims the slogan of the general strike is advanced in every country. It should at least not be forgotten that the workers are by no means inclined towards general strikes just for the sake of general strikes. Anarcho-syndicalism broke its head on the failure to understand this. The general strike may sometime have the character of a protest demonstration. Such a strike is realizable, generally speaking, in cases when some clear, sometimes unexpected, event stirs the imagination of the masses and produces the necessity for unanimous resistance. But a strike demonstration is not yet, in the true sense, a revolutionary political strike, it is only one of the preparatory rehearsals for it. As far as the revolutionary political strike is concerned, in the real sense of the word, it constitutes, so to speak, the final act in the struggle of the proletariat for power. Paralyzing the normal functions of the capitalist state, the general strike, brings forward the question: Who is master in the house? This question is decided in no other way than by armed force. That is why a revolutionary strike which

The International Opposition Conference has to lay out a campaign for an even more thorough expose among the Communist Parties and the mass of workers of Stalin and Stalinism, their methods of suppression and terror against the Leninist-Bolsheviks in the Soviet Union; the blow against the Russian Revolution in the deportation of the outstanding living leader of Bolshevism, Leon Trotsky; and to broaden the activities for the reinstatement of the Left Opposition throughout the world into the ranks of the Communist International and the return of Trotsky and the Opposition to their rightful position and role in the U. S. S. R.

The European comrades, particularly in France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Holland and Austria should take the initiative to form a Committee of Action to lay the basis for such an International Conference. When agreement has been reached as to time, place and character of the Conference, the needed steps to bring the delegations from the various countries together can then be taken.

does not lead to an armed uprising ends finally with the defeat of the proletariat. If, therefore, Molotov's words regarding revolutionary political strikes and "highest forms of struggle" have any sense at all, it is this: simultaneously, or almost simultaneously, throughout the world, the revolutionary situation has reached such maturity that it puts the Communist Parties of the West and East, North and South before the general strike as the immediate prologue to armed uprising.

It is sufficient to formulate correctly Molotov's strategy of the "Third Period" for its absurdity to be revealed.

«The Conquest of the Street»

Along with the general strike is set the task of "the conquest of the street". The question here—at any rate in words—is not that of the defense of one of the "democratic" rights, trampled upon by the bourgeoisie and social democracy, but of the determination of the "right" of the proletariat—to barricades. That is precisely how "the conquest of the streets" has been interpreted in the numerous articles of the official Communist press immediately after the July Plenum. It is not for us to deny the right of the proletariat to the "conquest of the streets" by means of barricades. But it is necessary to clearly understand what this means. Before all one must make clear to himself that the proletariat does not go on the barricades for the sake of the barricades, just as he does not participate in strikes for the sake of strikes. There are required immediate political purposes, welding together millions and giving firm support to the vanguard. That is how revolutionists pose the question. The opportunists gone mad approach the question quite differently.

For the revolutionary "conquest of the street"—art for art's sake—they set aside special days. The last invention of this sort appeared, as is known, the First of August. Ordinary mortals wondered: why the First of August, the failure of which was pre-determined by the failure of the First of May? What do you mean, why?—the officials strategists answered excitedly: for the conquest of the streets! Precisely what is to be understood by that: the conquest of the sidewalk or the pavement! Heretofore we thought, that the task of the revolutionary party is the conquest of the masses, and that the policy which can mobilize the masses to the greatest number and most actively inevitably opens up the street, no matter how the police block and lock it. The struggle for the street cannot be an independent task separated from the political struggle of the masses and subordinated to the office schedule of Molotov.

And what is more important, you cannot fool history. The task is not to appear stronger, but to get stronger. A noisy masquerade will not help. When there is no "Third Period" it is possible to invent it. It is possible to manufacture dozens of resolutions. But to make the Third Period on the streets according to the calendar—is impossible. On this road the Communist Parties will find only defeat, in some cases tragic ones, but more often simply stupid and humiliating ones.

Low Wages for Unorganized Miners in W. Va.

COOPERSBURG, Pa.—So far as the mining situation in West Virginia is concerned, there is little to be said but that the United Mine Workers is smashed. The new union, however, has never got its roots into W. Va. soil.

Wages are being slashed with a knife that cuts two ways. First, they cut wages with reductions, and then they cut wages by refusing to pay for dead work. Not only that, but the men have to take the place of mules. Coal is mined in Moundsville at 51 cents per ton. The stone that comes down with the blasting of coal is not paid for. Other impurities have to be thrown out without compensation. All track timbering and the like have to be done for nothing. The cars are delivered to the mouth of the place and from there the miner has to push the car to the face, whereas under union conditions, cars were delivered and taken from place of work.

Men have to walk in a crouching position for 45 minutes or more. Under union conditions, the miners had a man trip to take them to and from work.

A good two weeks' work will average a man $3.00 a day. Out of this comes smithing, lamp, doctor, and powder. The miner is lucky if he makes $2.00 net.

In Moundsville, they have a system of turning over one's earnings to the company store. After the store deducts whatever bills the workers runs up he gets the rest of the pay, if there is anything "coming" to him.

An acquaintance would always be "in the hole" when pay would come around. One pay he owed $3.64, another pay, $2.37, two weeks later, $.99 and he thought he was lucky to owe only 99 cents.

The morale of the miners is at its lowest ebb. They have little respect for the old U. M. W. A., due to its control by the bureaucrats. Of course, one argues that militant organization of the miners into a solid body that would strike terror into the operators is the solution, but they tell you that that's only talk. They will have to be shown. That's how sceptical the miners are now. There is a big job ahead for the Left wing.

ANTHRACITE TAKES HEAVY TOLL IN ACCIDENTS

WILKES BARRE, Pa.—(FP)—One day's toll in one section of the anthracite is revealed by these mine casualties:

Thomas Walsh, 44, Hughestown, died in an ambulance from injuries sustained when he was caught in a rock fall from the roof of his working place in the Pittston Coal Co.'s mine.

Frank Shumak, 23, Plymouth, was critically injured following a gas explosion in the Dorrance mine of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. He is in the Wilkes Barre general hospital suffering from burns on the face, neck, chest and arms. A fellow-worker was seriously injured in the same blast.

Peter Kocor, 47, Alden, was burned about the face, neck, and hands when caught in a gas explosion in the Alden Coal Co.'s mine.

Henry Dustrecrem, 47, Wilkes-Barre, suffered serious injuries to his hand while at work in the Glen Alden Coal Co. Mine 7.

MOUNDSVILLE, W. Va.—Wage cuts have brought out 300 miners of the Franklin and Alexander mines, controlled by the Paisley interests of Cleveland. Wages were cut from 51 cents to 45 cents an hour for shovel loaders and 44 cents to 40 cents for machine loaders.

The Strike of the Toronto Cloakmakers

TORONTO, Canada.—The long-awaited cloakmakers' strike began last week. The wonderful turnout and the fighting spirit of the strikers can hardly be attributed to the organizational efforts of the local I. L. G. W. U. job holders.

The industry has degenerated to such a point that the majority of the workers find it increasingly impossible to make a living. Long hours, speed-up, low wages, unsanitary conditions and short seasons have become the order of the day. In desperation to save their economic existence, the workers are again willing to follow the same leadership that betrayed them so shamelessly in 1924. Even the so-called union-proof elements responded to the call of the general strike, showing how rampant and widespread is the dissatisfaction of the masses.

Right Wing Leaders Sabotage

But in spite of the wonderful response and solidarity of the workers the leaders of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union refuse to fight. The slogans under which they called the strike, firstly, the 44-hour week but not the abolition of piece work is meaningless. Also the slogan of $1.00 an hour as a fair union wage without specifying the big shops or the small. In the big shops, with the longer season and cheaper work, $1.00 per hour represents an increase. In the small shops however, with the considerably shorter season and better line of work, $1.00 per hour might mean an actual reduction.

In speaking to the workers and in the press reports, the bureaucrats apologize for having called the strike. "The whole fault lies with the bosses who don't want to be fair". But, they go on to assure the workers, "the strike will be over in a few days, since we can't bear to see your families suffer".

Is the strike a fake, as the Stalinists claim? It is not difficult to see that the International does not want to fight and will not fight. They promise the bosses to close the doors to any possible organization of the industry by the Left wing in exchange for Right wing recognition in the shops. That they won't make any real demands, except possibly a few scraps to shut the mouths of the workers and make it look like a real "contract", is true. But the Left wing union is unable to play any decisive role in the strike because of its negative membership and isolation. As a matter of fact, nobody knows that they are playing any role at all. The leaflets distributed by the N. T. W. I. U. previous to the strike denouncing it as a "fake stoppage" and exposing the Right wing, only had a tendency on the whole to make the workers apathetic. Certainly, it brought no new members into the Left wing union. It never occurred to the Left wing leaders to enter into the struggle and by the course of it win the workers away from the Right wing.

Pittsburg Cab Drivers on Strike

PITTSBURG, Pa.—In this city, which is considered one of the most industrial cities in the United States, the working conditions are no better than in other cities. The workers are harassed by an unbearable hunger, despair and starvation.

It is 18 days since the taxi drivers went out on strike. The Yellow, Green and Checker companies are using every means at their disposal to break it. Strike-breakers, company thugs, ministers, judges, police and society women—all of them are in their service. Mr. Walter S. Laird, the president of the Yellow company, utilized all the usual means in order to paralyze the courage of the strikers. He brought the professional strikebreaker from Chicago Charles Burger, who is also an organizer for the A. F. of L. He was one who in the strike of the milk drivers last summer used all his tricks to surrender them to the mercy of the Liberty Company.

Now, again, as representative of the A. F. of L., in a speech delivered to a meeting of the strikers, although he was violently hissed by the audience, he dared to tell them that he would take their union charter away if they do not want to compromise with the companies. That is how he tried to terrorize the strikers and show the bosses that he is faithfully performing his duties as a betrayer of the working class. But the strikers to a man and with splendid courage, not only confront these disgraceful and base tricks of Mr. Walter Laird, but also jails and beatings by the police, injunctions and whatever other means the miserable capitalist system is able to put at the disposal of the companies. The strikers are determined to continue the struggle until they win their demands.

Minneapolis Stalinists Disrupt the Ladies Auxiliary

Minneapolis, Minn.

Dear Comrades:

It is necessary to acquaint the left wing with the recent events in the Minneapolis Ladies Auxiliary of the Independent Workmen's Circle which the Stalinists have "captured". The Auxiliary consists of various classes of women, mostly of left wing opinions—and has always done constructive work in the labor movement generally. With this program the organization has very seldom been a scene of factional squabbles.

Now however, like a dream, all this has vanished. The Stalinist plague has descended upon us and, as in other workers' organizations, our Auxiliary has not escaped. Here is a sample of their work:

First they began to poison the minds of the members against the class conscious women who would not permit themselves to be misled. Stalin's famous bugle call, "counter-revolutionary" and "renegade" began to be circulated first secretly, then openly in our meetings.

They come with finished decisions made in closed rooms. There is no discussion permitted. Even the chairman is made to order. The Ladies Auxiliary has never yet suffered such dictatorship and such brazen arrogance. The more class conscious women gradually began to react with feelings of injustice, and finally we began to take action on these questions. The healthy criticism of honest working women in regard to the Stalinist tactics began to be heard more and more. But in spite of this the activity of the Auxiliary began to weaken. The old spirit died.

In election periods the Stalinists began to show their wonderful tactics in labor organizations. You see, it was necessary to save the Stalinist officers. There was no lack of automobiles to bring dead timber to the meeting for this purpose.

And the Stalinists were victorious.

What a victory! Loyal proletarian women, some of them founders of the organization were craftily eliminated, while petit-bourgeois women were boosted into office. Whose hands are these raised against class conscious workers? No understanding is necessary. The really vital questions in the life of our movement are thrust aside. After all, why discuss them, they may be "counter-revolutionary." Ideology? What is that—a women's disease, perhaps?

A hand for Stalin, and all your past sins against the working class are forgiven. The capitalist class has long ago realized that workers hands and not their minds should be used. The Party leadership is dragging our organization downhill to destruction.

Working women! Don't permit your thoughts to be trampled upon. Historical facts bring us closer to the reality of the new life in the class struggle. Down with the bureaucrats! Down with the disrupters and splitters of the working class! Carry forward the ideas of Lenin. Stand by the working class. Tomorrow it will be with us.

MINNEAPOLIS WORKERS SCHOOL

The Workers School of Minneapolis wishes to announce the completion of the first half of its courses as planned last Fall. An "examination" in the elements of Communism demonstrated a definite improvement in ideology and a grasp of practical problems of the movement from a Marxian viewpoint. Continued progress will warrant the extension of these courses and possibly the establishment of new ones on an even broader scale. The classes are held every Tuesday evening, 8 p. m., at 401 Washington Ave. South. There is no charge and all workers are urged to enroll for the second half of the season.

The Socialist Party and the Radicalization of the Masses

In reality there is nothing strange or inexplicable in the present developments. Reformism is a blind alley which diverts the workers from a class advancement and even from any real struggle for their immediate needs. But how are the American workers, not yet through the primer school of class education to know that? The majority of the workers of Germany, trained for generations in the class struggle, many of whom have seen revolutionary battles, do not know it yet. If they will learn from day to day, on the basis of their own experience, as Lenin said, how will the American workers learn it overnight?

American Labor and Reformism

It must be remembered that the American workers have never seen Social Democratic betrayal on a big scale for the simple reason that these agents of capitalism have not yet had such an opportunity. The American Socialists have never held any power except in such isolated and relatively unimportant sectors as the needle trades. The American worker, bound all his life to capitalist ideology, is apt to consider a vote for the Socialist Party a radical step forward. He is not fated to stop there. He is not a "fascist" when he takes that step, but a deceived worker who wants to improve the position of his class. Such a worker is, and should be regarded as a potential Communist.

The Communist struggle for the support of the masses in American has many different aspects from than the same struggle in the capitalistically developed countries in Europe. There, the great majority of the workers are already politically organized in the Socialist and Communist camps and the recruiting of workers to the banner of Communism requires the breaking down of long-established traditions and habits and organization bonds. The struggle here, in the main, is to win workers away from direct allegiance to the capitalist parties. In this the Socialist and Communist Parties are and will be rivals. Despite the primary stage of the class struggle in American and the consequent lack of class consciousness of the workers, the prospects of the revolutionary party, even for the proximate future, are good. There is plenty of ground for the assumption that developments in America, on the basis of its inextricable involvement in world economy once fairly started will be swift. In such a setting Communism, given a correct policy can bound forward and become the banner of the workers' struggles as well as of their aspirations for freedom from the capitalist yoke.

This presupposes a correct approach to the workers—the politically unorganized as well as the victims of reformist deception. The Communist International in the fundamental documents of its first four Congresses, has given a clear guide in this task. It is necessary to restore our movement to this basis and cast overboard all revisions and "improvements" which have been smuggled into the International since Lenin's death. Among other things this means to revive the united front tactics and apply them in place of the counterfeited dogma of "social fascism". It means to strengthen and support the Opposition which fights for Communist fundamentals on an International scale.

The sooner and the more aggressively the Communist workers turn to these basic tasks, the sooner will the present advance of reformism be transformed into a temporary incident and the better will the awakening workers be prepared for future victories.

QUAKER CITY KNITTERS REVOLT ON WAGE CUTS

PHILADELPHIA—Revolt is spreading through the Quaker City's scab hosiery mills on the heels of wage cuts. Three hundred workers, nearly the entire force of the Rodgers mill, have walked out to join the ranks of the 1,400 Aberle strikers. Discharge of union workers caused the Rodgers strike.

Discontent is running high in other non-union mills and further strikes are expected. Smaller plants have caught the contagion and knitters in scab shops out of town are also ready to "pull the rods".

The Rodgers plant not only paid under the scale but worked shifts of 10 and 12 hours. The strikers want the straight union scale and two shifts of eight hours.

THE PARTY "ANSWERS" ON BLUMKIN

But It Fails to Make a Straightforward Reply to the Questions We Have Raised

The Daily Worker has finally been compelled to "answer" our pointed questions on the assassination of comrade Blumkin. But how contemptibly, how like miserable philistines who bask in the shadow of the distant power that pays so well for literary funkeys, how like the irresponsible bureaucrats who disdain to give an accounting of themselves and their actions.

We asked Foster, Browder, Bedacht, Minor and Co.: Has Blumkin been assassinated and why was this hideous deed committed. They have not answered.

We asked these loyal servitors of the Stalin domain: Do you take upon yourselves joint responsibility with your employer for this unheard of crime? They have not had the courage to do this either.

On the contrary, in the official editorial published in the Daily Worker on February 15, 1930, the whole issue is cravenly avoided. If Blumkin has not been murdered, a simple official denial would suffice and our retraction would follow. If Blumkin has been shot secretly by the G. P. U. on the personal orders of Stalin, then he "must have been" a dangerous enemy of the revolution. In that case, his death should not only be confirmed by the party press, but the action should be openly defended and the reasons for it made clear to the class conscious workers.

But the handmaidens of the Stalinist bureaucracy dare not take either course: They cannot make a denial because they know Blumkin has been killed. They dare not defend it publicly and boldly, because every honest worker will recoil from them in horror.

We continue to demand of them to explain, not by gratuitous slander and cowardly subterfuge, but in simple straightforward language:

In 1918, when the revolution was surrounded by the wolves of imperialism and torn by bourgeois reaction at home, comrade Blumkin was one of the leaders of the armed anti-Soviet insurrection organized by the Left Social Revolutionaries. He was arrested, tried, and released. He joined the Bolshevik party, became one of the most devoted militants, was a hero in the civil war, and carried on work of the most responsible and rigorous nature for the party and the government up until the time of his death. He was a supporter of the Opposition from the first and never con-

Naval Conference at a Standstill

The fall of the Tardieu government in France, which will delay the "progress" of the London naval conference for at least a week will only result in the postponement of what has now become as plain as day: Despite all the protestations of the imperialist statesmen, the London Farce has not and will not accomplish anything at all in the direction of "insuring peace" by the deceptive route of so-called naval reductions or agreements. The only favorable point on the balance sheet of the conference is the further discrediting of all pacifist nonsense and the naive belief that capitalism can disarm or take any other step towards peace.

N. Y. Times Is Cynical

The hypocritical character of the whole affair has become so obvious that not even capitalist observers are doing much drum-beating for it. The well-informed correspondent of the New York Times, Edwin L. James, cables his paper from the conference (2-16-30): "Its (the conference's) highest hopes were three: First, reduction second, abolition of submarines and third, elimination of battleships. They all have been disposed of. As the conference approaches its second month, it has been settled that battleships are not going to be done away with. It is settled that submarines will still submerge when the meeting is over, and reduction has got so far into the limbo that the statesmen have now realized that the chief results of the London conference will be some of the finest naval construction programs the world has yet seen."

The cynical comment of a capitalist reporter is indicative of how much stock the imperialist spokesmen themselves put in all their pious assurances and claims. This refers as much to Tardieu as to Mussolini, and as much to Ramsay MacDonald as to Herbert Hoover. The conference performance of the alleged "labor" premier of England, the prince of pacifism, the darling of the liberal Nation and the less liberal New Leader, is far more disgraceful than that of any of his co-confererees. The others at least make no particular pretence to speak in the name of labor and a new social order. They know what they want, and they go after it without more than a fromal sprinkling of piety. But MacDonald, who is a "spokesman" for labor and a new day, is working with no less zeal for the maintenance of the glorious old Empire, for the retention of its present and future markets, for its domination and violent suppression of hundreds of millions of colonial slaves, than his predecessors of the Tory and Liberal stripe. This austere statesman of "the new order" is anxious to show king and country that the labor party can protect the blood-sated empire as energetically as Baldwin or Lloyd George.

Thomas Apologizes for MacDonald

His American colleague, Norman Thomas, writes apologetically in the New Leader (2-15-30) that "in the handling of this naval conference Ramsay MacDonald can say with truth that he is doing the best he can as the head of a minority government and in face of the traditional British love of the navy." If Mr. Thomas means that MacDonald is doing the best he can to safeguard the piratical interests of British imperialism, he is absolutely right; in fact, he is understating the case. MacDonald and his party are the best props that the declining empire possesses.

Unite Forces on March 6th Demonstrations!

The army of American unemployed workers has risen until it runs into millions of men marching the street in a vain search for a job. The most acute suffering has been felt by the workers in every part of the country. Hundreds of thousands who, during the years of "prosperity", had been lulled into a false feeling of security, are now experiencing the bitterest difficulties. Even among the better-paid workers, the savings put away are being rapidly consumed, the homes purchased with mortgages are being put on the block. The prospect for any immediate improvement in industry that would absorb any substantial amount of the unemployed is extremely dim.

U. S. Capitalism Offers No Relief

The millions of unemployed are monumental testimony to the anarchy of the capitalist system. In the United States, where the greatest riches of the world are contained, where industry and agriculture have been developed to a high point, where efficiency schemes have become the rule—the most elementary requirements of human existence cannot be satisfied by capitalism. In the United States, where the records show the greatest number of multi-millionaires, where the payments of dividends and other profits mount into fabulous sums—there is "not enough" to keep five or more million workers and their families at the lowest subsistence levels.

The workers have worked too hard. They have strained their muscles and brain to the last degree. They have produced more than can be absorbed. Then they are thrown out on the streets. The workers starve because there is too much food. They freeze because too much clothing has been produced. They have no work because they have worked too hard.

The capitalist class fears the unemployed mass. It knows that the worker thrown out of a job begins to think, and that ideas become powerful when they penetrate millions. The bosses therefore try to prevent the workers from thinking and acting by dishing out a cup of coffee, and a crummy doughnut, and an occasional flop to the unemployed most severely hit. All the contemptible societies of charity work overtime to give the unemployed five cents worth of grubby "food" to keep them from five minutes of thought.

The workers want no charity, which degrades and shames them and puts them at the mercy of upper-class sob-sisters and sky pilots. The workers want work or maintenance by the state and industry which have used them as long as they were profitable and then thrown them on the heap. The workers have a right to the job, and to the machines and industries and products for which they alone are responsible. But what the unemployed need immediately to relieve their intensely difficult conditions, is work, work at union wages, work without the speed-up system, work without overtime. If the capitalist system cannot provide work, then it must be made to provide maintenance for the unemployed and their families.

To obtain this, the unemployed must fight. The working class never won anything by begging, crawling on its knees, or waiting passively. That holds true today more than ever. United action by the millions of workless, combined with the support of the workers who have jobs, will compel the capitalist class and its government to act. The latter cannot abolish unemployment, which is a natural outcome of the system but it can be made to relieve some of the suffering if the workers will act militantly and in unison.

Councils of Unemployed

Every city must form its unemployment council, consisting of representatives of the jobless and of every possible labor organization, unions, etc., that is ready to fight in the common battle. A well laid organizational foundation for the movement will insure its strength. The workers must demonstrate their power and make their demands in masses in every city. Isolated disconnected demonstrations, or those organized on ten minutes notice without preparations, or those organized on a narrow basis which makes it impossible to reach the masses, are worse than worthless because they dissipate energy and discredit the movement.

The Communist International has set the date of March 6th for an international day for demonstrations against unemployment. There is much to criticize in the manner in which these demonstrations are being planned and organized by the Stalinists. The date has been set arbitrarily, at brief notice, without preliminary preparations that would insure its effectiveness. It has not taken into consideration the differing pace of development in the various countries. It has not taken into consideration the varying character of the labor movement in the different countries. The American unemployed worker is in a different economic position than the unemployed worker in England or Germany. In the United States, the development of the CHICAGO—Though Pres. Hoover and the other loudspeakers have been shouting prosperity and industrial recovery the past two months, Illinois statistics are just as dead against these false federal claims as are those of New York state. The official Labor Bulletin says:

Illinois Jobs Declined

"The decrease in industrial activity which has been apparent throughout all sections of the state since last September was rendered still more pronounced by a 2.6% decline in employment in December. The manufacturing industries during the last three months have reduced their forces 6.1%, thereby losing all the advances made earlier in the year and bringing the index of employment down to 99.3, or about the same as the figure for December, 1928.

"The payroll totals for factory work declined 4.9% from November to December and for the first time during the year the payroll index went below that for the corresponding month of 1928."

The state department of labor reports the average wage for male factory workers as $20.66 a week and for females $17.30 a week. Not counting Chicago, the average was $27.10 a week for males and $13.23 a week for females.

BUILDING TRADES HIT IN D. C.

WASHINGTON—Harry Wardma, biggest building trades employer in the District of Columbia, announces that he is now paying only $3,000 a week on construction payroll, as compared with $20,000 a week one year ago. He says he will build no more apartments for a year, and that other contractors are in like situation.

Local building trades union officers agree that unemployment has been severe for the past four months

The Anti-Soviet Crusaders

The whole world of pious opium peddlers is agog with indignation over the latest decree on religious associations issued by the Soviet government. His Most Devout and Respected Holiness, Pope Pius XI, who holds communion with the son of god himself, has declared that "the horrible iniquities which have been committed grow worse every day". His Inspired Excellency, the Archbishop of Canterbury, seconded by his brother in Christ, the Archbishop of York, has bewailed the fact that "no one can question the truth of the long and shocking tale of imprisonment, exile and deliberate putting to death of prelates and parish priests, of monks and nuns and of the humblest folk". His Terrifying Eminence, Bishop William T. Manning, has urged that "the ministers of all faiths all over our land will speak in support of the protests which have been made and in condemnation of these wicked, cruel and inhuman deeds".

The Crime of the Soviets

What is this unspeakable, this new crime of which the Soviet Republic is guilty? The priests and parsons and rabbis of world capitalism are outraged at the "autocratic and brutal delimitation of religious liberties", this "trodding under foot of all moral values". What they are really concerned about is the fact that the Soviets are drastically cutting into the heritage of special privileges enjoyed by the religious parasites in Russia, privileges exercised at the price of the physical and mental welfare of 150,000,000 people that the Soviets are making it more and more difficult for the forces of capitalist restoration to utilize the churches and the priesthood for a basis against the Workers' Republic. So far as freedom of religious belief is concerned, there is no prohibition of that in the Soviet Republic, something which few if any other countries can maintain. Groups of one faith are permitted to associate together, under strict political limitations which are calculated to prevent them from becoming instruments of reaction. What is prohibited is the ownership of special church property except that required for the exercise of their religious rites and worship; the transformation of religious institutions into financial or industrial establishments which would give the priesthood an economic stranglehold on its flocks; the enrollment of anyone under the age of 18, which would permit the "men of god" to poison the minds of the youth with superstitious and religious venom; functioning without registration at the local Soviet organ; etc., etc.

That atheist and materialist societies and groups conduct, in the meantime, an energetic campaign among the population any duty as well. Those who go among the people and help dispel the fog of darkness, reaction, ignorance and bigotry on which the various religious sects are founded are giving a mighty shove to the wheel of progress. That the Soviets not only tolerate, but encourage these materialist activities, is to their everlasting credit. What the priesthood fears more than anything else is an open discussion of religion and the church vs. materialism, for it knows that in such a contest the proletariat, armed with all modern science, must necessarily issue forth the victor. The fact that the Soviets and the Communist Party are the patrons of this campaign of enlightenment and progress raises them to a greater height than that attained by any progressive or revolutionary regime or party that history has known.

But let us assume for a moment—something which is far from the truth—that some of the black-robed leeches of religion have been damaged a little in the Soviet campaign to break the hold of superstition on the masses. Who are the ones that have a right or reason to condemn the Bolsheviks? Are they the prelates of the Catholic Church, the institution that is built on the human skulls of millions, the masters of the Spanish Inquisition, the heroes of St. Bartholomew's eve massacre in France, the Church of corruption and speculation for centuries, the master prop of reaction at all times? Are they the shepherds of the innumerable protestant churches, the traducers of colonial peoples in the interest of imperialist piracy, the gentry that argued for the sacred foundations of Negro slavery in the United States, the pastors whose ancestors burned "witches" at the stake? Are they the representatives of Greek Catholicism, the right arm of czarism, the oppressor of Russia's "dark millions" for centuries, the haven of shamelessness and ignorance, of the "holy" Rasputin? Are they the priests of Jewry, the staunchest defenders of tolerance when they are the underdog and the most ruthless emissaries of a bloodthirsty Jehovah when they hold the whiphand?

Where were all these cardinals, bishops, rabbis, metropolitans, pastors, preachers, priests and beadles with a condemnation of the "wicked, cruel and inhuman deeds" of imperialism in cutting down a whole generation in its prime on the battlefields of France and Belgium? They were behind the lines, inciting their countrymen to slaughter each other in the name of Christ and Jahweh. Where were they all when czarism sucked the bloods of Russia's millions, when workers were massacred on the streets and their leaders sent to a living death in Siberia? They were sanctifying the "little father". Where were they when the wolves of reaction encircled young Red Russia and sought to rend it to bits? They were eulogizing the "princes of peace": Wilson, Lloyd George, Clemenceau. Where are they in every bitter struggle of the workers, in every strike, in every critical situation where the masses seek to liberate themselves from the murderous yoke of capitalism? They are on the side of the bosses, the capitalists, trying their best to disarm and weaken the militant proletariat by directing its eyes to a non-existent paradise that awaits them...when they are dead.

Let Bishop Manning, and the Archbishop of York, and the Pope of Rome, and Rabbi Glazer, and the rest of the gentlemen of god, turn their attention to the millions of unemployed who are on the verge of starvation, to the horrors of capitalist marauding, and all the other monstrosities of the present social system. They will not and cannot do it because they are an inseparable part of the system of rapine and class rule. Their task is not to help the workers free themselves, but to tie tighter the chains of wage slavery. That is why the Soviet Republic, which has struck the chains of slavery from the body of the Russian workingclass, will be considered by religion the principal blasphemy of the century, the unforgivable sin besides which adultery, patricide, hatred of one's neighbor, and any other violation of the commandments are easily and lightly condoned.

Unemployed Must Demand Work or Wages

movement will necessarily be at a slower pace—unless it is to become a sectarian adventure. Up to now, no serious effort has been made to develop a united front movement. No effort has been made to mobilize the support of the organized and employed workers, who have a most direct interest in the position of the unemployed, in preventing them from becoming strike-breaking instruments, etc. In the U. S. particularly, the official Communist party has narrowed down the "preliminary demonstrations" to a handful of party members and a few jobless workers. Such a course dooms the movement to defeat in advance.

The movement must be organized and developed on the broadest basis that will make it capable of setting large masses in motion against the capitalist system and its institutions. Up to now, the "demonstrations" of the party have been bombastically heralded, held for a couple of hours and forgotten the next day. No serious movement has been created. Unless the helm is turned, there will be a repetition of this futility in the movement of the unemployed.

All Out on March 6th

Every worker, employed or unemployed, should join the demonstrations on March 6. An impressive display of working class determination must be presented everywhere on that day. The demands for "Work or Maintenance" must be put in the forefront. The banner of struggle against the infamous speed-up system must be raised. The demands of the unemployed must be few, direct, simple and capable of drawing the workers to the movement. The party, as usual, has drowned the important issues in a mass of subsidiary ones and issued a list of demands long enough to satisfy Moscow and cool the interest of the average worker.

The demonstrations can be made successful; they can become the point of departure for a serious and powerful movement. Every worker and labor organization must join the movement and prevent it from becoming a passing sensation or spectacle by helping to steer it on the right course.

The curse and misery of unemployment can be fought only by the active, unified power of the working class!

Detroit Prosperity

DETROIT—A report just issued by the Union Trust Co. of Detroit should make excellent reading for Sec. of Labor Davis and others who share his "prosperity" psychosis.

The report, pointing out that automobile production in 1929 exceeded that of all previous years, draws attention to the fact that this increase of 19.8% was accomplished with "an increase of only 3% in employment". "While this a result to which automobile manufacturers may very well point with pride" it is "one which is accompanied by an increasingly serious consequence—unemployment". They emphasize the latter with the announcement that "two of the largest automobile companies have recently given notice that casual laborers will not be employed".

Unemployment paralyzes a large section of the workers and low wages ravage the rest, but "retail food prices in Detroit were 4% higher Dec. 15, 1929 than a year previous. Cost of living...increased 2% in the period of Dec. 15, 1928 to Dec. 15, 1929."

The extensive unemployment among building trades workers is shown by the decrease of $29,000,000 in volume of the building during 1929. "The value of building permits decreased 21.5% as compared with 1928". A chart published with the report shows a decline of nearly 50% in the value of building permits from "normal".

The report concludes with the not too hopeful statement that "optimism over 1930 operations in the industry is tinged with conservatism, and leaders are watching the buying trend closely...In spite of the substantial reductions being made in various groups of commodities the volume of business is not large."

Help Us to Sustain The Militant

A labor paper, particularly a revolutionary organ, does not receive the big advertisements and subsidies, without which a capitalist paper is unthinkable. The Militant is no exception to this rule. It must depend entirely upon readers and supporters for its existence and growth.

The Militant was founded because it fills a special and urgent need in the labor and revolutionary movements. It has been maintained by a group of devoted workers, who understand the value of adherence to the fundamental teachings of the great leaders of our movement, Marx, Engels, Lenin and Trotsky. These teachings are not strong if they are limited to small groups; they become a powerful weapon for labor liberation when they are made known to the whole working class—honestly and truthfully. This is the task set itself by the Militant.

This great work can be carried out effectively only if the existence of the Militant is secured. For this purpose, it is necessary to establish and strengthen a systematic SUSTAINING FUND. Such a fund will not only enable us to print a whole series of most valuable books and pamphlets. The Militant has on hand a number of manuscripts by L. D. Trotsky. They include: "What is the Permanent Revolution?" "The Struggle for the Chinese Revolution", "Europe and America", "The Great Organizers of Defeat: a Record of Five Years of the Comintern", and many others. If the SUSTAINING FUND of the Militant is assured, we can proceed to the immediate publication of these Bolshevik classics.

The sooner donations accumulate for the FUND, the more rapidly can we proceed with this important job. Every dollar counts doubly now. We are depending upon all our readers and friends to act with speed. The blank below is for your use. Fill it out now!

Passaic Strike Anniversary

Some Lessons in Militant Labor Leadership for the Future

By James P. Cannon

Experience is the capital of the labor movement no less than of other human enterprises. The generalization by which we steer toward Communism are not drawn out of thin air but are the concentrated experience of the international working class. Marxism established its place as the only valid theory of the proletariat because it alone stood this test. Experience is the laboratory of the science of revolution. Those who discovered and invent tactics without the aid of this laboratory and in defiance of it substitute guesswork for science and thereby confuse and weaken the workers' movement.

This is the present day practice. It accounts for the orgy of experimentation in all fields of activity which is running through the Party like a virulent influenza. The results of this guessing-game are very harmful for our experience, though limited is fresh and rich and much can be learned from it to the advantage of the workers' movement. Moreover there is no better nor easier way to teach the workers than by examples near at hand. American experience has a tenfold value for the education of the American workers, including the Communists. What we have we should treasure—and study.

The anniversary of the great Passaic strike which has just passed by the Party unnoticed is a case in point. That was the first large-scale experience of the Party in the direct organization of the workers for economic struggle; it was the biggest job was carried through in the most workmanlike and responsible manner. Would not the manifold experience of this strike be an excellent source of study for the industrial work of the Party today especially in regard to the organization of the unorganized.

Our leaders evidently do not think so. The Passaic strike occurred before the "Third Period". Therefore it doesn't count. Therefore, forget it; or, if it is mentioned at all, refer to it, as Browder did in an article some time ago, as a "shameful page in our history". Such a remark serves only to establish the measure of Browder. It does not in any way effect the validity of the methods employed in the Passaic strike. They stand out with conspicuous import and merit against the dubious tinkering which is being passed off by the Browders as trade union tactics.

The management of the Passaic strike was a brilliant illustration of the effectiveness of united front tactics which were, are and will be the heart and core of the Communist struggle for the masses. The united front, the guiding line in all phases of the direction of the Passaic strike was vindicated in all of them on a scale which looms colossal in contrast to the sad results which have followed its rejection.

A few of the outstanding features can be mentioned:

The strike was a genuine movement of the workers. The great majority of the workers employed in the mills were drawn into the struggle and held solidly together for months. It was a strike which paralyzed the mills and never had the character of a putch or flare-up. The masses were in it and behind it. The Communists held the unquestioned leadership although there was but a handful of Communists in the mills when the strike began. By their services and skill the Communists led the workers with a moral authority that needed no mechanical manipulation; moral authority which, in the final analysis, is the rock on which real leadership is based. Under such conditions every step, every turn in tactics required by changes in the situation, could be and were executed with the knowledge and consent of the masses of the strikers. Compare this demonstration of real leadership with some of the recent exploits and "forced marches" of the Party under the "new line", such as, for example, the disgraceful exhibition in the Illinois coal field. Cannot something be learned from this comparison?

The reactionaries were isolated and non-party forces effectively utilized in the Passaic strike. The reactionaries were busy with efforts to disrupt the Passaic strike no less than in others. But here the Communists by their tactic, cut the ground from under their feet and robbed them of all influence. The most important weapon in this fight was the slogan of unity. This slogan has more power to move the masses than any other and in Passaic the Communists kept it always in their hands; and with it kept the leadership, despite all the machinations of the reactionaries. The Communists appeared before the strikers, as they were in fact, the champion of a united struggle, and thereby held their allegiance.

Side by side with this isolation of sabotaging representatives of the A. F. of L. there was a skillful and successful utilization of non-party elements in the leading bodies, both from the ranks of the strikers and from the outside. Notable among the latter was Elizabeth Gurley Flynn. This practice contributed not a little to the broadening of the base of the leadership and the strengthening of its support from below. It is a prerequisite for success in mass organizations at the present stage of development in America. The problem presents itself in every struggle that breaks out of the narrow circle of immediate Party influence. The present leadership do not understand this. They cannot even find room for dissenting factions of the Communist movement in the unions they control. They knew no way to deal with the independent opinions of such an honest and influential militant as John Watt except to frame him up and throw him out. They do not know how to disarm and isolate reactionary disrupters with the slogan of unity. These are some of the reasons why they stage putches instead of real mass struggles like the Passaic strike.

The Passaic strike mobilized non-party mass support on a national scale. This was before the three million organized workers of America were given up as "social-fascists". The conservative trade unions were deeply penetrated with the issue of Passaic. The Left wing gained access to more unions on this occasion than on any other in its history with the exception of the Sacco Vanzetti campaign. Conferences on a scale for which the present day caricatures offer no standard of measurement were organized throughout the country. In many cases even the most conservative officials were forced into line by the sweeping appeal of the issue. Funds to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars for the support of the strike, which came through these conferences, were an indication of their mass support. All this work was most effectively stimulated by a vast propaganda conceived in terms of a mass movement. A weekly bulletin scattered broadcast, an illustrated pamphlet—even motion pictures—were employed to dramatize the struggle before the workers.

All this work and its results did much to popularize the Communists as serious workers in the labor movement. The Passaic strike, which was made known to everybody was a crushing answer in itself to the accusation that the "reds" are impractical theorists, who are incapable of constructive organization work. Communist ideas found a readier acceptance from workers who saw the Communists competently promoting and organizing such a big movement.

It will be worth while for the Communist and Left wing workers to compare this mobilization with the almost total lack of it in recent struggles led by the Party and to ask the reason for the difference. The answer lies primarily in the difference in the methods and conceptions. The results of the new tactics cannot bear comparison with the results of Passaic. But are not results the best criterion by which to measure tactics?

The Passaic strike movement was conducted without any advice from the Executive Committee of the Communist International. This is mentioned not as a virtue, but as a state of affairs which the crusade against "Trotskyism" had brought about in the leading organ of the World Party. This was the biggest task our inexperienced Party had ever undertaken in the domain of mass work, and for this there was no international advice. The Comintern building was swarming with functionaries who had nothing else in the world to do but give advice and instructions, but in this case they had none. The Party had to go on its own resources. The E. C. C. I. about that time was burning up the cables with ambiguous decisions on such questions as the removal of Party headquarters from Chicago to New York, but the Passaic strike was overlooked. Of course the Party was not entirely without help. It had the basic Lenin teaching on the united front which was not yet prohibited and this was sufficient. Lately the E. C. C. I. has remedied the neglect of Passaic and has been giving the Party much instruction on the trade union struggle. Unfortunately, it has all been bad.

Was the affiliation of the Passaic Union to the United Textile Workers a mistake in principle? This opinion is the contribution of Losovsky—after the event—and all the Party leaders, who were hot-foot for the action at the time, are wearing it like a second-hand halo. It is a not unimportant question, and one which, in the mutations of the struggle, may rise again. Therefore an answer is in order; and, for our part, in spite of Losovsky, or Zack, or even Browder, we say, no, it was not a mistake in principle. It was not even a mistake in tactics although, in the desire to keep alive the struggle which was at the point of exhaustion unnecessary concessions were made. To say that the affiliation amounted to a "betrayal" of the workers is childish nonsense that ignores all the facts. The strike was virtually at an end at the time. It had been prolonged for eight or ten months and the workers were simply worn out. If the affiliation to the U. T. W. had any effect at all it was to keep the remnants of the strike together during the negotiations until some of the mills made a sort of settlement with the organization.

The continuous proposals of the strike committee to affiliate with the U. T. W. were the weapon which isolated Hilfers (the A. F. of L. agent of disruption), enabled the strike appeal to wedge its way into the conservative unions and even compelled Green to withdraw his denunciation. Without a doubt it had a strong influence in holding the strikers' ranks solid month after month and in securing the funds to sustain them.

The withdrawal of Weisbord, the strike organizer, as a condition of affiliation, was a big concession, and a dangerous precedent to establish; but in the circumstances it had little effect. The Passaic union retained its local autonomy, the local leadership remained and the influence of the Party on the subsequent decisions was the same as before. The greatest error was the opportunistic manner in which the affiliation was carried out. This was particularly noticeable in the publicity of the strike committee which began to be tainted with defeatist apologies to the labor fakers. We had occasion to make several motions in the Political Committee to correct this line but these motions were all defeated with the help of those who now, characteristically enough, bawl loudest about "betrayal" of the strike. But the errors were incidental. It will be a disaster for the Left wing if it condemns the affiliation of a Left wing union to the A. F. of L. as a mistake in principle. Lenin's teaching and international experience refute such a contention.

The Foster leaders, appeal to the Communist workers to bury themselves in "mass work" and let controversy alone. Not a few comrades, eager for activity in the class struggle, have been caught on the hook of this false formula and their effectiveness as militants is thereby negated. Mass work is not simply an exercise to be gone through, like acrobatics, for its own sake. Bolshevik mass work is an art. Communists must study its underlying principles and make these principles their own.

There can be no better preparation for effective mass work than the evaluation and study of Party experiences in the light of Lenin's basic teachings. The high light of our experience in the industrial struggle was the Passaic strike. The Party will again enormously by a study of it and by a popularization of its lessons. The most important of these is the necessity of a return to the tactics of the united front as Lenin taught them. A serious investigation of the question will convince the American Communist workers of this. Then their mass work, their sacrifices and their courage will begin to bear fruit for Communism.

$200,000,000 Profits and—Unemployment

YOUNGSTOWN, O.—Since last October the mills in Youngstown have run two to three days a week and some are now closed down. Now we are told that the bosses of the U. S. Steel Corporation are not satisfied with the two hundred million dollars ($200,000,000) for the workers for 1929, and expect to make more by throwing workers into the streets.

The «Right to Think»

The monstrous hypocrisy and duplicity of the Lovestone Right wingers seems to have no bounds. Its latest manifestation is expressed in an article by Will Herberg entitled "Have Communists the Right to Think?" (Revolutionary Age, Feb. 1, 1930). Herberg is very much pained because "the present intolerable regime in the Communist International... meets every sign of initiative or ideological self-reliance with immediate threats of suppression or expulsion." He is also very much worried because the bourgeois intellectual world takes advantage of this unfortunate situation to attack Communism.

It's really too bad. But, my dear Herberg, who helped to erect this "intolerable regime"? Who laid the foundation for it in the American party? How long ago is it that you were participating in this "intolerable regime" and expelling comrades for "ideological self-reliance"?

Perhaps it would not be inopportune to quote a few of your directives which you wrote in an "Outline for Speakers on Trotskyism" in March 1929. Listen to this: "Trotskyism is incompatible with membership in a Communist Party". How differently you write today! "Moreover, though membership in a Communist Party implies agreement with certain broad fundamentals it does not follow that a comrade must agree with every implication or proposition of the Marxian world-view—or out he goes!" New times, new principles!

"Why we break up Trotskyist meetings—they are demonstrations against the Soviet Union of the same type as Monarchist, socialist demonstrations." Who knows? Perhaps here we have discovered the seed of the theory of social-fascism!

No Discussion, Say Lovestone-Foster

"The struggle against Trotskyism must be a struggle against all the 'immediate issues' that the Trotskyites raise: 'no discussion', 'freedom of discussion, of opinion', 'democracy' etc. We must completely expose all these artifices." Was it for this purpose, Herberg, that you wrote your article on whether Communists have a right to think? There must be no fraternization with the Trotskyites who must be treated as counter-revolutionaries." How heavy the past weighs down on us!

Hypocrisy, always an integral element of Lovestoneism, finds its highest expression in you, my dear Herberg. How much consideration for the right of Communists to think did you have when you executed that infamous dual maneuver—the N. E. C. acceptance of the Y. C. I. letter and the Polcom's statement against it? (Innocent Herberg—he was completely ignorant of the intrigues of Zam, chameleon Kaplan and Pepper.) How much regard for the right of Communists to think did you have when you concocted all the hocus-pocus about the Y. C. I. being a section of the Comintern like any other section, and therefore there was the right of one section (the American Party) to appeal against another section (the Y. C. I.)?

What contempt for the ability of Communists to think is contained in this abominable trickery to deceive the membership of the League. Yes, my dear Herberg, your duplicity was really ingenious—in accordance with the needs of the situation. Today you pursue this same line of duplicity. Only the situation has changed; therefore your line of duplicity has changed. The Communists will detect the false notes in your new crooning songs.

We have always advocated a free and open discussion of the points of view of the three tendencies in the Communist International; the Right (Bucharin-Lovestone-Brandler); the Center (Stalin-Foster, et al); and the Left (Trotsky, etc.). We proposed that this discussion be conducted within the Party in accordance with the procedure of inner-party democracy and in the spirit and practice of Lenin. You and Foster, disciples of Bucharin and Stalin, said no, and expelled us. Now the discussion of the views of the three political groups is nevertheless being conducted—but outside the bounds of the Party. This is not the best way. But the class struggle will not wait or stop at bureaucratic boundary lines, no matter who draws them. The discussion is here! Worker-Communists are exercising the right to think. With confidence, therefore, the Communist League, the Leninist-Bolsheviks, greet and prepare the future.

GEORGE RAY

Can Monopoly Capitalism Be Organized?

By Arne Swabeck

Herbert C. Hoover, the "engineer in politics" has again assured the "public" that economic conditions are "essentially sound". He sees a new upward trend. Undoubtedly this is not very assuring to the growing numbers of the millions already tramping the streets in vain search for a job.

There could perhaps be no better proof that the selection of the president of the United States is made entirely in accord with the interests and policies of the dominant imperialists. Prior to Nov. 1928, the coming lean period could be foreseen. A mediocre Coolidge would not do to carry the scepter. An engineer was required who could step forward and boldly carry out these policies, which, as the coming period will witness, have intimate relation with world shaking events.

Immediately the "Hoover prosperity" was made proverbial. At the beginning of this present crisis he set out on his first task—to restore "public faith". His economic conferences were heralded as the unfailing stabilizer. Did he set out to materialize the program of the Committee on Recent Economic Changes, headed by himself, which summarized the problems of American capitalism as follows?

"To maintain the dynamic equilibrium of recent years is indeed a problem of leadership which more and more demands deliberate public attention and control. Research and study, the orderly classification of knowledge, joined to increasing skill, well may make complete control of the economic system a possibility."

If so, the answer can already be given categorically: Not until the capitalist system of production with all its cancers and conflicts is abolished will complete control of the economic system be a possibility. And then no more in the interest of the capitalist exploiters, but in the interest of the proletarian producers.

Opposition Platform Forecasts Present Crisis

The phenomenal rapid expansion of American imperialism during the last decade; the extreme rationalization of its industry; the gigantic development of productive forces, outstripping the expansion of the market; the immensely increased exploitation by speedup of the workers bringing in its wake an immense standing unemployed army; the reduction of skill and sharpened economic contradictions;—these have brought the first inevitable result in this present cyclic crisis.

We described this in our Communist (Opposition) platform, of April 1929, as a "growing disproportion between the rate of expansion of productive capacity and the rate of growth of production and consumption". We cited the index figures of production in big industry as having risen from 146 in 1919 to 171 in 1927 (1914 equals 100). The index figures for workers employed in big industry fell from 129 in 1919 to 114 in 1927 (1914 equals 100) although population growth for the same years was from 106 to 120 respectively (this includes the period of so-called prosperity). In addition there has been an influx into the ranks of the unemployed of declassed farmers. It has also been estimated by most economic authorities that during the last decade the improvement of machinery has increased the productivity of labor by 45%.

Hoover's Program

Hoover in stepping forward with his program for maintaining "economic balance" did not call upon Congress; but openly proclaimed where the real power lies by calling upon financiers and executives of the big corporations and banks. Compare for one moment this present arrogant dominance of American imperialism with the United States of pre-war days. President Roosevelt, also the "choice" of the Republican party, became the best possible public front to express and simultaneously to allay the large middle class suspicion and antagonism toward trust combination. Only under the shield of his "trust busting" program could the basis be laid well for the further rapid capitalist monopoly developments. The Sherman anti-trust law proved no real obstacle whatever.

Gigantic mergers have been on the order of the day ever since, yet representing only a fraction of such developments to come. The Interstate Commerce Commission proposal for merger of the existing railroads into 19 systems is but a beginning. Monopoly capitalism has had its development par excellence in the United States. The great resources have been sufficient to keep the biggest enterprises solidly in the hands of private owners, without much need of the government taking over such functions, save such examples as the U. S. Shipping Board. The government could serve capitalism better by appearing to stand separate and to maintain the illusion of "democratic regulation of relations of production". Now the first actual tendencies are indicated toward the higher stage of development—toward state capitalism. Not, of course, in the same forms, ramifications and methods of developing state capitalism of the fascist state in Italy, nor even the forms of the actual tendencies toward state capitalism in Germany; but rather as one capitalist economic writer "hopefully" puts it in the Forbes Magazine: "An experiment of social control of business... as a substitute for the utter anarchy which in the past characterized the government of industry... with a new code of rationalized co-ordination and stabilization in the interest of the larger economic group".

Capitalism Can Only Intensify Anarchic Production

The first steps in the direction of this "experiment", the most important aspect of the Hoover economic conferences, gives to the building program the role mainly of the public front. The projected economic council, now being formed, is to become the experimental instrument. It can be expected to have far reaching powers; but the mere shouting of "fascist council" without full understanding of the process becomes empty chatter, despite the fact that fascist methods will be employed against the workers in an increasing degree.

An Opposition Group in Mexico Formed

The International Communist Opposition lives and grows! All the lies, slander, concealment and terror of the Stalinist bureaucracy cannot prevent its extension. A little while ago, we announced the formation of the first Opposition group in Latin America, organized by members of the Argentine Communist Party. Today we are able to announce the second: the Opposition group in Mexico, directed by comrade Rosalio Negrete of Mexico City, member of the Central Committee of the Young Communist League who has recently been expelled for his Opposition viewpoint. Comrade Negrete was in New York City some time ago on Party work, and came to speak with the comrades of the Communist League (Opposition) here. Plans were laid for the carrying on of work for the principles of the International Opposition in Mexico. At the first sign of this activity, the hopelessly Menshevik leadership of the Mexican party, the subservient ally of the Calles regime for years, expelled Negrete and other leading and active comrades. The Mexican party has been virtually wiped out, betrayed by its leaders (Galvan, etc.) and unable to mobilize support to fight the governmental repression. The Opposition is attempting to mobilize the dispersed Communist elements and help strengthen a proletarian revolutionary movement in Mexico, instead of the confused "workers and peasants" party that has been masquerading as Communist in Mexico for years.

The fury of the Stalinist bureaucrats in the U. S. and Mexico has exceeded all bounds at this new development. The Daily Worker has been surpassing itself in falsehood by trying to identify the Communist Opposition with the Right wing which has organized the "governmental (!) Communist Party" (Bach, Monzon and other Mexican friends of Lovestone and Company). A recent statement in the Worker by Hernan Laborde, secretary of the Mexican party repeats the calumnious lie that comrade Negrete collected money to be sent to Lovestone here! Needless to say, our Mexican comrades have no connection with Lovestone or any other Right wing group.

It is interesting to note that comrade Diego Rivera, one of the most notable leaders of the Communist movement in Latin America for years, has issued a statement supporting the International Left Opposition led by comrade Trotsky, denouning degree.

What are the prospects of this experiment, this attempt to institute "social control for the utter anarchy in the government of industry"? The present crisis and its consequences are the answer to developments to date. Moreover, the whole history of development of productive forces under capitalism points to the inevitable conclusion that precisely this which is aimed for "social control of business", based as it is upon further expansion of productive capacity, instead of becoming a substitute for, becomes the lever to further increase anarchy in production as a whole. Instead of decreasing or doing away with present contradictions, "social control of business", which in the capitalist system could only mean strengthening of the control of one class—the capitalist class—will increase and sharpen the contradictions both within the country and in the international sphere. The question, however, just how this "experiment" will appear in the United States and the possible manifestations of its effects, both in general and upon further working class developments are of particular interest to Communists. Lenin and Trotsky combat Bucharin's and Stalin's Economic Theories

Between the Center and the Right (the Stalinists and the Bucharin, Brandler-Thalheimer, Lovestone, etc. group) of the Communist movement a battle of quotations is now taking place on this problem of effects of capitalist developments in the post war period—monopoly capitalism with its tendencies toward state capitalism. Both sides quote Marx and Lenin profusely for their own ends. The Center quite easily proves the similarity of the reformist position of the Right wing to that of the socialist imperialists of the Second International. The basic proof wing and maintaining his complete disassociation from the latter. The tiny group of atio from the latter. The tiny group of Stalinist leaders are of course still trying the farcical game—learned from Earl Browder—of insisting that Bach, Negrete, Monzon and Rivera are in one and the same camp. Naturally, there is neither an ounce of truth or sense in this declaration. The comrades of the Mexican Opposition are moving forward to Communism—not to social democracy and class collaboration. Bach, Monzon and Co. are in the camp of Calles-Gil-Rubio. Our comrades are in the ranks of the International Revolution.

GASTONIA STOOLPIGEON GOT HIS

CHARLOTTE, N. C.—Claim has been filed with the state industrial commission for compensation for the death of Marvin Johnson, detective, employed by Gaston county to act as stoolpigeon on Lory mill strikers held in jail following the Aderholt shooting.

Jailers who threw tear gas bombs into the strikers' cells to stop them from singing, forgot Johnson was among them. He contracted a pulmonary disease, it is claimed, from which he died.

AMERICAN PLAN MEANS 55 CENTS FOR MACHINISTS

DETROIT—American plan, so-called, blooms to perfection in the Smiley Machine Co. plant in Detroit. Skilled machinists are getting 55c an hour and working 51 1-2 hours a week. One mechanic, a belt repair man and millwright, has worked with the firm nine years, but still gets 55 cents. The foreman employed there for 15 years, gets 85 cents.

MINERS WOULD LIKE TO SEE PART OF STEEL TRUST GOLD THEY PRODUCED

HIBBING, Minn.—Net profits of almost $200,000,000 taken last year by U. S. Steel are not reflected in the mining industry on the Messaba range where most of the steel trust's ore is mined. Wages in the mines are only $4.20 a day.

NEW YORK—French navy men were thrown on the Ile de France, crack French liner, when seamen struck in the port of seamanship the French line decided to Le Havre. After a taste of the navy men's grant concessions to the strikers.

we have ever done in this field; and it advanced by Bucharin in his book, "Economic Theories of the Transition Period", published in 1920. This whole opportunist theory of Bucharin, which did not then in the least prevent his leadership of the Leftists supported by Pepper who also then posed as a Left, was criticized by Lenin at the time. Trotsky has never been sparing in his criticism of Bucharin's opportunism; but from the Stalin regime nothing was heard. Nay, more, this opportunist theory was the basically accepted theory of the Right-Center bloc, one of its expressions being "socialism in one country" with the kulaks gradually developing into socialism, already nine-tenths attained! The Leninist opposition to this theory was expelled and exiled. The international character of the revolution was forgotten. Its international development and organization became subjected to opportunist combinations on top with the betrayers of the British general strike, the Purcells and Hicks in the Anglo-Russian Unity Committee; with the hangers-on of the Chinese proletariat, the Chiang Kai-Sheks in the "four class government".

The position of social democracy on the development of monopoly capitalism and tendencies toward state capitalism, given its classical expression by Hilferding, can be summarized into: A new era of transition from competitive capitalism into organized capitalism overcomes the anarchy inherent in the former; then the further transformation into an economy directed by the democratic state. From organized capitalism to socialism (!!) The Socialist Party in the United States, although it can still afford to pose in some respects as a Left wing within the Second International, being yet far away from governmental responsibilities, takes essentially the same position in greeting the Hoover economic conferences as something the socialists have always advocated. Lovestone and Bucharin Approach Social Democracy's Views

The sharp gravitation of the Bucharin-Lovestone Right wing toward the Hilferding position is, of course, clear. It is swinging from the view of recognizing external contradictions on a world scale by development of monopoly capitalism, but eliminating internal contradictions, to the view of overcoming anarchy in production by organized capitalism.

Says Lovestone in Revolutionary Age (No. 2).

"The plethora, the superabundance of capital in the country—the basic cause of the panic (stock crash)—brought on a condition of the most serious dislocation between the security stock and the fundamental conditions of the capitalist productive economy..." (!)

A mere dislocation from the "sound" economy—and further:

"The panic in Wall Street did not come as a result of the decline of American capitalist economy. It came as a result of the very strength of American capitalist economy (!) magnifying and sharpening the contradictions of world capitalism" (emphasis in original).

Bucharin says in his book "Economics of the Transition Period", published in 1920:

"Finance capital has destroyed the anarchy of production within the countries of large scale capitalism. Monopolistic associations of enterprises, the combined enterprises and the penetration of finance capital into industry created along the unorganized capitalist system a new type of production relations, turn of goods exchange into a financial-capitalistic organization."

The Centrist Phrases and the Results

Yet today the Centrists, all their declarations notwithstanding, continue to repeat parrot-like supposedly revolutionary phrases devoid of the content which will secure a mass basis. They proceed with their false concept of "revolutionary unions" rejecting possible labor party developments isolating the Communists from the basic section of the working class; they thus negate the correct analysis of growing gigantic contradictions with its opportunities for growing mass contact and for laying the foundation for a class movement of the American workers. The "Left" policy of the leadership still represents the strategic conjectures from which sprang the opportunist tactics of yesterday.

The growing capitalist contradictions of the imperialist stage will be taken up in another article in the next issue of the Militant.

Throughout the World of Labor

The Stalinization of the Mexican Party

The Communist Party of Mexico is no exception to the general crisis in the Comintern. For many years it was but a very small organization with little ideological foundation and an extremely weak organization. Due to the general development of the petty bourgeois and agrarian revolution, the party from the time of its foundation was permeated with more of a peasant's than worker's ideology, and its press always had a greater circulation among the peasantry than in the industrial centers. It was common in those times to hear members of the party Central Committee state that the Mexican Revolution and the Russian Revolution were almost the same thing. The party comrades were always the first to applaud the liberal petty bourgeois measures of the "Leftists" in the government, giving to these elements an almost unconditional support. Almost all of the party's work among the masses was done under some disguise or another, and party candidates never took part in elections although numerous party members occupied government posts as "agrarians", "laborites", "anti-clericals", etc.

At the time of the Sixth World Congress, the third period was discovered, and immediately the party right-about turned and loped off at the double quick. All of the reforms instituted by the government of the petty-bourgeoisie, which had until then been considered revolutionary gains, were now denounced as counter-revolutionary. The sell-out of the government to American imperialism, meant that the bourgeoisie had "betrayed" the revolution, and it became a crime over-night for any party member to even sustain personal relations with anyone at all in the government, with which the party had so recently collaborated. It became then the chief earthly desire of every member, to see how often he could be arrested. Even the Mexican section of the I. L. D. converted itself into a simple instrument for attacking the government, driving itself into illegality before the party.

The party press, taking advantage of the objective revolutionary situation created by the bourgeoisie's capitulation to imperialism and the struggle between the government and reaction, announced that the proletarian revolution was at hand. The masses were called upon to seize the factories and the land; all power was demanded for the soviets (there were no soviets, and the party did not give instructions as to their organization—but these are only "details"). Many of us, intoxicated by the excitement of the moment, impressed by the unrest among the peasantry, and over-estimating the strength of the party, did not take into account the fact that there was not a single local of the party or Y.C.L. that was not in disorganization at the time. Fortunately for the Mexican workers and peasants, the C. C. talked and shouted until what was considered the moment for action had passed by. The government of the bourgeoisie, aided by Wall Street, managed to hold its seat and since then has dedicated its attention to the consolidation of its power.

The Communist Party, which due to its romanticism had already slackened up its fundamental work among the masses in order to dream of insurrections, now found itself deserted by the masses that formerly had looked to it for leadership.

Then the expulsions began. First came the agrarian leaders of the National Peasants League who are mostly elements that never should have been admitted into a Communist Party, because of the petty-bourgeois class interests that they represent. Shortly after, with the arrival of two "Third Period experts" in the form of the C. I. and Y. C. I. representatives, the true Stalinization of the organization began. Tendencies and deviations were discovered in the most unlooked for places, and where they were not discovered they were invented. Two ex-Right wingers that came as reps had to make themselves shine in Moscow. The political guillotine commenced to function with extraordinary regularity and precision cutting both to the right and to the left. Almost a dozen C. C. members of the party and many of its rank and file have been expelled since last September. The last victim was Jose Gallardo, General Secretary of the Y. C. L. who was sacrificed last week because his report given in Moscow, where he attended the plenum of the E. C. Y. C. I., concerning the organizational strength of the Mexican party did not agree with the report rendered by the C. I. representative in Mexico.

Together with the "cleaning of the ranks" on the part of the C. C. has come an intensified repression on the part of the government. At a moment when the party's influence among the industrial workers is zero, and its influence over the peasantry has dropped more than sixty percent, the Y. C. I. representative together with S., the party C. C. Representative in the C.C.Y.C.L. "discovered" that anti-militarist work was not being carried on in Mexico. Half a dozen circulars were sent out demanding an eight hour day for the soldiers and calling on them to form regimental committees, and to send their officers to Hell. This was done in an abstract manner and without any relationship to movements among the proletarian masses. The concrete result was a general repression on the part of the government against the Y.C.L. organizations of the eight largest centers, including the imprisonment of most of the C. E. C. of the Y. C. L.; disorganization of all national youth work and also all youth work in the capital. Ten foreign comrades were expelled from the country and five natives have been interned in the penal colony of the Islas Marias. During these recent repressions, the "bolshhevized" party has not been able to carry out a single real mass protest. It is also of interest to note that the valiant M., the Y. C. I. Representative, found that this was the best time to leave the country, which he did without even notifying the C.E.C.s of the Party or the League. For six weeks now the Mexican Y. C. L., which a short while ago was stronger than the party, has been unable to budge. Even its funds have been confiscated by the C. E. C. of the party. Money is scarce and the bureaucrats must eat.

This is, briefly, the situation existing today in the Mexican Communist movement. Since the beginning of the "third period", with the "radicalization of the masses," the Mexican party has lost eighty percent of its membership, most of its mass influence and contacts, and its weekly organ "El Machete". It is now almost completely "bolshhevized". With a few score more members that get disgusted or are thrown out, it will be completely so.

The task of the Communist Opposition, of recent formation and still in its infancy organizationally and politically, consists in saving what is left of the party and Y. C. L. organization, regenerating the movement along true Bolshevik-Leninist lines. The saner elements of the party and youth realize this, and by one means or another we shall manage to build up in Mexico a real Communist Party, capable of leading the proletariat in its struggles.

ROSALIO NEGRETE

Mondism and Unemployment Grow in England

While MacDonald pursues his "world policy of disarmament and peace", like a great spectacle and with loud accompaniment, the trade union leaders are more discreetly pursuing their policy of class collaboration, the effects of which will be unfortunately more tangible and lasting: they are plunging more and more deeply into "Mondism".

Lord Melchett (formerly Sir Alfred Mond) is of course no negligible power by himself: he runs the imperial trust of chemical products whose domain increases without end. Still, his influence covers one industry. The big employers' organizations, which embrace most of the other industries invited by him to participate in the negotiations, begun upon his initiative, with the trade union leaders, have replied negatively. Not that they have not understood their interest in assuring conditions of a permanent social peace by the treason of the trade union leaders. They want to deal directly with them and disdain the good offices of Sir Alfred Mond. And that is what they are just about to do.

Preparatory meetings have been held in which there participated delegates of the national confederation of the employers' organizations, the Federation of British Industries, and delegates from the General Council of the Trade Unions. Towards the end of last December, a plan of consultation and cooperation was unanimously adopted, which established permanent and cordial relations between the representatives of the employers and the workers. "This in itself is something new", observed the Times. And it saw a striking proof of the change of mind that has taken place on the side of the workers in the fact that the resolution was proposed and defended by A. J. Cook himself, seconded by a representative of the confederation and a representative of the employers' Federation.

The organ of The City is entirely correct. But this new state of mind prevails primarily in the upper circles. The workers offer no resistance. They have not yet been able to overcome the demoralization engendered by the great defeats of 1926 and there is nobody and no organization to help them recover, for the Communist Party has been unable to gain their confidence; it has been unable to gain their confidence; it has not even been able to keep the thousands of workers who have flowed into its ranks.

In the meantime, the conditions of life of the workers remain difficult; they have not been improved under the Labour government; they have grown worse. Various corporations have imposed reductions in wages and unemployment has continued to grow. Here are the figures, from 1924 to 1929, on the date of December 16, for each of the years:

19261,309,700
19271,100,000

The bourgeoisie has no recognition for the men who betray their class in order to serve it. With the bankruptcy of the Labour government in this field before it, it overwhelmed with sarcasm the man who, in the ministry, is in charge of unemployment, J.H. Thomas forgetting the services that he has rendered it in the past. It is known that Thomas at first undertook an unsuccessful voyage to Canada to dispose there of the unemployed and coal at the same time. Today, he looks for the remedy in England itself. In the speech he has just made at Manchester, he denounced the chaos that still prevails in the principal British industries and declared that the rationalization of these industries must be undertaken methodically. He promised the industrialists the financial aid of the City. Towards this end, the Bank of England has created a private company called "Industrial Securities Management, Ltd.", the province of which is the establishment and examination of projects for rationalization and the contribution of financial aid to realize them.

This may yield results, for in the realm of rationalization, England is still very backward, even though fusions of concerns are frequently announced. It is hoped that in this way England will be in a position to fight under better conditions on the market and will be able to regain its lost outlets. That is possible. But on the other hand, rationalization has everywhere the effect of appreciably reducing the workers employed so that in the final analysis, there is no sign that these measures, assuming that they are seriously applied, can produce the remedy sought for unemployment.

On the other hand, the "financial aid of The City" signifies that the reorganization of industry will take place under the direction of the Bank of England, outside of all "meddling" from the State. It actually means full power ceded to the Bank in a field of capital importance. Thomas has spoken of a "new epoch", in which order is being substituted for chaos. But in the New Leader, Brailford observes that "the most singular feature of this 'new epoch' lies in the fact that it is a Labour ministry—which it opponents call socialist—that is opening it." He remarks that the initiative did not proceed from Thomas himself, but from the financial powers whose instrument he is, and he recalls that the Liberal project for reorganizing industry did not abdicate quite so completely to the Bank, for it confided the direction of this substantial enterprise to a "council of national development" and thus approached the project elaborated by the Labour party before the formation of a Labour cabinet. London, January 28 1930 —S. D.

After the French Socialist Congress

The socialist party in being disturbed a bit about the problem of participation (in a bourgeois cabinet—Ed.). Formally, it is a question of knowing if the socialist party can participate from now on in a cartel ministry. In other words: can the socialist party exercise capitalist power under such conditions that it will not even be able to realize its minimum program?

This problem is not peculiar to the French section of the Socialist International alone; it is raised for the whole international social democracy. Furthermore, the reply given to this question has already been given in the attitude of the principal parties of the Second International which are exercising capitalist power. The German social democracy is ruling for the German bourgeoisie. English Labourism rules for the king and the English bourgeoisie. Both display all their duplicity in order to enable capitalism to pass through a difficult stage, and by trying to bind the working class to bourgeois interests, to show the workers that their interests lie in class collaboration and the "re-establishment" of capitalism. It is certain that the French socialists are destined to play the same role. But their relative weakness, their insufficient roots in the working masses, have prevented them up to now from playing this role in the government, as they already play it in all countries, in economic conflicts, in municipalities, in the Chambers, etc.... The problem of participation has already been partially resolved in practise.

The real fear of workers' discontent and of the Communist Party also exists for many, in the attempt at a legal "opposition" that the socialist Left is making in the North and Center.

At the Sunday Congress, the socialists discussed it in a very academic manner which reflected their numerous internal and external contradictions. The Right wing, led by Boncour and Renaudel, wanted the party to admit immediately the necessity and direct possibility of sharing power with the other parties of the "democracy", that is, with the Radical party. The "Centrists", like Leon Blum and Auriol, as well as the "Left" of Paul Faure and Zyromski, acknowledge the same possibility. But they want to choose the moment when to translate it into facts, and for that the present legislature does not seem to them so favorable. In 1932 we will see. The latter carried by a strong majority. But the contradiction will not continue to exist any the less between the quite radical petty bourgeois wing of the party and the workers' sections which the "Left" still retains.

This Left thinks that at the next elections, the socialist party will show such progress that it alone will be able to direct the "democracy" and that it will be able to assume power with an authority that it has not yet today. The Temps is of the same opinion. It calls this congress ironically: a revolutionary congress. That is to indicate that if it really wants to become a governing party, even in coalition, the socialist party must extend its clientele and also lose its "revolutionary" character, that is, quite simply to abandon its "Marxist" label which no longer corresponds to anything and can only embarrass it.

The victory of the socialist Left at the Congress in the Jean-Jaures Gymnase shows that the majority of the party still believes in its labels and its program of social revolution, and that it hopes to follow the open road of the Austrian social democracy: increase its members and its influence up to the time when it will represent the majority of the nation.

The crisis in the Communist Party, the decline of the confidence that the workers put in it, does not permit one to reckon that this situation will be exploited to the full in favor of the proletariat. However, a situation favorable to the gathering of the working masses on a revolutionary basis may assume form. At the present moment, the Communist movement needs sincere, courageous and devoted cadres without which a new favorable situation will escape Paris, January 31, 1930.

The «Third Period» of the Comintern's Mistakes

«No Agreements with the Reformists»

But there is another important tactical deduction from the "Third Period", which Molotov expresses in these words: "Now more than at any other time the tactic of coalition between the revolutionary organizations and the organizations of the reformists is inadmissible and harmful", (Pravda No. 177, August 4, 1929).

Agreements with the reformists are inadmissible now "more than at any other time". Does it mean that they were inadmissible before too? How then shall we explain the whole policy of the years 1926-1928? And precisely why have agreements with the reformists, inadmissible in general, become particularly inadmissible now? Because, they explain to us, we have entered a period of revolutionary ascent. Yet we cannot but recollect that the conclusion of a bloc with the General Council of the British trade unions was motivated at the time precisely by the fact that England had entered a period of revolutionary ascent, and that the radicalization of the British working masses pushed the reformists to the Left. By what incident is yesterday's tactical super-wisdom of Stalinism stood on its head? We would look in vain for a solution to the riddle. It is quite simple: the empiricists of Centrism burned their hands on the experiment of the Anglo-Russian Committee and with a strong oath they want to guard against scandals in the future. But an oath will not help, for our strategists have not yet understood the lessons of the Anglo-Russian Committee.

The mistake was not in making the episodic agreement with the General Council, which was actually going "Left" in that period (1926) under the pressure of the masses. The first mistake was in the fact that the bloc was concluded not on concrete practical tasks clear to the working class but on general pacifist phrases and falsely diplomatic formulas. The chief mistake, however which grew into a gigantic historical crime, lay in the fact that our strategists could not immediately and openly break with the General Council when it turned its weapons against the general strike, that is, when it turned from an unreliable semi-ally into an open enemy.

The influence of the radicalization of the masses on the reformists is quite similar to the influence that the development of a bourgeois revolution has on the liberals. In the first stages of the movement of the masses the reformists move Leftward, hoping in this way to retain the leadership in their hands. But when the movement overflows the limits of reform and demands from the leaders an outright break with the bourgeoisie, the majority of the reformists sharply change their tone. From cowardly fellow-travellers of the masses, they turn into strike-breakers, enemies, open betrayers. At the same time, however, part of them, consisting not entirely of their better elements, jump over into the camp of the revolution. An episodic agreement with the reformists, at the moment when under the influence of conditions, they happen to be compelled to make a step or a half-step forward, may be unavoidable. But it must be understood, beforehand that the Communists are ready to break mercilessly with the reformists the moment they take a jump backward. The reformists are betrayers not because they carry out, at every given moment and in every one of their acts, the direct instructions of the bourgeoisie. If that is how the matter stood, the reformists would have no influence on the workers, and consequently would not be needed by the bourgeoisie. Precisely in order to have the necessary authority for the betrayal of the workers at the decisive moment, the opportunists are compelled at the preparatory period to assume the leadership of the workers' struggles, particularly at the beginning of the process of the radicalization of the masses. From here follows the necessity of the united front tactic, in connection with which we are compelled for the sake of a broader unification of the masses to enter into practical agreements with their reformist leaders.

It is necessary to understand the historic function of the social-democracy as a whole in order to force them step by step out of all their positions. The present leadership has not even a trace of such an understanding. It knows only two methods: either, in the spirit of the Brandlerites, to drag at the tail of the social democracy (1926-1928), or by identifying social-democracy with Fascism, to substitute helpless abuse for revolutionary policy. As a result of the zig-zags of the past six years, we have the strengthening of the social democracy and the weakening of Communism. The mechanical directives of the Tenth Plenum can only serve to worsen the already sufficiently damaged situation.

Only a hopeless ignoramus can imagine that due to the miraculous power of the "Third Period", the working class as a whole will turn away from the social democracy driving the whole reformist bureaucracy into the camp of Fascism. No, the process will develop by more complicated and contradictory roads. A growing dissatisfaction with the Social Democratic government in Germany, with the Laborites in England, the transformation of partial and isolated strikes into mass movements, etc., (when all these developments actually do take place,) will have as their unavoidable consequence—we propose to all the Molotovs to carve it on their noses!—a Leftward turn of very wide circles of the reformist camp, just as the inner process in the U. S. S. R. necessitated the Leftward swing of the Centrist camp—to which Molotov himself belongs.

The social democrats and those of the Amsterdam International with the exception of the more conscious Right wing elements (types like Thomas, Herman Mueller, Renaudel, etc) will be compelled, under corresponding conditions, to assume the leadership of the advance of the masses—it is understood, only in order to confine these advances within narrow limits, or in order to attack the workers from the rear when they will overstep these limits. Although we know that in advance, and openly warn the vanguard about it, nevertheless, in the future there will still be tens, hundreds and thousands of cases when the Communists will not only be unable to refuse practical agreements with the reformists, but will have to take the initiative in such agreements in order, without letting the leadership out of their hands, to break with the reformists the moment they turn away from shaky allies into open betrayers. This policy will be unavoidable primarily in regard to the Left Social Democracy, which during an actual radicalization of the masses, will be compelled to oppose the Right wing more decisively, even to the point of a split. This perspective in no way contradicts the fact that the head of the Left Social Democracy most often consists of the most degraded and dangerous allies of the bourgeoisie.

How is it possible to refuse practical agreements with the reformists in those cases where, for instance, they are leading strikes? If there are very few of such cases now, it is because the strike movement itself is very weak as yet and the reformists can ignore and sabotage it. But with the drawing into the struggle of great masses, agreements will become unavoidable for both sides. It is just as impossible to block the way for practical agreements with the reformists—not only with the Social Democratic mass, but in many instances also with their leaders or what is more likely with part of the leaders—in the struggle against Fascism. This perspective may turn out to be not very far off, not only in Austria but also in Germany. The directives of the Tenth Plenum are simply a result of the psychology of opportunists scared to death.

The Stalins, Molotovs, and the other allies of yesterday of Chiang Kai Shek, Wang Chin Wei, Purcell, Cock, Fimmen, LaPolette and Raditch, will undoubtedly raise the cry that the Left Opposition stands for a bloc with the Second International. These cries, as soon as the real Leftward swing of the working class takes the bureaucrats unawares, will not prevent the pronouncement of a fourth period, or a second stage of the third, and all the Molotovs will enter at least with "both feet" into an epoch of opportunist experiments like the Anglo-Russian Committee and the workers and peasants Kuo Min Tang.

Do Not Forget Your Own Yesterday

Let the present leaders of the French Communist Party, just as, by the way, all the other Parties in the International recall their own still fresh history. All of them, with the exception of the Youth, came from the ranks of the reformists under the influence of the Leftward swing of the workers. That did not prevent us Bolsheviks from entering into agreements with the Leftward moving reformists, putting very precise conditions to them. One of these innumerable agreements was, for instance, Zimmerwald. Whence, this self-satisfied confidence of the social-patriots of yesterday, that the masses, when they actually approach the "advanced positions of the revolutionary rise," will not bring forward a new shift of Cachins, Monmousseaus, Thaelmanns, and others, (the second edition, let us hope, will be better than the first)—and that we shall not be men by the ears into revolutionary position compelled once more to pull these gentlemen, entering with them into episodic agreements, putting before them, in later stages, 21 and perhaps 42 conditions, or on the contrary, throwing them overboard with their heads into the mud of opportunism, when they start to draw back?

The official theoreticians quite falsely explain the present strengthening of the Right wing in Communism by the fact, that the "inner" reformists got scared of the radicalization of the masses. Here is a complete misunderstanding of political psychology! Opportunism presupposes a very great elasticity and ability for adaptation. If a mass pressure were felt, the Brandlers, Jileks and Lovetones would have moved to the Left and not to the Right, particularly such worn-out careerists as Sellier, Garchery, and others who are concerned primarily with the retention of their legislative mandates. It is true, the capacity of opportunists for moving Leftward is not unlimited. When the Rubicon—the decision, the uprising—is reached, the majority of them jumps back to the Right wing. This was proved by the experience of even so tempered a Party as the Bolshevik (Zinoviev, Kamenev, Rykov, Kalinin, Tomsky, Lunacharsky and others). After the victory, the opportunists once more moved "Left", or more correctly to the side of power (Léonovsky, Martinov, Kussinen and others, and following them, such heroes as Pepper, Cachin and Frossard). But in France matters are far from having reached a decision. And if the French opportunists do not go Leftward at present, but jump to the Right, then this in itself is a true sign that the revolutionary pressure of the masses is not felt, that the Party is growing weak, and the municipal and other careerists hope to retain their mandates by coming out against Communism.* The desertions of such rotten elements is in itself a gain for the party. But the misfortune lies in the fact that the at one and the same time false, irresponsible, adventurist self-praising and cowardly policy of the official leadership creates a very favorable cover, for the deserters and pushes towards them proletarian elements whose place should be in the Communist ranks.

Once More on War Danger

In order to worsen this tangle the recognition of an immediate revolutionary situation is multiplied by the announcement of just as immediate a war danger. In defense of this thesis, Molotov unexpectedly directed the full power of his knowledge against Varga, the well-known theoretician courtier, the Shakespearean Polonius who is inclined to say something agreeable to every "prince," Right or Left, depending upon the state of weather. This time however, Polonius did not hit the mark. His very acquaintance with the foreign press, with facts and figures, prevented his timely replacement of the meridian of the Comintern at the place where Molotov stepped with his left leg. Varga brought into the resolution the following political correction:

"The sharpening of imperialist contradictions which not one of the major imperialist countries considers at present sensible to decide by way of war, compels them to attempt temporary conciliation of these contradictions in the sphere of the reparations question."

It would seem that this ultra-careful phrase is absolutely irrefutable. But as it nevertheless, demanded some additional strain of thought, Molotov was completely exasperated. How can one think,—he yelled—that not one of the main imperialist powers does not consider it sensible at present to decide the imperialist contradictions by way of war? "It is known to everyone (!)" listen, listen: Molotov is talking!—"It is known to everyone that the danger of a new imperialist war is growing every day." Nevertheless, Varga "sees the contrary". Isn't it monstrous?—How does Varga dare "deny that precisely as a result of the execution of the Young reparations plan, the sharpening of contradictions are unavoidable". . .

All this is so absurd, so primitively stupid, that it even disarms irony. "It is known to everybody, that the danger of new imperialist war grows daily." What power of thought! Known to everybody? Unfortunately, this is known only to a small percent of humanity, just as the newly-appeared leader of the Comintern does not know at all how the growth of the war danger proceeds in reality. It is absurd that it increases "daily" just as it is absurd that the masses go further to the Left daily. We have before us a dialectical process with temporary weakening of imperialist friction and their new growth. Molotov may have heard that even the development of the productive forces of capitalism, the most basic of all its processes, does not quite take place "daily" but through crises and rises, through periods of the drop of the productive forces, and even their mass destruction (during war). Along these lines develop also the political processes, but with still sharper convulsions.

In 1923 the reparation problem led to the occupation of the Ruhr. This was an outright staging of war on a small scale. But this scale appeared sufficient to create a revolutionary situation in Germany. The Comintern, directed by Zinoviev and Stalin, and the German Communist Party, led by Brandler, wrecked this exceptional opportunity. The year 1924, which brought the Dawes Plan, was a year of weakening of the revolutionary struggle in Germany and started the softening of contradictions between France and Germany. This is how the political prerequisites for economic stabilization were created. When we stated this aloud, or more correctly, when we predicted this development at the end of 1923, Molotov and the other wise ones, accusing us of liquidationism, immediately entered confidently into a period of revolutionary ascent.

The years of stabilization brought forth new contradictions and sharpened a series of old ones. The question of the revision of the Dawes plan rose in all its sharpness. Had France or Germany refuse to accept the Young Plan, Europe would have been confronted today with a repetition of the Ruhr occupation, but on a far wider scale, with the consequences following from it. But precisely this is lacking. All the participants in the game considered it wiser at the present moment to come to an agreement, and instead of a second Ruhr occupation, we see a cleaning up of the Ruhr district. Ignorance is characterized by the mixing up of things, knowledge though begins with their differentiation. Marxism has never indulged in ignorance.

But must there not, exclaims our strategist, "as a result of the execution of the Young reparation plan," necessarily come a further sharpening of contradictions? Necessarily come! But—as a result. It is necessary to understand the succession of events and the dialectics of their alternation. As a result of high capitalist conjuncture there inevitably comes a depression and sometimes a crisis. But from this it does not follow that a high conjuncture is as strong as a low one, and that a crisis "grows daily". "As a result" of his life a human being follows his ancestors, but from this it does not flow that a man does not go through the periods of infancy, growth, illness, maturity and old age, before he reaches the gates of death. Ignorance is characterized by the mixing up of things. The apple of wisdom teaches to distinguish them. But Molotov never had a bite of that fruit.

The sorry schematism of the present leaders is not altogether innocent; on the contrary, it practically strikes the revolution at every step. The Soviet-Chinese conflict created an urgent necessity for the mobilization of the masses against the war danger and for the defense of the Soviet Union. There is no doubt that on this road the Communist parties, even under the present conditions, could have attained considerable successes. For this it was necessary that in the propaganda the tremendous fact should speak for itself. But as if out of

LETTER FROM MOSCOW

: How Stalin Murdered Blumkin :

RADEK'S JUDAS
ROLE

Beyond doubt it is known that comrade Blumkin has been shot and that this was done at the personal instigation of Stalin. This vile act of vengeance is already arousing large sections in the Party. But this goes on in secret. One of the sources of these rumors is Radek. His nervous prattling is well known. Now he is completely demoralized, a characteristic of all capitulators. With I. N. Smirnov this takes the form of utter dejection; Radek, on the other hand, seeks to avoid this by spreading rumors and gossip, whose purpose is to prove the profound sincerity of his "repentance". Yaroslavsky beyond doubt makes use of this trait of Radek to set into circulation any necessary stories. It is of value to point out all this in order to make clear the following.

This version, attributed to Radek, is being circulated: When Blumkin arrived in Moscow, his first act was to hunt up Radek, with whom he had more contact during the past few years than with the other comrades, and whom he looked upon as a leader of the Opposition. Blumkin wished to be informed and to see clearly and in particular to understand the reasons for Radek's capitulation. He could not yet bring himself to the realization that in Radek the Opposition already had an implacable foe, who, having lost the last vestige of moral balance, did not stop at any abomination. One must take into consideration, on the one hand, as a characteristic trait of Blumkin the tendency of moral idealization of individuals, and on the other hand, the intimate nature of his former relations with Radek.

Blumkin told Radek of the thoughts and plans of L. D. (Trotsky) concerning the necessity for a secret struggle for their ideas. In reply, Radek, according to his own words, demanded of Blumkin that he immediately appear before the G. P. U. and tell everything. Several comrades say that Radek threatened Blumkin with immediate denunciation if he did not do this. This is quite likely, considering the actual statements of this hysterical mass of putty.

We do not doubt that this actually occurred. Following this, according to the official version, Blumkin "repented", presented himself to the G. P. U. and turned over the letter of comrade Trotsky which he had upon his person. Not only that, he even demanded his own shooting (literally). Following this, Stalin had to take his demand into consideration and ordered Menzinsky and Iagoda to shoot Blumkin. Evidently Stalin had previously had this decision confirmed by the Political Bureau in order that the Right capitulators be linked up with the affair. It is needless to say that the latter were completely in accord with Stalin.

How is this official version to be taken? Its lying character strikes one. We are not in possession of authentic information since Blumkin, as far as we know at present had not time to inform those outside (the prison) as to the actual state of affairs. But the actual course of events unfolds with sufficient clarity throughout this situation—at least in its general aspects. After his conversation with Radek, Blumkin found himself betrayed. Nothing was left for him except to present himself to the G. P. U., especially since the letter of L. D., from the nature of its contents could not but be an absolute refutation of all the slanders which are being propagated in order to justify the expulsion. Were there any addresses of individuals in the letter?

*The letter contained no addresses and could harm no one. Its text was but a short review of the situation in the foreign Opposition and an expression of solidarity with the Russian comrades who were demanding a complete break with Urbahns. The letter at the same time stressed the necessity for energetic measures for the widespread distribution of the Bulletin of the Opposition in Russia. Under the circumstances described by our correspondent, this letter, in the hands of Blumkin, could not but prove that it contained no element of "military conspiracy." This fact explains clearly Blumkin's decision to turn over the letter—after he found it unavoidable anyhow, because of Radek—to the G. P. U. (Note of the Bulletin.)

According to positive information which we possess no comrade to whom Blumkin should have turned over the letter has been annoyed (Note of the Bulletin).

We believe not, since no comrades whom Blumkin could have made use of in establishing contacts have been "annoyed".*

Did Blumkin capitulate? If he had indeed capitulated, that is, adopted Radek's stand, he could not but have divulged the names of the comrades for whom Trotsky's letter had been destined. I myself would not have been spared. And yet I repeat: no one was arrested. Besides, if comrade Blumkin had capitulated, the G. P. U. would not have been forced to satisfy his "demand" that he be shot, but would have used him for other purposes, this being indeed an exceptional opportunity. Beyond doubt the G. P. U. actually attempted this, but ran into the stone wall of Blumkin's obdurance. Then Stalin ordered him to be shot. And when alarming mutterings began to reverberate in the Party, Yaroslavsky, through Radek, set into motion the version which we have reproduced above. It is in this light that we picture this affair to ourselves.

Stalin could not fail to understand that the murder of Blumkin would not pass unnoticed within the Party, and that this would definitely result in great injury to "the brutal and disloyal" (Lenin's characterization of Stalin—Ed.) usurper. But his thirst for vengeance carried him away. On this point, a story has long been in circulation in the Party that in 1923, on a summer evening, at Zoubalova (in the suburbs of Moscow), Stalin confided to Dzerzhinsky and Kamenef: "To choose a sacrifice to carefully prepare the blow to pitilessly avenge one's self—and then to go to bed, what could be sweeter in life?" Bucharin has referred to this conversation (the Stalinist philosophy on sweet vengeance) in his discourse concerning the struggle with the Stalinists, this having appeared last year. The books of L. D. (Trotsky) his articles, his autobiography are appearing abroad. This must be avenged. Stalin arrested, without cause, the daughter of L. D., but since she was seriously ill (having need of a pneumothorax), the Political Bureau did not dare, (despite Stalin's insistence, it is said) to keep her in prison, especially since Trotsky's second daughter died of tuberculosis a year and a half ago under similar circumstances. He confined himself to exiling Trotsky's son-in-law, Platon Volkov, two months ago. M. Nevelson, the husband of Trotsky's dead daughter, has long been in prison. But this vengeance is too ordinary and consequently inadequate. The need for pitiless vengeance—aided by Radek—fell upon Blumkin. Stalin ordered him to be shot and after...he went to bed.

N.

The Russian Opposition Knows Its Path!

NOTE BY THE EDITORIAL BOARD OF THE BULLETIN OF THE RUSSIAN OPPOSITION

Although the above letter from Moscow does not yet give a complete picture of the arrest and murder of Blumkin, it nevertheless sufficiently clarifies the most important point of this tragedy. The immediate cause for the loss of this revolutionary, so unusual in his devotion and his courage, evidently lies in two facts: in his own idealistic confidence towards men and in the complete decline of the man to whom he turned. It is also possible that Radek himself has not sufficiently appreciated the consequences of his own actions because in his turn he idealized...Stalin.

The personal fate of Radek reveals with a final clearness the pitiful fate of the capitulators. Their first stage: "Centrism is not quite so bad as we thought." The second stage: "We must come closer to the Centrists so as to help them in their struggle against the Right wing." The third stage: "The Centrists must be paid to struggle against the Right by recognizing the correctness of Centrism." And finally the last stages: The capitulators turn the Oppositionist Bolshevik over into the hands of the G. P. U. dooming him to extermination.

And I. N. Smirnov? And Preobrazhensky? Their personal role in the tragedy of Blumkin is not known to us. But is it possible that Radek did not confer with them on the attitude to take in this delicate affair? In the final analysis, it is not important. Before the party and the international proletariat, they have assumed responsibility for all the ignominies of the Stalinist bureaucracy. Consequently, they cannot disavow them in this case.

Now, on the other aspect of the question: the murder of Blumkin took place following appreciable time after the sending of the Declaration by Rakovsky, Okudjava and Kossior. The bourgeois and social democratic press has tried, as is known, to present this declaration as a capitulation, that is, as our refusal to defend our ideas in order to gain the good wishes of the apparatus. The contemptible sheet of the Russian Mensheviks naturally also wrote in this spirit. An insignificant employee of the same camp, a certain Rosenfeld, announced through Populaire the French petty bourgeoisie that the former Red ambassador Rakovsky renounced his ideas in order to win back some important post. All this human vermin judges revolutionaries by its own standards.

But it is really shameful to recall that in the ranks of the Opposition there were elements, or at least such as counted themselves with us, who found nothing better to do than to estimate the Declaration of the Russian Opposition in the same spirit, that is, as a step towards political capitulation. Naturally Urbahns, who does not let a single occasion pass by without compromising the Leninism, raised the first accusing voice against the real revolutionaries, after he had for months reprinted without comment the shameful articles of the capitulators (Radek, Smilga, Preobrazhensky).

So that there shall be nothing missing from this picture, there comes forward an old wound-bedecked warrior—Maurice Paz—in the role of a Cato of the revolution. There exists a species of Communist dilettantes who prowl around the pyre of the revolution, but who are primarily preoccupied in not burning their fingers there. A part of the "Communists" of this species adhered in its time to the Opposition in the hope that that liberated them from party discipline, that it would bring them high renown without imposing any sacrifices upon them. And such parlor "revolutionaries" would give lessons in firmness to Rakovsky, Sosnovsky, Muralov, Kate Zinzadze, Okudjava, V. Kasparova, B. Mdivani and many others who have behind them decades of revolutionary struggles, prison, underground work, deportation, and who are showing their fidelity to the proletariat, today also, in the Altai mountains, in the prisons of Cheliabinsk and Tobolsk, and not in the halls of the Paris court house.

Blumkin was killed because he was bound to the cause of the Russian Opposition, of those who signed the declaration of Rakovsky. And these austere denouncers—it must also be said loudly—have not even raised a finger to help the Russian Oppositionists who are imprisoned or deported. On the contrary, in the person of Urbahns they have done everything to render this aid impossible.

The revolutionary detachment of the Bolshevik-Leninists has no needs of false friends, and still less of traitors. There are still many difficulties and tests before us.

"Rather less, but better." From a tiny group we have already twice in the past (1905 and 1917) became the decisive historical force. We are not tired. We know our path. Forward!

Daily Worker and

sealed the fact. He has been shot by Stalin now—in the dark of the moon and far from the eyes of the working class—simply for belonging to the Opposition. Under Lenin an honest revolutionary foe, taken with arms in hands in an insurrection against the Soviet power, was released. Under Stalin, a devoted Bolshevik who opposed him is secretly assassinated for retaining his views.

Messrs. Foster and Co., answer: Why has Stalin done this?

The Daily Worker has not yet replied. It has sought to drown our demand in a flood of vituperation and calumny. It has declared we are in one counter-revolutionary camp with the pope, with Norman Thomas, with the French reaction, with Ortiz Rubio and the rest. It says that we have raised the old war-cry of the reaction against the Soviets. "The only change it has undergone since the days of 1917," writes the Daily Worker, "is that 'Lenin the murderer' has now been changed to 'Stalin the murderer'."

Not at all, gentlemen. Lenin took a few hundred depraved and corrupted aristocrats and bourgeois who had lived on the flesh and blood of the Russian workers and peasants and were seeking to drown the revolution in a sanguinary sea, and stood them against the wall to be shot. The proletarian revolution is not a plaything. But Stalin has taken a revolutionist, a Bolshevik, a man whose loyalty and devotion Stalin will never see reflected in his mirror, and murdered him in the darkness. Lenin was the instrument of the proletarian revolution against the class enemy. Stalin is the instrument of the Thermidorian elements against the proletarian vanguard. That is the difference.

The Daily Worker speaks of the "defense of the Soviet Union". But it is Stalin and his paid press that weaken the defense of the Soviet Republic by assassinating its most faithful guardians. The corpse of Blumkin is a hostage offered by Stalin to the pope, to Briand, to Rubio, to reaction.

Therefore again we demand of Foster and the other leaders of the American Communist Party: Do you assume responsibility for the reactionary blow that Stalin has dealt the party? Why?

The Communist workers still await a reply and they have a right to know.

Ludlow Killer Rewarded

DENVER—Sixteen years after he had charge of the burning to death of 12 little children and two mothers at the Ludlow Massacre, the notorious "Pat" Hamrock has just been sent to the state penitentiary. Not, however, to await the trip to the gallows as one would naturally expect after such a ghastly orgy of killing, but to have complete charge of the "inside" of the prison as "military dictator".

Colorado had the worst prison mutiny in American history on Oct. 3, when eight guards and five convicts were killed. Since that time there has been an almost continuous series of petty mutinies, one getting so serious that a prison building was set on fire. In a panic the Board of Corrections in charge of the prison, turned to Colorado's most expert killer to set up a dictatorship. Hamrock has called his old lieutenant, Lewis N. Scerf, who was in charge on the two killings in the 1927 coal strike to be his chief aid.

Colorado organized labor lodged a strong objection with the governor, demanding that he immediately file charges against the Board of Corrections before the Civil Service Commission.

Hamrock answered the labor recital of his record with the statement that he would repeat the Ludlow massacre "if it were necessary". He has never shown any remorse or regret for the burnings and his whole record would lead one to believe his statement that he would gladly repeat the holocaust.

Billions Made by Big Industrialists

Thirty-eight leading industrial corporations each paid out in 1929 over $10,000,000 in cash dividends on common stock. Reports of many other large corporations are yet to be published, but profits already announced are flaunted in the face of unemployed workers and of other workers whose wages have recently been cut.

General Motors Heads Lists

General Motors Corp. in 1929, as usual in recent years, heads the list of cash dividend payers. Over $155,000,000 was distributed during the year to holders of its common stock. Second on the list comes American Telephone and Telegraph Co. paying to common shareholder approximately $116,000,000, an increase of $13,000,000 over the previous year. U. S. Steel Corp. stands third, paying over $63,000,000, an increase of more than 26% as compared with 1928.

DuPont, the fourth company on the list paying more than $50,000,000, distributed over $60,100,000 in common dividends. Thus the leading four include the largest automobile company, the largest public utility, the largest steel corporation, and the largest chemical and explosives manufacturer. Oil is not one of the leading four only because the Standard Oil interests are broken into separate units. But together the biggest four Standard Oil companies paid close to $150,000,000 in common dividends.

F. W. Woolworth Co., paying its workers from $10 to $15 a week, paid its common stockholders $23,400,000 in cash.

Enormous Profits Continue

Common stock cash dividends of the 19 industrial companies whose payments in 1929 exceeded $20,000,000 were as follows:

General Motors	$155,000,000	$163,300,002
Amer. Telephone	116,000,000	103,821,440
U. S. Steel	63,096,801	49,813,645
Du Pont	60,163,216	49,655,669
Standard Oil, N.J.	46,738,063	36,583,117
Kennecott Copper	43,936,353	32,909,565
Gen'l Elec.	43,268,504	42,265,656
Anaconda Copper	42,753,253	14,419,034
Standard Oil, Ind.	40,040,133	32,416,528
Consolidated Gas	34,867,361	23,978,135
Standard Oil, Cal.	32,500,000	37,728,294
Standard Oil, N.Y.	28,600,000	27,580,290
Tex. Corp.	28,500,000	24,306,712
Eastman Kodak	26,000,000	16,452,300
Reynolds Tobacco	25,500,000	26,000,000
Woolworth	23,400,000	19,500,000
Amer. Tobacco	21,091,512	15,623,172
U. Gas Imp'v'm't.	21,000,000	19,788,907
Union Carbide	20,606,859	16,235,208

The other 19 companies paying a paltry $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 in common dividends include Sears Roebuck, Steel Union Oil, Morgan's new Standard Brands, three other motor companies, Bethlehem Steel, United Fruit, and Westinghouse Electric.

Dividends on common stock are not the whole story of returns to investors. Most of these corporations have also made large payments to bondholders and to owners of preferred stock. Part of their net profits they keep in the treasury to increase the corporation's undivided surplus.

THE SITUATION IN THE MINING INDUSTRY

The next issue of the Militant will contain a statement by the National Committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition) on the situation in the mining industry. It will deal particularly with the recent call for an anti-Lewis international convention issued by Harry Fishwick, Alexander Howat, John Brophy, John Walker and others; the recent strike of the National Miners Union in Illinois; the coming convention of the N. M. U. in Pittsburgh, and the tasks of the Left wing in the industry.

TYPOS DEFEAT SALARY BOOST

INDIANAPOLIS—Again the membership of the Intl. Typographical Union has decided by referendum that $5,000 a year is plenty for its chief officials. Convention action to raise the ante 50% was vetoed by 26,794 against the increase of 22,882 votes in favor.

GAIN 40-HOUR NIGHT WEEK

MT. MORRIS, Ill.—(FP)—Union printers of Mt. Morris, where hundreds of magazines are printed by Kable Bros., have gained the 40-hour week for the night shift. Wage increases include 11 cents an hour nights and 7 cents an hour days.

"The Greatest Disciple of Lenin"

"Comrade Stalin never deviated a hair, comrade Stalin fought side by side with Lenin in October" Daily Worker, 1-18-30). When Stalin made a united front with the Chinese militarists against the Chinese workers, he never deviated a hair. When Stalin was in favor of continuing relations with the traitors of the British general strike, he never deviated a hair. When comrade Stalin was in favor of a coalition with the Mensheviks in 1917, he never deviated a hair. When Stalin supported the Right wing in the Comintern and when he split every Communist party into three groups, he never deviated a hair.

"It is true," says John Reed in Ten Days that Shook the World (pages 123-124) "that the Petrograd Soviet had not ordered a demonstration but the Central Committee of the Bolshevik Party was considering the question of insurrection. All night long, the 23rd they met. There were present all the Party intellectuals (the leaders) and delegates of the Petrograd workers and the garrison. Alone of the intellectuals, Lenin and Trotsky stood for insurrection. Even the military men opposed it. A vote was taken; insurrection was defeated. Then arose a rough workman, his face convulsed with rage, 'I speak for the Petrograd proletariat,' he said harshly. 'We are in favor of insurrection. Have it your own way, but I tell you now that if you allow the Soviets to be destroyed, we're through with you.' Some soldiers joined him—and after that voted again—insurrection won." (Stalin side by side with Lenin in October.)

"The Congress was to meet at one o'clock and long since the great meeting hall had filled, but by seven there was yet no sign of the Praesidium. The Bolshevik and Left Social Revolutionary factions were in session in their own rooms. All the life-long afternoon Lenin and Trotsky had fought against compromise. A considerable part of the Bolsheviks were in favor of giving way so far as to create a joint All-Socialist government. 'We can't hold on,' they cried, 'too much is against us; we haven't the men; we will be isolated, and the whole thing will fall.' (Thus Kameneff, Rykov and others.) But Lenin, with Trotsky beside him, stood firm as a rock. 'Let the compromisers accept our program and they can come in. We won't give way an inch. If there are comrades here who haven't the courage and the will to dare what we dare, let them leave with the rest of the cowards and conciliators. Backed by the workers and soldiers, we shall go on.' (So, Stalin, side by side with Lenin in October?)

What my eyes hear and what my ears see; laugh, world, laugh with Stalin's bureaucracy.

St. Louis Fakers Try Militant Painter

ST. LOUIS—Efforts are being made by the labor fakers in the St. Louis Painters Union to expel Elmer McMillen, leading militant and Left wing worker in this town, from the Painter's organization. He is about to stand trial on trumped-up charges preferred by the officials. These do not like the contrast of their do-nothing attitude with McMillen's activity in organizing the unorganized workers, leading the recent unemployed demonstration in a demand for work or compensation, and his steady efforts on behalf of the rank and file. The members are strongly sympathetic to McMillen. The outcome of the trial has not yet been made known.

spite, the far-Eastern conflict broke out in the very heat of the preparations for the First of August. The official agitators and journalists yelled about war in general and danger in general so furiously and continuously, that the real international conflict was drowned in the cries finding only a weak approach to the consciousness of the masses. Just so in the present policy of the Comintern do the lean kine of bureaucratic schemas swallow the fat kine of live reality.

In connection with the question of the struggle against the war danger, it is again necessary to observe the strategy of the "second period": as one of the main reasons in favor of the bloc with the General Council was put forth the necessity of a common struggle against the war danger. At the July Plenum of the Central Committee in 1927 Stalin swore that a bloc with the General Council was fully justified by the fact that the English trade unions were helping us conduct a struggle against British imperialism, and therefore a demand to break with the strike-breakers could come only from those people who haven't the defense of the Soviet Union at heart. Thus not only the Leftward swing of the English workers but also the war danger during 1926-27 served as the main arguments in favor of a bloc with the reformists. Now it appears that both the radicalization of the masses and the approaching war danger demand a decisive refusal of any kind of agreements with them. All the questions are put so as to confuse the advanced workers as much as possible.

There is no doubt, that in case of war or even an actual and clear approach of one, the reformists will be completely with the bourgeoisie. An agreement with them for a struggle against war is just as impossible as a bloc to carry out the proletarian revolution. Precisely for this reason, to imagine the Anglo-Russian Committee as a weapon of struggle against imperialism, as Stalin did, meant to deceive the workers criminally. But matters are such that history knows not only wars and revolutions but also periods between wars and revolutions, that is, periods when the bourgeoisie makes preparations for war, and the proletariat—for revolution. We live at present in precisely such a period. We must win away the masses from the reformists, who gained strength in recent years and did not weaken. By their strengthening, however, they put themselves into a greater dependence upon the evolution of their proletarian base. It is upon this dependence that the tactic of the united front is fully based. Only it is necessary to carry it out, not according to Zinoviev and not according to Brandler, not according to Stalin and not according to Bucharin. It is necessary in this question to return to Lenin.

Groupings in Communism

The Left Opposition, which has not joined in with the catechism of the "Third Period", will once more be accused of a Right deviation by skirmishers like Monmousseau. After the experience of the last six years, we can look calmly at this accusation. Already at the Third Congress of the Comintern, many of the gentlemen who later went over to the social-democracy or remained temporarily at the Brandler stage, accused us together with Lenin of a Right deviation. It is sufficient to recall that at the period of the Fifth Congress, Louis Sellier was one of the main accusers of "Trotskyism".

There is no doubt, however, that the Right elements will actually attempt to make use of some elements of our criticism. This is absolutely unavoidable. It is not necessary to think that all the accusations of the Rights are wrong. Quite often the Rights have a basis for their criticism of the goat-leaps of Left opportunism. Within these limits they are quite inclined to use a Marxist criticism, so as to counterpose under its cover opportunism to adventurism.

It must be added, however, that in the ranks of that Opposition, which quite justly considers itself the Left, were until recently the remnants of such elements as joined us in 1924, not because we defended an international revolutionary position, but because we fought against Zinovievist adventurism. Many potential opportunists, at that period in France adopted the protective coloring of the Russian Opposition. Some of them paraded even until very recently with the fact that they agreed with us without any reservations ("Sans reserves"). But when the real question of the struggle for the views of the Opposition came to the forefront, it was revealed that between these parlor Oppositionists and us there is an abyss. They deny the presence of a revolutionary situation all the more since they do not feel the slightest need for it.

Many good souls were sincerely worried by the fact that we unceasingly drove a wedge between the Left Opposition and the Right. Our classification of the three

MACHINIST UNEMPLOYMENT WORST SINCE 1921

WASHINGTON—Reports made by locals in 55 American cities to the Washington headquarters of the International Association of Machinists, each week, show that the present crisis in unemployment in this skilled metal trade is the worst since 1921.

Most of these reports show 20 to 100 union members unemployed, and trade "bad" or "poor" or "very dull". The depression began last August and has grown steadily more serious. Many veteran workers still in the prime of life, who have kept at work through all the previous periods of unemployment, have now been without work for six months.

60,000 Unemployed in K. C.

KANSAS CITY, Mo.—The unemployment situation in Kansas City is very serious. There are at least 60,000 out of work. Less than 35% of the union men are working. About two weeks ago the city hired some men to shovel snow, with the weather 10 to 15 below zero. Many of the men were so weak that they could not work until they were fed.

RAIL WORKERS DISCUSS MERGERS

MINNEAPOLIS—Railroad workers when they gather in the yardhouses and other railroad hangouts, find proposed consolidation of the roads an absorbing topic of conversation. Some railroad leaders, with ears to the ground, have taken up the 6-hour day movement. Others will be surprised when they find their members forming Left wing groups.

basic currents in present-day Communism was called arbitrary and they affirmed that for France such a classification is not real because of the absence of a Right wing. The facts of the last months however gave life and blood to the international "schema" also in France. The "Syndicalist League" decisively raised the banner of struggle against Communism finding in this a common ground with the trade union opposition of the second order. Simultaneously the more reformist elements split away from the Party. They utilized the struggle against bureaucratic adventurism, and under the guise of a new party are attempting to preserve their mandates. Immediately, by the power of political relationship, the Right trade union opposition appeared connected with the new parliamentary-municipal "party". Thus gradually everything finds its place. And in this we think the service of La Verite was very considerable.

A straight line is determined by two points. For the determination of a curve it is necessary to have not less than three. The lines of politics are very complicated and curved. In order to evaluate correctly the different groupings, it is necessary to take their behavior for several stages: at the moments of revolutionary rise and at the moment of ebb. To draw a correct revolutionary orbit of the Left Communist opposition is possible only if we put down on paper a series of critical periods: the relationship to the German events of 1923; the question of stabilization in 1924; the relation to industrialization and the Kulak in the U. S. S. R. in 1923-1928; the question of the Kuomintang and the Anglo-Russian Committee; the relation to the Canton uprising, the evaluation of the theory and practice of the "Third Period", etc. Each of these questions by itself includes a whole group of tactical tasks. Out of the complicated system of ideas and slogans the apparatus marauders tear single phrases and construct on them the idea of an approach between the Left and Right. Marxists take the problem as a whole, carrying the unity of strategic thought throughout different circumstances. This method does not give instantaneous results but it is the only reliable method. Let the spoilers despoil. We will prepare tomorrow's day. Prinkipo, January 8, 1930.

*By the way, in creating a "workers and peasants" instead of a proletarian party Louis Sellier and company have given life in the West to the gifted formula of Stalin intended for the East.

The Murder of Blumkinis An Act Against the Russian Revolution

The cold-blooded and cynically calculated murder of the Bolshevik, Blumkin, by Stalin for his adherence to the ideals of the Left Opposition is bringing in its wake swift revulsion against these latest methods of the Stalinist bureaucracy toward the Leninist Bolsheviks in the U. S. R. The worker-Communists and the proletarian forces throughout the world are putting the question: Why the imprisonment, exile and now shooting of the Left Oppositionists? What is behind it all? Stalin and his bureaucrats, in firm unity for years with the Bucharin-Rykov Right wing, carried out a program that was swiftly giving renewed life and strength to the Nepmen and Kulaks in the Soviet Union. They were thereby earning the gratitude of the bourgeoisie throughout the world. The expulsions and persecutions in the most vicious forms of the Opposition led by L. D. Trotsky went on simultaneously. But the Opposition, firmly rooted in the working masses of the Communist Party and the country continued to stand by their platform; for an industrialization tion has been proved correct on every major issue before the C. P. S. U. and the Communist International. What cynicism, what brutality and coarseness, what disregard of the interests of the proletariat of the Russian October, mark this Stalin and his conscienceless chnovniks, the Molotovs, Thaelmanns, Fosters, Minors, Cachins! With one hand they wave the red flag of the revolutionary proletariat and with the other they persecute and even shoot the best fighters of October and the international revolution. The proletariat, the Communist workers demand an answer!

Stalinists Politically and Morally Bankrupt
The acts of Stalin against the Opposition, now culminating in the murder of the noble fighter for the Revolution, Blumkin, are acts against the fundamental interests of the Revolution. Stalin performs the work of an anti-Bolshevik when he decimates the ranks of the Communist movement. In far-off China, the Stalinist followers shot at a leader of the Chinese Opposition. In the United States the Pos-

Build A Broad Movement To Aid The Unemployed

Through out the United States millions of unemployed workers, their ranks increased by tens of thousands in recent weeks, face a future of increased misery, degradation, poverty and starvation. U. S. capitalism offers fine words to the unemployed but no work or compensation. In November 1929, immediately after the Wall Street crash, President Hoover called a conference of millionaire bankers, industrialists and manufacturers at Washington to map out a vast industrial and building program that would "normalize" business again and provide employment for the mass of unemployed workers. That conference has resulted for the workers in exactly—nothing.

Leading capitalist and governmental officials are now less sanguine about the prospects for a swift and huge economic revival. Lieutenant-Governor Lehmann of the State of New York, in which unemployment is greater than in any other section of the country, states: "We are not going to return to normalcy overnight. There never was a chance of that, in spite of over-optimistic predictions."

The gravity of the situation, the misery rampant throughout the country, rise everywhere to confound with stark facts the Hooverian sooth-sayers. The capitalists and their hired scribblers and mind-befogging professors find themselves unable to put forward any capitalist remedies that can relieve the acute conditions of existence and starvation that affect the lives of millions of working people. On an international scale, in fact, the deadly pall of unemployment hangs over tens of millions of workers and their families. Their need is, in short, bread. They are ready to work to get it. If they cannot get work, the demand for compensation, for wages must be made upon industry and the government, local, state and national.

Organize Unemployed on Elementary Issues

Under the conditions it is possible to develop a broad movement on behalf of the unemployed masses, as has been previously shown by the Militant. This can be done if the class conscious workers, the revolutionaries and particularly the Communists, use correct tactics; that the broadest conceivable movement is sought and worked for; that simple elementary demands, such as, Work or Compensation from industry and the government of the bosses, are put in the forefront. Mere noise and bombast and demonstrations (here today and gone tomorrow) will not serve the purpose. Sectarian, narrow movements, in which the main object of the leaders is only to express their particular views, and who regard the workers involved, but as objects of agitation, will also not get anybody very far, and least of all the unemployed worker who is looking for a job, food, clothing and shelter.

The participation of workers in such movements of struggle, however, serves as an excellent preparatory school in the class war. Such movements teach the workers the nature of class society, the role of the governing classes, and certainly aid the development of the workers towards a class conscious ideology and action. This is the objective to be sought. But such conferences of the unemployed as the one called and held by the Trade Union Unity League of New York City, on Wednesday February 19th, at the Manhattan Lyceum will end only in a swamp, and bring about no bonafide organization of the unemployed workers to make effective their demands upon the bosses and the state.

New York T. U. U. L. Conference a Talkfest

The T. U. U. L. nationally, as the trade union instrument of the Communist Party in the United States, has set a task to organize the unemployed of this country, which is to culminate in an international demonstration on March 6th against the scourge of unemployment in all capitalist countries. The New York Conference of the T. U. U. L. therefore serves as a picture of what is undoubtedly being duplicated in other cities where it has or is calling similar conferences.

At the New York Conference, 300 people representing, according to the chairman, Sadie Van Veen, 12 unemployed councils, left wing unions, T. U. U. L. groups, workmen's circles, working class housewives, etc. were present. The chairman, Van Veen, was not elected, she just served and opened the meeting with a speech of some 30 minutes length. In the course of her remarks, she stated: "There is no trade union movement outside the T. U. U. L." Such profound notions may or may not be the main problem to discuss at conferences called to organize and aid the unemployed; or they may also help to make clear why the Trade Union Unity League is virtually nonexistent.

Called upon to speak, all C. P. or Y. C. L. members, were a Negro comrade, Alexander; a Pioneer speaker, a youth organizer of the T. U. U. L.; a speaker of the Communist Party, Darcy; a Needle Trades Industrial Union speaker. No remarks from the delegates were invited. None of the speeches advanced concrete tasks for immediate solution and action. All truthfully assailed capitalism as the cause of unemployment; all called for the overthrow of capitalism and for the establishment of workers' rule.

TROTSKY ON STALIN AND BLUMKIN

"Blumkin did visit me at Constantinople..."

"I told him among other things, that my exile as well as the imprisonment of other comrades did not change our fundamental line; that in the moment of danger the Oppositionists would be in the most advanced posts; that in the difficult hours Stalin would be forced to call upon them, even as Tseretelli appealed to the Bolsheviks for aid against Kornilov..."

"...The Stalinist repression against us does not yet signify a change in the class character of the State, but only prepares and makes more easy that change; our course remains, as in the past, that of reform and not that of revolution; the implacable struggle for our ideas must be based on the perspective of a long delay."

—Excerpt from a letter of comrade Leon Trotsky of January 5th, 1930 at Prinkipo, Turkey.

program for the Soviet Union, presenting their projects in 1927 in the form of a 5 Year Plan; for the policy of collective and Soviet Farms and against the encroachments of the Kulak; against the growing bureaucracy in the Party, the Soviet Union and the trade unions; and many other principle and tactical issues.

Opposition Pressure Forces Stalin to the Left

Under the pressure of the Opposition, the Stalin Centrists have been compelled to swing back from a Right course toward the Left, and piece-meal to adopt the Platform of the Opposition. The Militant has made and will make further evaluations of this latest Stalinist zig-zag, the so-called Left turn. But we put here the question: How does one carry out a Left course genuinely and at one and same time expel, imprison, exile and murder the Left Opposition? Why this fury? The Opposi-ter-Lovestone cliques adopted the methods of the underworld, of gangsterism, against the Communist Opposition. Why? We ask and will continue to demand adequate replies of the Stalinist regime for their defenseless acts against the Opposition, against the Revolution.

These brutal acts only show more conclusively the political and moral bankruptcy of Stalinist Centrism. It is the replacement of a political line with the bureaucratic power of a corrupt apparatus. The murder of Blumkin will but serve to consolidate more firmly than ever before the growing ranks of the Opposition. At the same time the murder will call forth the protest of the Communist and class-conscious workers throughout the world. Come what may, the Opposition knows its path and duty. The Opposition remain at their post and continue to serve the cause of Communism.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY MOCKED BY INCOME REPORT

WASHINGTON—Equality of human opportunity in the United States in these days of big-scale industry is mocked by the Internal Revenue Bureau's preliminary report of taxable income for 1928, which shows that 24 persons had private incomes amounting to $242,000,000. As these were the taxpayers in the class "above $5,000, 000", it is to be assumed that some of them, such as the Rockefellers and Fords and Mellons, must have had incomes of $30,000, 000 to $50,000,000 each. In the year 1927 only 11 persons admitted incomes above $5,000,000.

SNOW FAILS TO BRING JOBS TO JOBLESS
MINNEAPOLIS — (FP) — The hungry and jobless used to look to the skies for help. When snowflakes began falling, they reported to the snow removal bureaus and lined up for jobs.

This year snow means little to the unemployed. Tractors are being used with scrapers to collect the snow, and automatic hoists to lift it into the trucks.

Eighty per cent was the estimate of unemployment given by one building trades council representative. The Citizens Alliance admits that thousands have been laid off in the last two months, and that the end is not yet in sight.

40 Percent Jobless In Bay State

BOSTON—During January but 60% of the 260,000 workers who would be employed normally in 1,106 Massachusetts factories and mills were at work on full time schedule. Jobs, part time and full time, could be found for only 213,000 of the quarter million or more, states the Massachusetts labor department.

Employment declined 1% between December and January and average earnings sank from $24.16 a week to $24.08. An upturn in the shoe industry of 17% kept the average from sinking far lower. In 31 industries employment dropped below the December level. During the month seven factories went out of business, including three woolen mills and two shoe factories.

The state labor department has created a new index of employment, based on a figure of 100 for 1925-27. Employment in January was 82.9, according to this revised index, contrasted with 89.2 in January, 1929. Cotton goods showed 68.3, or a decline of one third in the number of jobs in four years. Other depressed industries are: Woolen, 67.5; textile machinery, 81.2; rubber goods, 72.2; hosiery, 76.2. Industries which have gained in employment are: bakery, 107; women's clothing, 102; printing and publishing, 109.

MASS. EMPLOYMENT CONTINUES DOWN

BOSTON—Employment fell off 4% in Massachusetts public utilities between December and January, reports the state labor department. Steam railroads, with a cut of 6.5%, accounted for 2,040 jobless men. Payrolls fell 3.4% and on the railroads alone, 5.7%.

TOO MANY LABOR OFFICIALS

As a preliminary and immediate step, and also an effective one, towards the reduction in the number of trade union bureaucrats, we should consider and spread the idea of reducing the number of useless offices and officials in our local unions, lodges and divisions.

To use the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers as an example: The local unions are called "Divisions" and have the following offices and officials which, in my opinion, are not only useless and unnecessary, but decidedly detrimental, namely: Chief Engineer, Second Engineer, Guide and Chaplain.

These officials render the Divisions no special service. Their part played in the useless ritualistic ceremony at the opening and closing of meetings has a most stultifying effect on the membership.

Breeding Bureaucracy

However, the most serious objection to having an organization honeycombed with useless officials is that it breeds bureaucracy and corruption in the union. The B. of L. E. furnishes a glaring example of this. In this case the local officials often become the tools of the Grand Officers in misleading and defrauding the membership. This was especially the case in my local Division 369 where the local officials became the active agents of the Grand Office in selling worthless stock, real estate and fake "Loyalty" Bonds to the members and to frame-up and to expel any member who objected to this wholesale robbery of the B. of L. E.

With the aid and support of the salaried General Officials, these local office holders form a combination or political machine to get themselves reelected year after year. This office-holding develops a craving for personal benefit at the expense of the rank and file, a desire to get on the payroll.

All the elected officials that are needed in a Division of the B. of L. E. are a Secretary-Treasurer, a Grievance man and a delegate to the National Convention. The Chairman (called the Chief Engineer) should be elected for each meeting. This would promote democracy and intelligence among the members. In Division 369 of the B. of L. E. the local bureaucrats headed by J. F. Collins, are running and controlling the Division as if it was their personal property. Through machine control and bull-doing tactics, the Chief Engineer and Secretary-Treasurer have had themselves reelected to office for the last quarter of a century. A lot of useless officials breed such conditions.

Prepare for Convention

The thing to do is for the local union (lodges or divisions) to introduce amendments at the forthcoming convention to eliminate all useless officials, big and small.

The labor constitutions should also be amended to provide for salaried officials to be automatically drafted back on the job after a certain number of terms in office. Trade unionists should discuss this and let themselves be heard also through the columns of the Militant.

C. R. HEDLUND

Long Hours in Steel Mills

Long hours are still the curse of the steel industry. The popular assumption that Pres. Harding induced the late Judge Gary, out of the goodness of his heart, to abolish the 12-hour day, and that therefore steel mills are now operating on the 8-hour shift, is knocked into a cocked hat by figures just released by the Federal Council of Churches, through its research department.

More than Half Work over 48 Hours

Actually but 46.6% of 250,000 steel workers covered by the report are working the 8-hour day. Nearly as high a percentage are working 10 hours while 6.7% are on the 12-hour schedule. More than a quarter of the steel workers studied are working 7 days a week, a half are on the 6-day basis and only 20% work five to five and one half days.

This by no means tells the story however. The figures for the 11 and 12-hour shifts and the 7-day week are minimum figures, the investigators reported, because plant managers often "color" their figures for the benefit of public opinion.

The New Bedford Textile Workers Unite to Aid Jobless and Stalinist "Politics"

The unemployment condition in New Bedford is becoming more acute daily. While half of the 30,000 textile workers were jobless several weeks ago, at present about 20,000 are unemployed. It is difficult to state accurately the exact amount of workers who are without work. Half of the mills are closed while many of the others are running only several days a week. Those that are closed include the Acushnet mill and the City Mill. The Dartmouth mill is running two days a week. According to old time textile workers the unemployment situation is worse than it has been in 15 years.

Taking advantage of the scarcity of work, the mill owners are reducing wages and installing methods to further speed up the workers. The workers resent these actions on the part of the employers and are talking of another general strike.

In fact, several weeks ago, when the mills in the South End cut wages of the weavers and added more looms they went on strike. The strike lasted for a few days but the weavers went back to work with the cut in pay and speed-up conditions. The National Textile Workers Union which was conducting the strike apparently was not prepared to lead the workers in a successful struggle.

The tasks that face the N. T. W. U. at present are of great importance to the future development of the union. The workers are in a mood for struggle and with proper leadership can be lead successfully in a strike that will organize the great bulk of the 30,000 textile workers. On the one hand, if the union does not live up to the expectations of the masses, the base that the N. T. W. U. has built will be smashed and the United Textile Workers Union headed by the notorious betrayer, William Batty, will again sell out the workers as it did in the 1928 strike.

When the strike was ended two years ago by the collaboration of the U. T. W. and the mill owners, the N. T. W. U. found themselves in a surprisingly strong position. Almost as many workers were organized in the left wing N. T. W. U. as in the U. T. W. organization. In fact, after the strike the N. T. W. U. continued to gain members at a pace even faster than the U. T. W.

Factionalism Hurts Development

In recent months, when a strong and united organization is more needed than in any time in the past, Communist Party disputes have stepped in to the disadvantage of the union. Within a period of several months the New Bedford Union has had four district organizers and one can never tell when the next change will be made. The same policy of manipulation that has become the vogue in the Communist Party and the Communist movement generally, is what the New Bedford workers are facing in the "third period".

When Eli Keller, who was the union organizer for more than two years, was made national secretary of the union, several months ago, Ellen Dawson was sent to New Bedford to replace him. When the Stalinist leadership discovered that she supported the Right wing Lovestone group, Dawson was quickly replaced by John Nahorsky, unknown to the textile workers of New Bedford. However, Nahorsky did not last long, for Martin Russak, a poet from Paterson, N. J., is now at the helm.

This kind of irresponsible faction politics is not the way to organize the workers and lead a successful strike in New Bedford. All forces who accept the Left wing program of the N.T.W.U. should be utilized to prepare the New Bedford workers for struggle. With the elimination of mechanical, strangulating control and the proper preparations, a strike larger and more important than that of 1928 can be started in New Bedford. The situation is ripe, but how will the Stalinists react to it?

The mass of the militant textile workers who are now members of the N. T. W. U. must demand that the political opinion of any worker shall not bar him or her from an active or leading role in the union. The N. T. W. U. is not the Communist Party and if it attempts to base its leadership upon the acceptance of Stalin's program of socialism in one country and national Communism, the future of the union is one of defeat. It must abandon its clique control and aim to develop a movement for a united struggle of the New Bedford workers with a leadership that can lead the workers successfully. Instead of devoting all their time to preparing for a strike against the mill owners, the party leadership in New Bedford is busy fighting Lovestone and Trotsky—and not the mill owners or A. F. of L. Such a policy is disastrous and must be opposed vigorously by the union members as well as all conscious Left wing and Communist forces.

A united struggle of the New Bedford workers against the mill owners and their wage cuts and speed up, and against their U. T. W. officialdom allies is on the order of the day.

An appeal must also be made to the U. T. W. rank and file to join in the struggle, shoulder to shoulder with the N. T. W. U. members in the common fight against wage cuts, speed up and unemployment. The future is bright for the New Bedford workers provided the Stalinists do not wreck the union to satisfy their petty factional aims.

FRANK BROMLEY

Conditions of Metal Scrappers

CHICAGO—On Lake between 1200 and 1900 West and on State Street from 1600 to 2400 South, there are whole strings of concerns making a specialty of gathering from everywhere old scraps of iron, machinery, autos, brass, copper, etc. of every description. Working conditions of those who labor for those concerns are indescribably bad. The hours are usually ten. Wages average 35 cents an hour. Most of the workers are Poles, Slavs and Negroes, that is of those who stay for any length of time at these places. Horses enjoy a lot better treatment than most of these workers.

Steady Work

The work is very hard. Much heavy wrought iron must be broken up with sledge hammers. We work up a heavy sweat on a tough job on bitter winter mornings. When we are done, then we have to keep on working outside, maybe on a lighter job, to cool off, and so fall an easy prey to colds and the "flu". Often we have to lift extremely heavy weights while the boss stands by and hollers "to give 'er the beef".

The bosses are nearly always the worst kind of slave drivers and seem to regard the workers as scarcely human. For anyone who makes the slightest protest against the intolerable conditions, means to be at once fired or laid off. The work in many places is not steady—maybe work for a few days, get laid off, and be told to return in a few days. There are so many unemployed here at all times, anxious for some kind of a job, that these concerns are never short of help.

Need Union

The workers need a union badly to speak for their interests and to fight against the merciless exploitation that exists now. I worked for the Monroe Iron and Machinery Company at 1322 W. Lake St. and know whereof I speak. This is one of the worst concerns, but they are all pretty much alike—rotten.

RANK AND FILE FOR LABOR PARTY

CINCINNATI—"In our opinion there is no issue before the labor movement today of greater importance than of strengthening its political power," declares the leading editorial in the Railway Clerk for February. "It is hard to escape the conviction that the nonpartisan policy does not appeal to the rank and file."

George Siskind, chairman of the New York T. U. U. L., was next called upon and read a lengthy resolution which demanded from the employers and government either Work or Wages, and then went on, in elaboration, with a long list of additional demands, among them, Defense of the Soviet Union, Against another Imperialist War, Down with the Hoover government and private property, Down with Child Labor, Join the Unemployed Councils, Free meals for children in the schools, Demonstrate on March 6th, Down with the A. F. of L., the Musteites, etc., etc.—all in the name of the Unemployed workers and their immediate problem of existence.

After Siskind's resolution there were more speeches. Finally he summarized the speeches and completed the report.

How Not to Aid the Unemployed

There was no report of any credentials committee. (The delegates from the New York Branch of the Communist League (Opposition), James Russell and Charles Curtiss had handed in credentials at the outset.) There were no elections of any kind of committees. No executive was elected to carry out further work; and considering the conduct of the disorganized mass meeting (which is the best that can be said for this T. U. U. L. "Unemployed Conference"), perhaps it was just as well. The majority of those present left long before the meeting adjourned at 12:30.

With such conferences little success can be expected, despite favorable objective factors at present, for the demonstration scheduled for March 6th. The bombast must be done away with if there is to be a serious movement. The slogan of unity of working class forces to work for a minimum program on behalf of the unemployed is an effective one. Other organizations, trade unions, fraternal organizations, etc. can still be appealed to. The United Front and its effectiveness as a rallying call for the rank and file workers of all shades of opinion are not out of date. The Communist Party, and the T. U. U. L. by themselves are insufficient to rally the unemployed and to lead them effectively. When other forces, even Communist elements with dissenting views, are rejected out of hand, the unemployed movement is doomed either to be cut to pieces or to be led into channels that make them easy victims of capitalist propaganda and of the labor fakers and reformists. The rank and file of the A.F. of L. who number hundred of thousands of the unemployed can be gotten into an unemployment movement if proper appeal for united action is made. Their officials are subject to pressure: their unwillingness to act even then can be the best means for the militants and left wingers to expose them in their real role of capitalist lackeys. But their "expose" merely by denunciation is not convincing to a rank and file. Failure to propose a united front to the organizations of the A. F. of L., Socialist Party, I. W. W. etc., on the burning question of unemployment only results, particularly under present conditions, in the isolation of the Communists from the masses and renders them ineffective in the existing and ensuing struggles.

Develop a United Front Movement

The Communist Party must change its course and adopt methods that have brought successes in the past to the Communist movement and given it influence over growing numbers of workers.

It is not yet too late, even for the immediate future of the movement to organize the unemployed into Unemployed Councils. Genuine proposals for a united front movement, in an endeavor to draw all workers together, should be made. March 6th can only be a fleeting and passing demonstration of the unemployed if the movement remains in narrow channels. This must not be so. The conditions for a broad movement remain. Such a broad movement, basing itself on simple and elementary needs of the unemployed, is needed to give an impetus to the organization of Unemployed Councils that can act in concert and make strong demands for work or compensation, for shorter hours, against the speed-up system, upon the capitalists and the government. The militants and revolutionary workers must lend themselves to the task.

The Mining Situation and the Tasks of the Left Wing

Statement of the National Committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition)

Three recent events have made it necessary to consider the situation in the mining industry and the tasks of the Left wing. They are: the heavy defeat suffered by the Left wing National Miners Union in the Illinois strike the call for an international anti-Lewis United Mine Workers convention, a call signed by the heads of the Illinois district together with John Brophy, Alexander Howat, August Dorchy, Dougherty, etc., etc.; and the call for a national convention of the National Miners Union itself.

None of the large trade unions in the country has been so heavily hit in the past five years as the United Mine Workers. The once powerful proletarian organization has been rent from stem to stern. One district after another has been mercilessly crushed by the Lewis machine controlling the union. Every progressive and Left wing member of the union has been subjected to the most brutal regime of expulsion and persecution, so that the backbone of the militant resistance to the ruinous course of the labor bureaucrats was broken. The vigorous offensive of the coal operators was countered by retreats all along the line, led by Lewis and Co. The extension of the industry into the non-union South—entirely unorganized to this day—was not followed at all by organizational action by the U. M. W. A. The union standards of the workers have been beaten down steadily by the operators who have had the scarcely concealed collaboration of the union officialdom; and aggravating this decline in living standards has been the festering sore of unemployment.

The coal operators have been gaining all along the line. They have not been met with any effective resistance. Working hand in hand with his capitalist employers, using the vilest methods of corruption, autocracy, black-jack rule, mass expulsions and the like, Lewis and his machine have bled the organization white. The U. M. W. of A. today has been stripped to the point where it exists—as a substantial organization—in only two districts: Illinois and the anthracite field. Under its present leadership it does not even make a pretense at fighting for the miners' interests. It keeps what is left in the union divided by sectional agreements; throttles all initiative; drives members out of the union with the poison gas of corruption and terrorism. Indeed, there is hardly another trade union in the country in which the complete bankruptcy and criminality of the leadership and collaborationist policies has been so conclusively demonstrated.

In the face of this utter bankruptcy of Lewisism and the repeatedly expressed opposition of the bulk of the miners to it (at conventions, in union elections) etc., and the excellent opportunities for progress thereby afforded the left wing movement, the latter has succeeded in making but little appreciable headway in the industry as a decisive organized force. On the contrary. The course it has pursued under the direction of the present Communist Party leadership has dealt it severe blows which, combined with the new developments in the situation, can prove fatal for its immediate future. To prevent such a development, the Left wing must soberly and objectively observe the newest events, absorb their significance and draw the proper conclusions. This has not yet been done.

1. The N. M. U. Strike in Illinois

The National Miners Union strike in Illinois bore most of the characteristic features of the present ruinous and adventurist course of the Party leadership which has been fastened to the new unions with a strangling grip. The strike was called with virtually no preparations made to carry it through successfully. The Belleville District conference, four weeks before the strike call was issued, was devoted mainly to a thoroughly framed-up polemic against the then national president of the union, John J. Watt, who disagreed with the Party policy of rigid, mechanical control. The strike was not mentioned there. The post conference attempts to discredit Watt among the miners, with the Party utilizing all the contemptible methods so common to the reactionary labor bureaucracy, only deepened the distrust and antagonism among the miners. Instead of consolidating and extending the front of the N. M. U., in preparation for the strike, the Party leadership created a situation which narrowed the union basis down to the smallest minimum. The whole campaign of the N. M. U. in Illinois at that time, was conducted under the banner of the slogan that the principal enemies of the miners against whom the strike was to be directed were not the coal operators but...the "Trotskyists, the I. W. W., the Socialist Party and the S. L. P."

Irresponsibility, bombast and claims based solely on wishes, predominance of narrow factional interest, playing with the interests of the class—these were the outstanding characteristics of the Party leadership of the strike. The sub-district conferences held a week before the strike call was issued by the District Board, did not have the strike on the agenda. The N. M. U. leaders did not even take the trouble of circulating a strike vote among the miners which would have helped to draw broad masses into the struggle. The essential basis of the strike forces was among the unemployed miners and not among those at work. No serious attempt was made to agitate among the members of the United Mine Workers to join the struggle, and everything was done to make collaboration with the members of the I. W. W. in the coal fields impossible. In fact, every element in the situation that did not declare in advance its entire agreement with the political line of the Communist Party was deliberately repulsed. The Party (i. e., the National Miners Union) organizers, and their press (the Daily Worker, etc.) devoted more time and energy to "com'batting Trotskyism" than to organizing the combat against the coal operators and their trade union agents.

In the face of such a course, it is natural that the strike should have had so calamitous and pitiful a conclusion. The wretched and cowardly attempts of the Party leadership now to unload the responsibility for their own criminal mismanagement on to the shoulders of the local leaders of the N. M. U., whom they directed at every step with the lash of ruthless discipline, is both revolting and characteristic of Stalinist "self-criticism". The warning of the Communist Opposition, the indications that preparations were lacking, the demand made upon the Party to organize the campaign against the operators instead of against Watt, Angelo and others—all these were unheeded. In the same way, the need for a considered analysis of the strike results is entirely neglected—even prohibited by the Party.

What is outstanding is the fact that the N. M. U. has been practically eliminated from the Illinois field as a decisive factor at the present time. Its opportunity for expansion—particularly in face of the scandalous Fishwick-Lewis fight for the spoils—was shamefully bungled. For this the responsibility rests exclusively and four-square on the shoulders of the Communist Party leaders. The present attempt to retrieve the heavy losses incurred in bungling a big situation by the organization of sporadic small local strikes in camps here and there is only adventurist desperation that must be condemned lest the N. M. U. is completely wiped out and the Left wing is retarded for a long period.

The Communist League reaffirms its position—contrary to that of the I. W. W.—of urging the Illinois miners to join in the strike. Whatever the errors of the leadership, however false the policies they pursue, it is the duty of the militant and class conscious workers and workers' organizations to give wholehearted support to every struggle of the workers, to seek to broaden and deepen its ranks, to clarify it in action and purpose.

As a final consequence of the Illinois strike is the foothold gained there for the first time in years by the I. W. W. Even as a passing phenomenon, it has an ominous and instructive significance. If syndicalism (that is, anti-political party; anti-political action; belief in the labor union as the all-sufficient instrument of the working class) is the punishment meted out to the revolutionary movement for the sins of party opportunism and vulgar parliamentarism, it is also one of the ways in which workers frequently repay the workers' political party for mismanagement and for dominating the trade union with the rigidity, bureaucratic arbitrariness, mechanical and formalistic transference of the party into the union which is typical of Stalinism. We warned about such an eventuality months ago in our comments on the Belleville Conference. The sudden spread of erroneous syndicalist conceptions among the Illinois miners may be put entirely at the door of the Party bureaucrats. To re-consolidate the prestige and strength of the Left wing and Communist movements that have been discredited by the methods of the official Party leaders, it will be necessary to approach these syndicalist workers as fighters with whom the closest collaboration must be established. The Party method of calumny and name-calling, instead of seeking to unite with them and discuss the problems and tasks of the movement with the aim of establishing clarity, must be repudiated as entirely false.

2. The Fishwick-Howat-Brophy Convention

The call for an international convention of the U. M. W. A., directed against Lewis and Co., and signed by the Fishwick machine men plus Brophy, Howat, and others, yesterday's allies of the Left wing and the Party, creates a new set of circumstances in the mining industry which can have far-reaching consequences for the Left wing if it proves capable of viewing the situation objectively and acting accordingly. This has also not yet been done by the Party or by the official Left wing which it controls. On the contrary, it has limited itself to substituting mere denunciation for analysis. In place of separating and distinguishing between the various factors in the situation, the Party has resorted to the vulgar method of identifying all groups outside itself and throwing them into one common pot of indistinguishable reaction. Such interpretations of events, which make any serious analysis "unnecessary", is guaranteed in advance to make the Left wing a narrow, ingrown, self-satisfied and uninfluential sect.

The old struggle between the Fishwick-Farrington and the Lewis machines has been going on for years, interrupted at periods only by the necessity of making common cause against the Left wing. That struggle was undoubtedly a fight for loot and position, and failed to move any substantial mass of the miners; it interested primarily the big and petty union officialdom and the operators. What is new in the situation is the fact that men (and the groups they represent) like Brophy, Howat and Dorchy have joined with Fishwick in an anti-Lewis fight; that the socialist party has given virtual endorsement, and the C. P. L. A. (Muste group) outright endorsement to the new combination. The Lewis faction has no progressives in its ranks and does not make the faintest pretense at a progressive program. What distinguishes the Fishwick faction now is precisely the fact that the progressives have joined with it and given it a different coloring, which will vitally affect the attitude of the progressive miners.

The new combination and its convention call is at bottom a sign of vitality in the U. M. W. of A. It will in the first place, have a strong tendency to reconstitute the old union. In other words, it is as much the reflection of the desire in the ranks of the miners for the establishment of a strong union on a progressive basis as it is the expression of the Fishwick machine's intention to capitalize this desire for its own purpose.

The development of this progressive and semi-progressive movement among the miners in the old union is, furthermore, of significance for the labor movement as a whole, particularly for the A. F. of L. It belies again the "theory" of the "complete bankruptcy" of the A. F. of L. and is proof positive that there are still at hand powerful forces—already in movement and potential—in the ranks of the old unions that offer a strong basis for the Left wing and for a struggle against the labor union bureaucracy and class collaboration. is a refutation of the schematic (not Marxist) conception held by the Party (particularly by Foster) of the fatalistic "decline of the A. F. of L."—the "theoretical" foundation upon which have been erected the ruinous policies in the trade union movement now pursued by the official Party machine.

There is power behind the new movement. Fishwick-Farrington have a base in control of the Illinois district of the U. M. W. A., which is one of the two remaining districts of the old union still containing a hold on the workers in the industry. More than that, it has associated with it men like Brophy and Howat who have been associated with the progressive and Left wing movement for years, and have a great prestige among the miners throughout the country. The notion prevalent in the minds of the Party leaders that their denunciation of these men for departing from the Left wing movement has "discredited them among the masses of the miners" is entirely false and a replacement of reality by desire.

The progressive and Left wing sentiment remaining in the U. M. W. of A. will therefore incline strongly towards supporting and pushing forward this movement as a "legal expression" of the fight against reaction in the union. More than that, the miners who have dropped out of the union, without joining the N. M. U., or became passive and indifferent, will tend to see in this movement the hope for reconstituting the organization to its former strength and to a new progressivism. The movement, therefore, will tend to become a rallying ground for the dispersed and discouraged progressive and Left wing workers in the old union, the former members in the disrupted districts, and even in the ranks of the National Miners Union itself.

It is entirely true that any hopes or faith whatsoever placed in men like Fishwick, Farrington, John H. Walker, etc., is quite groundless and must end in bitter disappointment. These people have a record which is not one whit different from that of Lewis. Like him, they ruled by the blackjack, gunmen and terror. Like him, they have expelled militants and broken up progressive local unions. Like him, they worked hand in hand with the operators against the elementary interests of the miners. Their arch-type is Farrington, the paid employee of the Peabody Coal Company during his incumbency in the office of Illinois district union president. That is precisely why the Left wing must exercise its influence upon the workers in this movement, drive a wedge between the union misleaders operators' agents, and self-seekers on the one hand and the genuinely progressive elements in the ranks and the leadership on the other.

To deal with this movement by frontal attack and simple denunciation alone, as is the Party method today, to neglect to influence it from within, means only one thing: The Left wing, willy-nilly, will be aiding Fishwick and Co. to establish virtually unhindered domination over tens of thousands of progressive-minded workers who will lean to the new movement. The Left wing must bear in mind that the present C. P. policy is only the other side of a counterfeit coin: Yesterday, the Stalinists united in a most intimate bloc with the most reactionary reformist leaders (Purcell, Chiang Kai-Shek, etc.) without any regard for the masses; today, they again see only the leaders—this time condemning them out of hand—and again forget that there is such a thing as workers in the ranks who follow them. Neither policy has any particular virtue. The second is only a despairing effort to cover up the traces of yesterday's disappointments.

The Left wing cannot regard the formation of the N. M. U. as the end of the problem of the old union which still has the bulk of the organized miners, or as having solved the problems of the Left wing once and for all. It is rather a stage in a long struggle to reconstitute the miners' organization on a national scale on a militant basis. In this struggle the Left wing organized in the National Miners Union must retain its ability to maneuver. With only a few thousand members in its

What is the «Permanent Revolution»?

By L. D. Trotsky

These these constitute a brief statement of contents of a large pamphlet which is being prepared by me for publication under the same title. The questions to which the pamphlet is dedicated, are inseparably bound up with the foundations of the program of the Comintern and consequently with the future platform of the International Opposition. I make these theses public as material for the elaboration of the theoretical section of the platform. The pamphlet, I hope, will shortly appear in numerous languages. —L. T.

1. The theory of the permanent revolution now demands the greatest attention of every Marxist, for the course of the ideological and class struggle has finally drawn this question out of the field of reminiscences over the old differences of opinion among Russian Marxists and converted it into a question of the character, the internal connections and the methods of the international revolution as a whole.

2. With regard to the countries with a backward bourgeois development, especially the colonial and semi-colonial countries, the theory of the permanent revolution signifies that the complete and genuine solution of their democratic and national liberative tasks is only conceivable through the dictatorship of the proletariat, the leader of the subjugated nations, primarily of their peasant masses.

3. Not only the agrarian, but also the national question, assigned to the peasantry, the overwhelming majority of the population of the backward countries, an important place in the democratic revolution. Without an alliance of the proletariat with the peasantry, the tasks of the democratic revolution cannot be solved, yes, not even seriously posed. But the alliance of these two classes can be realized in no other way than through an intransigent struggle against the influence of the national liberal bourgeoisie.

4. No matter how the first episodic stages of the revolution may be in the individual countries, the realization of the revolutionary alliance between the proletariat and the peasantry is conceivable only under the political direction of the proletarian vanguard, organized in the Communist Party. This in turn means that the victory of the democratic revolution is only conceivable through the dictatorship of the proletariat which bases itself upon the alliance with the peasantry and solves the tasks of the democratic revolution.

5. The old slogan of Bolshevism—"The Democratic Dictatorship of the Proletariat and Peasantry" expresses precisely the above characterized relation of the proletariat, the peasantry and the liberal bourgeoisie. This is demonstrated by the experience of October. But the old formula of Lenin does not solve in advance the problem of what the mutual relations between the proletariat and the peasantry inside of the revolutionary bloc will be. In other words, the formula has unknown algebraic quantities which have to make way for precise arithmetical quantities in the process of historical experience. This latter showed, and under circumstance that exclude every other interpretation, that no matter how big the revolutionary role of the peasantry may be, it can nevertheless not be an independent role and even less a leading one. The peasant follows either the worker or the bourgeois. This means that the "Democratic Dictatorship of the Proletariat and Peasantry" is only conceivable as a Dictatorship of the Proletariat that leads the peasant masses behind it.

6. A Democratic Dictatorship of the Proletariat and Peasantry, as a regime that is distinguished from the Dictatorship of the Proletariat by its class content, would be realized only in case an independent revolutionary Party could be constituted which expresses the interests of the peasants and in general of petty-bourgeois democracy—a Party that is capable of conquering power with this or that aid of the proletariat and of determining its revolutionary program. As modern history teaches and especially the history of Russia in the last 25 years—an insurmountable obstacle on the road to the creation of a peasants party is the economic and political dependence of the petty-bourgeoisie and its deep internal differentiation, thanks to which the upper sections of the petty-bourgeoisie (peasantry) go with the big bourgeoisie in all decisive cases, especially in war and in revolution, and the lower sections—with the proletariat, while the intermediary section has the choice between the two extreme poles. Between the Kerenskiade and the Bolshevik power, between the Kuo-Min-Tang and the Dictatorship of the Proletariat there can lie nothing and there lies nothing, that is, no democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants.

7. The endeavor of the Comintern to foist upon the Eastern countries the slogan of the Democratic Dictatorship of the Proletariat and Peasantry, finally and long ago exhausted by history, can have only a reactionary significance. In so far as this slogan is counterposed to the slogan of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat, it contributes to the dissolution of the Proletariat into the petty-bourgeois masses and in this manner creates better conditions for the hegemony of the national bourgeoisie and consequently for the collapse of the democratic revolution. The introduction of this slogan into the program of the Comintern is a direct betrayal of Marxism and of the October traditions of Bolshevism.

8. The dictatorship of the Proletariat which rises to power as the leader of the democratic revolution is inevitably and very quickly placed before tasks that are bound up with a deep incision into the right of bourgeois property. The democratic revolution rises over immediately into the Socialist, and thereby becomes a permanent revolution.

9. The conquest of power of the proletariat does not end the revolution, but only opens it. Socialist construction is only conceivable on the foundation of the class struggle, on a national and international scale. This struggle, under the conditions of an overwhelming predominance of capitalist relationships on the world arena, will inevitably lead to outbreaks, internal, that is, civil wars, and external, that is, revolutionary wars. Therein lies the permanent character of the Socialist revolution as such, independent of whether it is a question of a backward country which only yesterday had its democratic overthrow, or an old capitalist country, which already has behind it a long epoch of democracy and parliamentarism.

10. The completion of the Socialist revolution within national limits is unthinkable. One of the main reasons for the crisis in bourgeois society is the fact that the productive forces created by it overflow the boundaries of the national state. From this follow, on the one hand, imperialist wars, and on the other hand, the utopia of the bourgeois United States of Europe. The Socialist revolution commences on the national arena, is developed further on the inter-state and finally on the world arena. Thus the Socialist revolution becomes a permanent revolution in the new and broader sense of this word; it attains completion only in the final victory of the new society on our entire planet.

11. By the above outlined schema of the development of the world revolution, the question of the countries that are "mature" or "immature" for Socialism in the spirit of that pedantic, lifeless, classification by the present program of the Comintern, is eliminated. Insofar as capitalism has created the world market, the division of labor and productive forces throughout the world, it has also prepared world economy for socialist reconstruction.

The various countries will go through this process in varying tempos. Backward countries can, under certain conditions, arrive at the dictatorship of the proletariat sooner, but they come later than the latter to Socialism.

A backward colonial or semi-colonial country whose proletariat is insufficiently prepared to unite the peasantry and conquer power is thereby incapable of carrying its democratic overthrow to its conclusion. On the contrary, in a country where the proletariat has power in its hands as the result of the democratic revolution, the further fate of the dictatorship and socialism is not only and not so much dependent in the final analysis upon the national productive forces, as it is upon the development of the international socialist revolution.

12. The theory of Socialism in one Country which rose on the yeast of the reaction against the theory of the permanent revolution (to "nine-tenths", according to Stalin's formula) and the opening of the epoch of national reform. The theory of the Kulak growing into socialism and the theory of the "neutralization" of the world bourgeoisie are consequently inseparable from the theory of socialism in one country. They stand and fall together.

Through the theory of national socialism, the Communist International is degraded to a weapon of assistance which is necessary for the struggle against a military intervention. The present policy of the Comintern, its regime, and the selection of its leading personalities, correspond entirely to the debasement of the Communist International to an assisting troop which is not designed to solve independent tasks.

14. The program of the Comintern created by Bucharin is thoroughly eclectic. It makes the hopeless attempt to reconcile the theory of Socialism in one Country with Marxist Internationalism, which is however, inseparable from the permanent character of the world revolution. The struggle of the Left Communist Opposition for a correct policy and a healthy regime in the Communist International is inseparably combined with a struggle for a Marxist program. The question of the program in turn is inseparable from the question of the two mutually exclusive theories: the theory of permanent revolution and the theory of socialism in one country. The problem of the permanent revolution has long ago rooted out the episodic differences between Lenin and Trotsky, which were quite exhausted by history. The struggle is for the basic ideas of Marx and Lenin on the one side and the eclectics of the Centrists on the other.

This theory sets the revolution in the backward countries the task of establishing an unrealizable regime of the democratic dictatorship; this regime it sets up against the dictatorship of the proletariat way it introduces illusions and fictions into politics, paralyzes the struggle for power of the proletariat in the East, and hampers the victory of the colonial revolution.

The very seizure of power by the proletariat signifies, from the standpoint of the epigones theory, the completion of the revolution.

Opposition Serves the Bolshevik Revolution

"Up to the very last moment Blumkin carried through work of the utmost importance for the Soviet Union. How could he do this while adhering to the Opposition? This is explainable from the nature of his work, which was of an entirely individual character. Blumkin had little, if anything, to do with the Communist nuclei, and no possibility of participating in Party discussions. But this does not mean that he hid his thoughts. On the contrary, Blumkin had told Menjinsky and Trilisser, the former chiefs of the foreign department of the G. P. U., that his sympathies were with the Opposition, but that naturally, like any other Oppositionist he was absolutely prepared to carry out his important tasks for the October revolution. Menjinsky and Trilisser considered Blumkin to be irreplaceable, which was true. They left him to his tasks which he always carried out.

Blumkin did visit me at Constantinople. I have already mentioned the fact that Blumkin had slight connections with my secretarial work. In particular, he had prepared one of my military works (I mention this in the preface of that work). Blumkin came to me in Constantinople in order to ascertain my analysis of the situation and in order to assure himself that he ought to remain in the service of the government which was deporting, banishing and imprisoning those comrades who were of the same mind as himself. I replied, naturally, that he was doing his revolutionary duty—not towards the Stalin regime, which had usurped the rights of the Party, but towards the October Revolution.

There has, perhaps, been quoted to you, from one of Yaroslavsky's articles, an allegation concerning my conversation with a visitor last summer and to whom I had predicted the inevitable and imminent collapse of the Soviet government. The miserable sycophant lies, that goes without saying. But on comparing certain facts and dates, I am certain that this referred to my conversation with Blumkin. As for his question concerning the possibility of reconciling his work and his adherence to the Opposition, I told him among other things, that my exile as well as the imprisonment of other comrades did not change our fundamental line; that in the moment of danger the Oppositionists would be in the most advanced posts, that in the difficult hours Stalin would be forced to call upon them even as Tseretelli appealed to the Bolsheviks for aid against Kornilov. In that connection I added: "If only it is not too late." Apparently, Blumkin, after his arrest disclosed the nature of his interview in order to show the attitude and state of mind of the Opposition: it must not be forgotten that I had been exiled because of the accusation that I was preparing an armed conflict against the Soviet power!

Through Blumkin I had sent an informative letter to Moscow for our friends, based upon the same ideas that I had set forth in a series of published articles: the Stalin repression against us does not yet signify a change in the class character of the State, but only prepares and makes more easy that change; our course remains, as in the past, that of reform and not that of revolution; the implacable struggle for our ideas must be based on the perspective of a long delay."

QUARTER MILLION JOBLESS IN N. C.

RALEIGH, N. C.—(FP)—250,000 are jobless in North Carolina, leading industrial state of the south, according to Comm. F. D. Grist of the state department of labor and industry. Unemployment in Raleigh is double last year's.

Hunger, prevalent in the broken farm districts of eastern North Carolina, is creeping into the farms and small cities that dot the region. Tenants and farm laborers, driven from the land, congregate in these communities, while the crop failure causes curtailment of employment in the urban establishments, and the slowing up of new construction.

In Goldsboro scores of Negroes are being fed in jimcrow soup kitchens. In Goldsboro two thirds of the destitute are Negroes. In some places schools are feeding children at least once a day.

Edward C. Lindgren, former member of the Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party, will speak before the New York Branch of the Communist League (Opposition) on Tuesday, March 4th, 1930 at 8 p. m. at the Militant Hall, 25 Third Ave. Room 4. His subject is: What is Wrong with the Communist Party?

Throughout the World of Labor

The Fall Of Primo De Rivera and its Consequences

The fall of Primo de Rivera surprised almost no one. It surprised only Primo de Rivera himself... and the leading Spanish Communists. The former stated, two weeks before his collapse, that he would relinquish power of his own accord in six months; the latter, like an echo, were writing that Primo would be with us for a long time.

Primo did not yield up power of his own accord. Neither was he driven out by a revolutionary movement. His downfall was due to one of those secret revolts which threaten to, break out not only against a government, but also against the class which maintains it. The class—the bourgeoisie, the monarchy the army—wish to ward off the immediate danger, the discontent and the growing revolution, by driving Primo out of power and promising a return to the constitutional form of government. In fact, a large-scale conspiracy was organized, which, in breaking forth could have overthrown not only the dictatorship, but even the monarchy, and which, under the existing circumstances, could have exceeded the desires and intention of the organizers themselves.

It can be said with certainty that the discontent against Primo was widespread. The proletariat showed their discontent through the powerful strikes of 1927-28-29 in Austria, Catalogne, Seville, etc., strikes of an almost spontaneous character, let loose through economic causes, and which rapidly assumed a political character, not through the almost non-existent efforts of the official communist movement, but through the intervention of the dictatorship, on the side of the bosses, against the proletariat and through the rapid development of the latter.

(The leading Spanish Communists have deceived the International in pretending that these strikes were instigated and directed by themselves. Unfortunately this was not so.)

Bourgeoisie Desert Primo

*The discontent of the petty-bourgeoisie, of the intellectuals, and of a section of the army manifested itself in the form of conspiracies, (six, up to the one which was being recently prepared) and in the student movements. Primo was already left with the support of only a section of the big financial and industrial bourgeoisie whom he had succeeded in reassuring through the establishment of national monopolies at the expense of foreign finance capital, and through extreme political protection. But he ended up by losing the support of the big bourgeoisie as well because of the fall in the value of the Peseta.

The pressure of international finance was in fact one of the chief causes, a fact which can easily be explained, it having given rise to the ultra-nationalist political economy of Primo. This, however, was not the sole cause. Instead of correcting this entire political economy, financial and social, and of achieving parity, the dictatorship believed that it could sustain the Peseta by means of simple manipulations in the world market. It obtained a credit of 18 million pounds from a group of British and American financiers, which made possible only a temporary halt in the decline of the Spanish standard. The decline proceeded in a fatalistic manner, resulting first in a defection of the Minister of Finance and finally in the collapse of the entire government.

Financial Crisis in Spain

The economic and political situation which Primo is leaving as a heritage to his successors, is extremely dangerous. If the best-known former political leaders—Cambo, the younger Maura, Sanchez Guerra, etc.—definitely refuse to aid Berenguer, it is because of the seriousness of the situation. Above all stands the financial question. In 1923, the year of Primo's Coup-d'Etat, the Spanish public debt, according to the official figures themselves, was 8,531 million Pesetas, the total indebtedness of the treasury approaching 5,000 million. At the end of 1929 these figures had risen to 19,635 million pesetas (an increase of 11 million in six years and four months of the dictatorship!)

Naturally, the political situation is also extremely serious. In 1923, Primo destroyed all the government parties. Those could no longer offer the least resistance, being discredited in the eyes of the people.

But Primo set up nothing in their place. The Patriotic Union was an artificially created party, an empty shell in the eyes of the public owing its existence solely to official support. This group, together with the Advisory Assembly and everything created by the dictatorship of Primo, were doomed to perish. The proof of this lies in the fact that the king appealed and continued to appeal to the former leaders of the traditional parties, through Berenguer, that they reorganize their parties and prepare for distorted elections, following the vicious methods of former years. All this as though nothing had happened!

Of course the Spanish proletariat did not look at things in the same light. For them the former parties were permanently discredited. They did not await, they did not desire their return—a return to the status of 1923. Not a praetorian guard, but neither the former regime, and above all not a monarchy. Primo had engineered his coup-d'Etat in 1923 in order to save the monarchy.

The Growing Republican Movement

It is also in order to save it that his rule has just been liquidated and that the former politicians are preparing to govern anew. Will they succeed in saving the crown? We think not. A wider and wider republican movement is taking form in Spain. The very first acts of Berenguer have been to arrest several of the republican leaders in Valencia, Barcelona, etc. The demonstrations of the students and workers against the dictatorship revolved not only around the slogan of "Down with Primo", but "Down with the Monarchy". The republican movement cannot but grow. The important problems left over by Primo and which cannot be solved by his successors will serve to aggravate the crisis of the monarchist regime. We are at the threshold of political struggles of the greatest interest.

But we Communists, in this situation, which, by the action of material forces assume an increasingly revolutionary character, must act with energy and facility. The anti-monarchist movement will be led in its first stages by the petty-bourgeoisie, by the republican party and by the socialists.

The Spanish proletariat; whose living conditions are extremely wretched, and whose hatred of the entire system has matured during the last few years of dictatorial oppression are getting ready for participation in the struggle.

The Need of a Communist Party

But in face of the socialists who are preparing to manœuvre, and of the anarcho-syndicalists who will attempt to reassume the leadership of the revolutionary trade unions, what is needed now is a strong Communist Party, disciplined, supple, knowing how to lead the proletariat in the coming struggles towards its emancipation. Will the actual Communist Party attain its historic mission? This is the serious problem for the entire International. Today, once again, the leaders of the Spanish Communists, with the support of the Stalin clique which steers the Comintern, readily devote themselves to the miserable task of systematically hounding the best militant Communists. Under any circumstances this attitude would be incorrect; at present it is an anti-Communist crime. We Opposition Communists will know our duty. But if the Stalinist bureaucrats attempt to hinder us, they will be responsible before the international proletariat.

German Unemployed Defy Tyrannous Laws

BERLIN—(FP)—Depression has laid its heavy hand on Germany's Manhattan. Nearly 400,000 jobless pace the cold streets; old men and women peddle newspapers or matches; the free soup stations are crowded with the destitute.

Everywhere in Germany, whose total unemployed exceeds 3,500,000, the jobless are forming organizations of protest. Demonstrations have occurred in Würms, Erfurt and Hamburg in defiance of the severe anti-demonstration laws recently passed by the government. These laws aim to cripple the growing Communist movement.

Police frequently shoot into crowds of marching out-of-workers. Many of the unfortunates have been killed or wounded.

But the protests continue despite the oppressive laws. "We have only our lives to lose," commented one of the jobless. "And under the present regime our lives are worthless anyhow."

Φ

German Unemployed and the First of February

For weeks and weeks the German party has proclaimed through its 35 publications that on the first of February millions of unemployed would parade throughout Germany. The factory workers would give proof of their solidarity. Braving the ban of Zoergel and of Severing, the working class would capture the streets.

The first of February was to have marked the beginning of great mass battles. In the Leningrad Pravda appeared:

"In no country are the rise of the revolutionary wave and the collapse of capitalist stabilization as evident as in Germany. The Communist Party of Germany is, next in order after that of the Soviet Union, the most bolshevik party. That is why it is not to be wondered at that it is in Germany that one can see the advance of the approaching European revolution."

"The barricade fights in Hamburg, the defiance of the ban against demonstrations in German cities, the parades of the armies of the unemployed are, under the existing circumstances, the expression of the growing revolutionary tendencies of the masses. The events of the last few days prove that a revolutionary situation approaches at full speed in Germany."

In proportion as the leadership of the Party becomes intoxicated with its own prophecies and bombast, the social democracy becomes increasingly arrogant. The social democratic press, energetically supported by the democratic press, agitates against the C. P. G. and spreads the most fantastic lies. The closer did the 1st of February approach, the clearer did it become that the social democracy hoped, through a sweeping provocation, to definitely strike down the Party and drive it into illegality. The agitation of the social-democracy was complemented by the slander of the Brandler press, which branded the would-be plans of the Party leadership as putschist.

Wherein Lies the Defeat of the 1st of February

The leadership and the Party press evidently speak only of a "victory". Thus, the Rote Fahne of the 2nd of February writes: "The Communist party achieved its desired end on the first of February; the solid advance of marching proletarian regiments crushed Grzesinski's ban against demonstrations."

The social democracy and the bourgeois press are jubilant: the "revolutionary plans" miscarried. The social democracy and the bourgeoisie know quite well that the First of February was not the "day of the revolution" on the calendar of Thaelmann's adventures. But they also know that on the 1st of February the C. P. G. suffered a serious defeat. For the actual task which they had set themselves was far from accomplished. Only a few thousand of the 350,000 unemployed in Berlin heeded the Party's call. None of the Berlin factories in which the Party obtained so many votes, as was the case last year, when it had such great success, participated in the solidarity strike. The Party leadership did not even call upon the factories to go out on strike in solidarity with the unemployed, for it knew that this appeal would be useless.

In Red Berlin, where the C. P. G. mustered as many votes as the socialist party in the communal elections of Nov. 17, 1929 the call of the Party went to naught, and this despite the growing bitterness of the masses, and despite the increasing contempt of the Berlin proletariat for the leadership of the socialist party.

Why Was the Defeat Inevitable?

The C. P. G. is a mass party which represents 3 million workers, and this despite the political adventurism of its leadership, despite the unfitness of Thaelmann, Neumann, Remmele, etc.

But the masses, although voting for the party, whether in the general elections or in the elections of the factory councils, do not at all thereby show that they have decided to carry through the proletarian revolution. They simply show that they are disassociating themselves from the counter-revolutionary policy of the Social-Democratic Party—the enemy of their class. Unfortunately this is not how the Rote Fahne puts it:

"In the factories, among the unemployed on the streets, in the country and on the farms, everywhere, the willingness to abolish the system which brings nothing but hunger and misery for the masses, is growing among the workers, the willingness to put an end to a system which has proven its inability to guarantee to the working people an existence at least worthy of a human being!"

The masses who vote for the party, even those who follow its actions, are not yet that far advanced. The Party's appeal for the first of February was forcibly extinguished without achieving its aim, because it did not appeal to the masses with immediate concrete demands affecting every unemployed worker, but all it could do was to get itself drunk with vague political phrases which could not represent to non-party workers the goal to be sought after today, and tomorrow.

LaVerite and the Militant

"There was no dearth of prophets who predicted the doom of La Verite even before it appeared. Several profound sages explained their desertion by saying that conditions were not suitable for the formation of a Communist Party in general. Nevertheless La Verite not only grows and gathers strength, but now has acquired a fighting ally as precious as La Lutte des Classes. La Verite itself assumes a clearer and more distinct form. One cannot but agree with our Chinese comrade N. who recently wrote from Shanghai that La Verite of Paris and The Militant of New York are the best publications of the International Opposition"

ACTORS EQUITY DEPRECATES COMPANY UNION PLAN

HOLLYWOOD, Calif.—(FP)—Company unionism is sneaking into Hollywood as a backfire against Actors Equity Assn., the theatre and movie union. Using the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, the movie magnates are compelling screen people to swear away their right to strike in return for a dubious agreement.

Among concessions made to the actors as a result of the Equity strike last summer, and written into the company union agreement, are reasonable notice of dismissal (the company to determine what is reasonable) and overtime pay at regular rates. Actors are to be permitted to rest 12 hours between calls, and eight hours is to constitute a day's work for day workers.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.—For posting a sign calling for work or wages, Angelo Cappello was arrested at the Broadway Auditorium and held for $500 bail. The maximum penalty, under an ancient city ordinance, is one year in jail.

Two workers were arrested at an open air protest demonstration held by the Council of the Unemployed. Bail was set at $2,000.

Imperialist Development and its Inevitable Doom

By Arne Swaback

Marx has given to the movement his brilliant terse definition of the true nature of the capitalist system of production. In his description of the transformation of the individual means into social means of production with the social product appropriated by the individual capitalist, he demonstrated the basic contradictions whence arise all the contradictions in which our present day society moves.

The specific features of the development of monopoly capitalism are, alongside the higher stage of socialization of production, also an intensification of contradictions and sharpening of the class struggle, as indicated most vividly in this present depression. Its extent and depth cannot yet be estimated, but whatever the degree, the depression itself will accentuate these conflicts. Any steps taken toward "social control of business"—to use the phrase of the capitalist economic writers—by monopoly capitalism and its government, will naturally mean not merely attempts at new divisions, but first of all a further expansion of productive capacity with increased exploitation of the workers. Evidence of this has already been given in the Hoover conferences. Discounting all the window dressing from the "promises" for building and expansion of activities by the big corporations and retaining that part which will actually find a place in their "normal" development, what have we left? Just such building and expansion which makes each corporation a more effective competitor and bring results in increased production of surplus values, at reduced cost by further rationalization, labor saving machinery and speed-up.

Lenin distinctly emphasized that capitalism in its imperialistic phase leads to the most extensive socialization of production, that the fundamental contradictions of capitalism are not eliminated but become intensified, that the general structure of free competition remains and the oppression by a few monopolists becomes much harder, more painful and unbearable.

The Imperialist Struggle for Market Control

Concretely, the further developments will manifest themselves today first of all in efforts by American monopoly capitalism to overcome its economic difficulties by further pressure upon the workers. The theories of the capitalist economists of the high wage standard, labor stock ownership in enterprises and capital and labor partnership, also valiantly championed by the A. F. of L. "leadership", are due for some rude shakings: for the indispensable and fundamental condition of the capitalist method of production is a starvation standard, with, however, continued imperialist bribings of certain sections of the more skilled. This is already on the order of the day. The working class as a whole is suffering both by outright wage cuts, by the fact of a standing army of unemployed hitting most families, as well as increased speedup. The working class will find itself compelled to ever more resistance, thus sharpening the class struggle.

American imperialism will further seek to overcome its economic difficulties on the international arena by conquests of new markets. But the division of the world among the groups of capitalists, as far as colonial territory is concerned, was already completed at the end of the 19th and beginning of the 20th century. Now only redivisions are possible which usually find this "solution" in war. The American exports to foreign markets are increasing, and already presage an immediately sharpening trade war, because the European imperialist powers will do their best to retaliate. In answer to the new U. S. tariff policy, for example, similar steps are indicated in Europe. The French parliament is laboring over a bill providing for an exceptionally high duty on import of automobiles. The recent League of Nations Report shows Germany increasing her foreign trade much faster than the United States. One of the special tasks of the McDonald government is to carry through a complete reorganization of British industry to become a better competitor with the United States, and, if possible, to make the British workers "like" the speed-up system. A trade war of imperialist cut-throats will be based primarily upon their ability to cut wages and increase the pace of the workers. This struggle for the world market, or for redivision of the world, is but the prelude to the imperialist war, in other words—a continuation of the trade war with different means—which now finds its reflection in the jugglings for position at the London naval conference in the race for armaments.

American Expansion will Bring Revolutionary Disturbances

"The inevitable further development of American expansion, the contraction of the markets of European capitalism, including the European market itself, entails the greatest military, economic and revolutionary disturbances, such as will leave all disturbances of the past in the shade." (Trotsky—Criticism of Comintern Program.)

As for any beliefs of the ability of the often appearing world trusts or syndicates actually to divide the world spheres between them and eliminate competition, historical experiences should teach a good lesson. Lenin cites some examples in his book "Imperialism":

The petroleum market already in 1905 was divided between two groups: The Standard Oil Co. and the Rotchild-Nobel combine. Both of these groups were closely connected, but their monopoly became threatened by newly developing oil fields mainly backed by German banks. A struggle ensued between the Standard Oil and the German banks, involving the German government, with the result that the former became victorious. We can add, that now this struggle is continued between the Standard Oil and the Royal Dutch Shell. Lenin further cites the field of mercantile navigation where the gigantic growth of concentration led to division of all routes between the two German groups, Hamburg-American and North German Lloyd on the one hand and the Morgan trust of Anglo-American companies on the other. An agreement for division was concluded in 1903 to run for 20 years. It became void by the world war. Similarly in 1904 the steel rail cartel was organized with a definite basis of division of the market between England, Germany and Belgium. Later France and the United States Steel Corporation, followed by Austria and Spain, joined. The war scattered it again.

Capitalism Can't Harmonize Contradictions

Recently rumors were current of American steel trusts entering the new European steel syndicate. Here again the prospects of the coming imperialist war indicates its short lease of life, if the conflicting interests of the national capitalist groups can be harmonized even that long. However, the decisive conclusion from such developments was drawn by Lenin:

World Textile Situation Bodes Workers Ill

By ROBERT W. DUNN

Anarchy of production under the present economic order is freshly illustrated in textile industry figures recently released. While mill owners complain of over-production and depressed prices, the annual review of the Textile World reports the total amount of mill construction in 1929 is larger than for 1928. Of the 550 separate concerns in the industry that erected, enlarged or improved plants during the year, 162 were cotton mills, 194 knitting mills, 74 woolen mills, 52 silk mills, 18 rayon mills in addition to 50 dye-houses and finishing plants.

While new construction was being rushed in this highly competitive and "depressed" industry, other plants were working two shifts. Still others, chiefly in the north, were going out of business altogether. But on the whole the capacity of the industry to turn out goods was being steadily increased.

In one of the "sickest" years for the cotton industry new mill construction was booming in the south. North Carolina led with 40 new plants, units and basic improvements to mills. South Carolina was a close second with 32. The south added 420,000 new spindles and 9215 looms in 1929, according to figures compiled by the Southern Textile Bulletin which reports that the average increase in southern spindles since 1912 has been 468,000 a year. Eight brand new cotton mills were built in the south in 1929, the largest being the Goodyear Rubber Co.'s mill at Rockmart, Ga., for the manufacture of tire fabrics.

With new mills and additional spindles running day and night, the owners turn their eyes overseas to find markets for goods. About 6% of cotton manufactures are now exported. The cotton men want to raise this to 15, 20 or more. And yet they collude with the export manager of the

"Some bourgeois writers were of the opinion that international cartels, being one of the most striking expressions of the internationalization of capital, give hope that peace among nations will be possible under capitalism. Theoretically, such an idea is an absurdity, and in practice it is a sophism and a means of dishonest defense of the worst kind of opportunism. The international cartels show the point to which capitalist monopolies have now grown and what the struggle among groups of capitalists is about. The latter point is the most important; it alone explains to us the historical-economic meaning of what is going on at present, as the FORM of the struggle may change and does change constantly, being dependent on various comparatively trifling and temporary causes, but the ESSENCE of the struggle, its CLASS CHARACTER CANNOT CHANGE as long as classes exist." (emphasis in original.)

Finance Capitalists Direct Government

It would be foolish, however, to close one's eyes to the possibilities for further expansion of American monopoly capitalism even on the home market. The tendencies manifested in the Hoover conferences toward "social control of business" (state capitalism) is keeping that well in mind and is based upon such possibilities. They envisage the prospects of bringing the government into more direct participation, support and responsibility, that is:—to establish a more perfect synthesis of control by the dynastic oligarchy both in the economic and political spheres. In this country the personal union, or fusion, of banks, industrial establishments and the government has not been lagging. The banks are no mere intermediaries in business but powerful monopoly holders; finances are completely interwoven with direction of industrial activities, industrial magnates are on board of directors of the banks and ever more openly this whole gentry fills the seats of government. Mellon, whose family cleaned up nearly 300 million dollars during the month of May last year in the rich stock market harvest, has long been the most outstanding directing force in the cabinet. Recently, as part of the general Hoover program, he was able to hand down a small subsidy in the form of a 160 million dollars tax cut on all incomes between 1 and 10 millions. Now Grundy has been put in the Senate and Morrow, Morgan's partner, will soon also take a seat there.

It follows incontestably that any such further expansion on the home market as well leads to further contradictions, further sharpening of the class struggle, further competition between the monopolies themselves and with the smaller capitalist enterprises. This is inherent in capitalism and substantiated by all historical experience. The present industrialization of the south is the most vivid example. So far only in the first stage, it is already developing acute class conflicts.

The Petty Capitalists are Ground Under

There are throughout the country plenty of advocates for extension of super-power developments; for damming of mighty rivers and irrigation and fertilization of extensive tracts of land or for a waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic. Unquestionably the resources are available but within lie also sharpened competition and conflicts. We witness the uneven development not merely between the capitalist countries but also of capitalism within the country itself—not in the least softened in its monopolist stage. There are constant competition and encroachments upon the lighter or finishing industries by the heavier industries in control of raw materials, sometimes represented by horizontal versus vertical trusts. There is constant developing competition for new raw materials made possible by inventions of new methods. The new Edison process of making rubber from goldenrod or other weeds, for example, is likely to make great changes in the world struggle for rubber. Even the mere advocacy of the expansions mentioned above has struck opposition and conflicts between the various capitalist groups and monopolies. Conflicts between the capitalist groups is reflected in the dispute around the proposed high tariff legislation.

The Increase of Bankruptcies

The present depression as with others, is taking its toll in bankruptcies. According to the R. C. Dun review there were 2,759 bankruptcies during the month of January, the greatest number of any January for years. This offers the usual "splendid opportunities" for finance monopoly capitalism to proceed to organize these concerns or buy them for a song. The smaller capitalists and the middle class elements, who are thus being hit and who suffer in general from the oppression of the few monopolists have always looked for saviours to free them from the monopoly domination. They thus looked to and followed Roosevelt and LaFollette and they are now cherishing hopes that the present "progressives" in Congress will take up the cudgels against Grundy and Morrow and lead another "trust busting" campaign. It presages disturbances and splits within the important props of finance monopoly—the capitalist parties, mainly along economic lines. Many of the middle class elements, however, will be reduced to the ranks of the proletariat and become disillusioned.

The Growth of Communism

These are the dialectics of the capitalist system of production standing out more clearly in its greater maturity in the imperialist epoch. Every expansion of productive capacity; every step for more perfect stabilization of production, produces and intensifies its exact opposite—greater competition although in changed forms, and sharpened class antagonisms. These develop opportunities to advance the Communist movement. They should not be wasted in academic debates over primacy of external or internal contradictions; not to proclaim, as the Stalinists do, that the Right wing view of the disappearance of internal contradictions and the growth of anarchy in the international arena means that they hence "lead a purely metaphysical existence in the cosmic space". This is not the way to combat wrong theories. Crises in the specific country may focus particularly its internal contradictions; wars may focus particularly the external contradictions. Nevertheless these contradictions interrelate and are in the imperialist epoch inseparably bound together. The fact that American imperialism rests upon a foundation of world economy with its international conflicts hastens and sharpens the conflicts within.

DENVER—In January 24% of union members in Denver were unemployed, an increase over December of 1%. The percentage of unorganized workers unemployed is, of course, much higher.

YOUNG VANGUARD

- - A Section Devoted to Problems of the Working Class Youth - -

The Decline of the Y. C. I.

The present crisis in the Young Communist International is a direct reflection of the situation in the Comintern. The latter, under the leadership of Stalinist Centrism, with its policy of national "socialism", and the conversion of the Communist parties into automaton to carry out its bureaucratic orders, finds itself in a state of disintegration.

The Young Communist International as a section of the Comintern, has the same political and tactical line as the latter. Therefore the mistakes of the Comintern become the mistakes of the Y. C. I. The bureaucracy in the Comintern and its sections has more than its equal in the Leagues and the Y. C. I. Mechanical calling of conferences, bureaucratic appointments with complete disregard for the mass of the membership, mechanical use of Party slogans and policies for youth work, bureaucratic carrying out of decisions, (as "proletarianization" and "nativization") etc. are prevalent in every League in the Y. C. I. The well-known Stalinist abhorrence for revolutionary theory has its fitting supplement in the almost complete absence of educational work in the Leagues. The fundamentals of Marxism, the teaching of Lenin, the history of the Comintern and the Y. C. I., the history of the Russian October, are unknown to the average League functionary, not to speak of the average member. The above, when taught, is falsified—officially called "popularized". (See Stalin's "Leninism" as a model.)

Simultaneous with the declining influence and numerical strength of the Comintern since 1924, the Y. C. I. was transformed from an organization of over a million (exclusive of the Soviet Union) to, according to the report of Furenborg at the recent Plenum of the E. C. Y. C. I., a little over eighty thousand (83,067 to be exact). (This is less than one half the number of members it had in November, 1919, the time of the First Congress.) In every country, with the exception of the Soviet Union, the Leagues are small sects with little influence over the working youth, mere shadows of the Communist parties (although theoretically the former is supposed to be more of a mass organization than the party.)

The Fifth Congress of the Y. C. I. settled the entire question in a very simple manner. It reiterated the decisions of the Sixth Congress of the Comintern on the necessity of a new line, the third period, the Right danger as the main one, and issued the slogan of: To the masses. These decisions were patented to give an impetus to the growth of "mass young Leninist leagues". A genuine discussion of policy and tactics; a critical analysis of the conditions of the young workers in the various countries; steps to educate the membership of the Leagues; ways and means of drawing the working youth into the struggle, these and similar questions were absent from the proceedings. It is no longer necessary to follow such tedious and "academic" procedure—for don't we know that in the present, the "third period", the young workers are becoming radicalized, that the Communists are the only true representatives of the workers and, ipso facto, the communist youth leagues will grow? Such reasoning sometimes with the most naive consciousness, other times unwittingly, is the prevalent logic of the young Stalinist leadership, internationally and nationally.

Y. C. I. Follows the False Path of the C. I.

Since the Fifth Congress, the Y. C. I. conducted the following mass activity. On July 20th and 21st of last year an International Anti-Imperialist Youth Conference was held at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Germany, for the purpose of forming "youth sections" of the Anti-Imperialist Leagues in the various countries. The advisability of such a conference, even from a principle point of view, is highly questionable. The conducting and leading of the struggle against Imperialism is the tasks of the Comintern and its sections, especially the Y. C. I. To organize the petty-bourgeois liberals and socialists into an organization and expect them to carry on a consistent fight against imperialism is to close one's eyes to the history of the liberal and socialist betrayals. Nevertheless, the Y. C. I., in calling into existence the above conference, once again mechanically and with as much reason, followed the policy of the Comintern in its organization of the World League Against Imperialism—which has contained such celebrated and consistent anti-imperialists as, Lansbury, Cook, Sandino, the elder Nehru. The first two were official spokesmen of the organization for some time, while the latter were colonial "heroes."

The proceedings of the conference were very simple. Representatives of petty bourgeois colonial groups and representatives of Communist Youth Leagues present reported on their activities. William Rust, who helped ruin the British League, and served Stalin in lining up the American League at its last convention, gave the report for the Executive Committee of the Y. C. I. He urged the necessity of anti-imperialist work and the formation of youth sections of the Anti-Imperialist League. Two days were spent in discussion. Not a single new youth section has been formed since then—anti-militarist activity in the League is less now than ever before—the E. C. Y. C. I. which convened the Conference did not even consider it important enough to discuss its resolutions and proceedings.

The May Day and August First Fiascoes

The sections of the Y. C. I. took part in the May Day affairs of the Parties and shared in the latter's failure to arouse the masses; it participated in the August 1st demonstrations. In reference to this, Manuisky tells us: "On the eve of August 1st—we said to you, comrades of the Y. C. I.—organize a number of demonstrations in the street before August 1st, dissipate the strength of the enemy, don't let him have a breathing-space. Did you pay heed to this call, did you respond to it? you who declaim about being rendered unpolitical? Did you, with the exception of timid efforts in Germany organize many such demonstrations in other countries?" Following this failure, the Y. C. I. called for the annual International Youth Day, September 1st, as a continuation of August 1st—and it was! Due to false political policy, an incorrect approach to the youth, lack of preparation, absence of the united front tactic, International Youth Day went the way of August 1st—no large sections of the working youth were mobilized.

Big Loss in Membership

The national sections of the Y. C. I. were just as impotent. In the period between the Fifth Congress and the recent plenum, the French League lost, according to official reports, one thousand members, (it fell from 7,000 to 6,000). In Great Britain, although the League had made great strides during the British miners' strike and the General Strike in 1926, had dropped to 900 members at the time of the Fifth Congress, and now has about 300. In Germany, the Brandlerite (Right Wing) youth succeeded in organizing a group, which has resulted in the loss to the Communist movement of many young workers, some going over to the Right wing, some leaving the movement entirely. In Czechoslovakia, the League in a period of one year has declined in membership 50%—from 12,000 to 6,000. In the United States the League has fallen to a little over fifteen hundred members (1589). Not a single youth section of a trade union or auxiliary organization had been formed. Meanwhile, we witness the attempts on the part of the social democracy to revive and activate its youth sections. In Germany the social democratic youth is taking an increasing active part in the strikes led by the social democratic controlled trade unions; in England, the Guild of Youth of the Independent Labour Party, after being made impotent by the winning over of many of its best elements by the Y. C. I. of Great Britain, is showing signs of life; even in the United States, where the national movement of the socialist youth has been practically non-existent since the war, the Socialist Party is attempting to resurrect it. The Leagues of the Y. C. I. are carrying on no work against the young social-reformists. In a period when the young workers are beginning to show signs of active struggle, the absence of alert and active Communist youth Leagues, give the social democratic youth an exceptional broad base for growth.

With these facts before it, the Plenum, recently held, had as its main task a thorough review of the policies and tactics of the Leagues and the Y. C. I. including the line of its Fifth Congress, and the position of the Sixth Congress and Tenth Plenum of the Comintern. To prevent this, was the function of the Comintern representatives to the Plenum, Manuisky and Remmele.

Manuisky Passes the Buck

At this meeting, self criticism reigned—the Comintern representatives criticised the work of the Y. C. I. For example, Manuisky said: "In words you stand for the third period, but in deed you are still in the second period." What criticism could be worse than this! The political resolution (which was eventually carried) was said to indicate "fear of the masses". The slogan, "To the masses" is insufficient, said Manuisky, unless we carry on a struggle against the Left danger, that is, the sectarian tendency which leads to isolation. In spite of this, the resolutions and decisions of the Tenth Plenum were reiterated. Some of the comrades could not completely swallow the statement that the reason (!) for the present condition of the Y. C. I. is the "sectarian isolation and separation from the basic mass of the working youth which dominates in the organizations of the Y.C.I."

Lovestone's Whining Baby

The long awaited Revolutionary Youth organ of the youth members of the Lovestone group has finally graced us with its maiden debut. Expressing intentions of becoming the fighting organ of the American youth movement, the beacon light for the training of young Communists, and the herald of all that is "revolutionary" "Leninist," etc. it actually typifies in the main the characteristics of the whole composition of the Lovestone group. It goes without saying that Revolutionary Youth embodies none of these forms; on the contrary, it exhibits the worse features that have become attached to the body of the Communist movement.

The problems of the American League have not grown up today. The decline, both organizationally and politically of the Y. C. I., its cynicism, high politics, lack of vital activity, and all the retarding conditions of the Communist Youth League, are not the product alone of the present leadership. While it is true that the present regime of Harvey, Green, Rijack, has only accentuated these conditions, basically they have been part of the League from the period of the Lovestone-Zam leadership.

Present Disintegration of the League

The present leadership despite its strict adherence to the "leftward" swing in the Comintern, actually carries over all the features of the former opportunistic and bureaucratic leadership. The heritage of the Harvey-Green-Rijack (Steuben) leadership from the former Lovestone-Zam clique was a non-appearing Young Worker, a pitifully small membership, a League that was apathetic to its tasks, that was virtually non-existent as a factor in the revolutionary movement. This inheritance found fitting executors in the present regime, who while differing in their political affiliations, are for all practical purposes alike in their concepts of the needs of the League, and the methods of building a mass youth movement. Not only has the present leadership failed to better substantially the state of affairs left by the former ruling group, but it is responsible for the further decline and disintegration of the League.

Revolutionary Youth offers no solution for these conditions. Upon the heads of the Rubins, Silvis, Lurys, Zams, Herbergs, as well as the present Harveys, Rijacks and Greens, lie the shortcomings of the League. The attempts of the Lovestone youth section to cry for democracy, discussion, mass work, organization, etc. can only draw crocodile tears from the members of the Communist Opposition. Only a year ago we were faced with the same bureaucratic expulsions, lack of opportunity of discussion and sluggings from the same group that finds it expedient today, to discover that the principles of Communist organization are mercilessly looted by the present Stalinist adventurers.

It is apparent from the situation that

Some ventured that while that was true enough as a condition of the Leagues, the cause must be sought in the political policy and tactics of the Y. C. I. This "doctrinaire" conception was readily dismissed by Stalin's representatives, and the Plenum found itself once again in complete "agreement".

The Opposition Youth is Taking Hold

The young workers in the Opposition, who fought the false policies and leadership of the existing Leagues and supported the International Opposition led by comrade Trotsky, have the important task of educating the working youth, inside and outside the official Leagues in the principles of Communism. In France our young comrades are actively participating in trade union activity; in Mexico they are taking the initiative in forming a strong Opposition group; in Canada and the United States, they are taking an active part in the work of the Communist League of America (Opposition); and lastly, and of utmost importance, in the Soviet Union, our comrades are winning over more and more young workers to our position; a recent report in Izvestia states the disbanding of two Komsomol nuclei for being "nests of Trotskyites". This work must be increased. The publications of the Opposition must devote more space to youth questions, where feasible, special youth organizations should be formed, all efforts should be made to win the young workers and especially, the Communist youth for the principles of Marxism, for the Opposition.

JOSEPH FRIEDMAN.

exists in the League (which cannot be and is not separate and apart from the general conditions prevalent in the Party, and for that matter in the Comintern and Y. C. I.) that the problems of building a mass youth movement are far greater and deeper than the personalities in the leadership. Revolutionary Youth clarifies nothing. It actually brings on greater confusion.

Needs of the League

What is necessary at this juncture is a revaluation of the principles that accompanied the organization of the Y. C. I. Clarification is sorely needed on the following questions: What is and what should be the character of the Communist youth leagues? What shall be the attitude towards the question of "vanguardism"? What shall be the attitude on the question of "independence"? What are the main problems and the immediate tasks of the Youth? What is the attitude of the youth movement on the burning questions of principle between the Centrist leadership and the Leninist Opposition?

A discussion of these questions and the arrival at their proper decisions will fundamentally alter the course of disintegration of the youth Leagues. A correct solution would spell death to the sophistication, high politics, cynicism and opportunist adventurism that today pervades the youth movement. To these and other questions, subsequent issues of the Militant will devote itself.

FOODLESS MOTHER TRIES SUICIDE

DETROIT—(FP)—Rescued after an attempt at suicide in the Detroit River here, Vida Britton, unemployed waitress and mother of two, tells a pitiful tale of hunger and misery in "dynamic" Detroit.

"I've worked so hard, and life is so hard," she sighed, as she told of hard work as a waitress bringing in a few pennies a day. "Business slumped and I lost my job."

Mrs. Britton then went to work as a dancing partner in a local dancing school. "I had to depend on taxi-dancing for a living. Sometimes I barely earned enough to buy food, let alone pay my share of the apartment rent where I lived. I earned 40 a dance. These last weeks I sometimes didn't earn more than 50c a night. I couldn't live on that. Half the time I didn't get enough to eat. Things went from bad to worse."

"I love dancing but dancing, night after night isn't so easy as it sounds. Whether you are tired or not, whether you like your partner or not, you must dance. I couldn't be pleasant to people half of the time, and that was bad for my income. There was nobody to whom I could look for help."

And so Vida Britton tried to drown herself.

ranks while the old union is numerically many times stronger its fight cannot consist exclusively of a frontal attack against the U. M. W. A., but of the mobilization of the broadest possible sections of the miners to conduct a struggle against the offensive of the employers and the betrayals of the officialdom. For this a two-sided policy is necessary: the extension and consolidation of the National Miners Union on the one hand and the establishment of a firm base in the ranks of the old union on the other.

Under the new conditions that have been created, the N. M. U., particularly in view of the fact that its generally weakened position throughout the industry has been further aggravated by the Illinois defeat, must in all fields where the U. M. W. A. embraces the majority of the miners—and particularly where the check-off system prevails—maintain and constitute itself as a Left wing in the U. M. W. A. without at the same time dissolving the N. M. U. In Illinois, this is especially imperative because of the practical "illegality" of the N. M. U. and the conditions of check-off that prevail. The organization of a Left wing minority in the U. M. W., especially in Illinois, has a favorable basis and is necessary as a counter-agent to disintegrating tendencies.

3. The Coming Convention of the N. M. U.

The Left wing at the coming convention of the N. M. U. in Pittsburgh should set for itself the goal of re-uniting the miners on a national scale in a single organization. This does not exclude but presupposes temporary agreements with progressives and semi-progressives, which is one of the most effective means of establishing broad contacts in the ranks and advancing the interests of the workers and its most progressive vanguard. The elements in and around the N. M. U. must establish connections with the new movement in Illinois and push it persistently to the Left. They must demand of Howat, Brophy and others who base themselves on the progressive-minded workers, that they express themselves on the record and program of Farrington-Fishwick-Walker, and separate themselves from the latter. The Left wing must put to the progressives—in formal public statements and by widespread agitation in the ranks—the question of their position on various issues: Democracy in the union; National vs. local and district agreements; the organization of the unorganized miners and a fight for regaining their lost standards; the reinstatement of expelled miners; the Lewis plan to run 300,000 miners out of the industry; the right to independent thought and action and expression for minority groupings; independent working class political action, etc., etc. By working in the ranks of the miners along this line, the Left wing will clarify the situation; it will be able to draw the miners to its side and prevent them from falling under the complete influence of the Fishwick-Farrington machine and those who support and strengthen it in any way.

There are, however, certain pre-requisites for such a drive, which must be accomplished by the N. M. U. Pittsburgh convention. The N. M. U. must become a forum for the rank and file members, who should be made to feel that it is their union. The N. M. U. must declare for the unity of the Left wing, which means that all elements must be given full opportunity for participation and expression of their views. Up till now, the party leaders in control of the union have used it for a faction battlefield against their party opponents. A united Left wing, however, is a pre-condition for a successful influencing of the new movement. The N. M. U. must throw overboard the whole narrow line with which it has been operating, arbitrarily foisted upon it by the party leadership, and certain if persisted in, to doom it to a futile sectarian existence. If the Left wing is to fight successfully for trade union democracy in the U. M. W. A. it must first establish such a regime in the N. M. U. This does not exist today. All opponents and critics of the Party policy are mercilessly crushed without the interests of the workers and their union being considered. The N. M. U. must reject the party theory of purely mechanical, strangulating control of the unions by the C. P., and replace it with ideological and comradely guidance, advice, influence and aid of the working class party. The present relations of the Party to the union only plays into the hand of the Lewis-Green-Gompers theory of "no politics in the union" (i. e., for capitalist politics in reality) or into the hands of the "pure and simple industrial unionists" (I. W. W. anti-political actionists).

Not only the convention, but the Left wing miners now, must reject the course proposed in the T. U. U. L. Board statement, (Daily Worker, February 20, 1930), which states: "The T. U. U. L. calls upon the miners to quit the Lewis organization and to eliminate Fishwick and his whole crew of 'progressive' fig leaves. Send no delegates to this fake convention." That is no method of eliminating Lewis and Fishwick, but of strengthening their position. The Left wing miners must, on the contrary, send as many delegates to the proposed convention as possible, establish a Left wing bloc there, force the progressive leaders to the wall on the burning issues of the day, and challenge Fishwick and Co. for the confidence of the miners. The proposal to leave Fishwick an open, unhampered field at this convention must be repudiated out of hand by the Left wing.

The Left wing is confronted by the most serious tasks. Its present line is a rope around its neck that must be ruthlessly cut before it chokes the breath of the movement among the miners. A new course must be steered. The Left wing must rise to its task and be capable of mastering it.

The members of the Communist League in the mining industry, and the non-party militants co-operating with them, have before them now exceptional opportunities and responsibilities. In carrying their work forward it is particularly necessary for the Opposition Communists to bear in mind the differentiation and relation of forces within the Left wing as well as within the miners movement as a whole. The Left wing, organized primarily in the National Miners Union with all its defects and weaknesses, and the false policies of its leadership, is the main dynamic force for progress in the industry. The adherents of the Communist Opposition are but a faction—at present a small faction—of the organized Left wing. From this follows the central task of the Opposition Communists: to struggle within the Left wing to unite it on this program. All provocation and slander, aimed to isolate them from the organized Left wing, must be met with a deeper penetration of it. This work within the ranks of the National Miners Union goes hand in hand with the widest possible proclamation of these views in the ranks of the U. M. W. A. and independent agitation for them.

By steering a firm and steady course as Bolshevik fighters along these lines the Opposition Communists in the mining fields can bound forward. They can render great service to the interests of the miners and bring a new prestige to the banner of Communism which has been sullied by the Party bureaucrats. Conscientious work for the policy indicated in this statement is the road to this accomplishment.

Operators Speed-Up Illinois Coal Diggers

SPRINGFIELD, Ill.—Speedup in Illinois mines is on the increase month by month, according to official state figures. For January the statistics show that more coal was dug than in December. This was done with fewer miners employed than in December. And each miner worked fewer days in January than in December. When an Illinois coal miner told Michigan college professors three years ago that the mine was turned into a "goddam factory" that was only a very modest beginning of the underground speedingup.

The actual figures are given by state director of mines and minerals John G. Milhouse as follows: Tons of coal dug in Illinois in December, 6,415,838 in January, 6,590,275; number of miners employed in December, 51,265, in January, 50,664; average days employed per miner in December, 29.1, in January 19.7 days.

Ten men were killed and 1,399 were injured seriously enough to keep them from work a day or more in January mine accidents in the state, the director adds.

HAMMOND, Ind.—Stingy hands and electricians in union theaters in Hammond, East Chicago and Indiana Harbor won a raise of $2.50 a week to $72.50. Operators were raised $16.25 a week to $95.

BATTLE CREEK, Mich.—Union painters have won a 5c increase to 85c an hour in a contract with the employers as-

WAR'S GLORY

By Peter Hansen

Brr...brr...went the field telephone in the dugout in trench No.—, where a group of Russian officers shivered in the cold of an early morning of the winter of 1915. Brr...went the telephone, and the operator lost no time in answering it.

"Lieutenant Orloff!" he called out. "Division Headquarters on the wire."

A tall, blond fellow with a mild peasant face that harmonized little with his military bearing strode forward and seized the receiver, frowning. He listened intently for a moment, and his face cleared as he wrote down the message:

"At eight o'clock sharp you will attack enemy trench No.—. Two hours of artillery preparation will clear the wire entanglements. Occupy the trenches and hold them at any cost."

"Thank God!" he exclaimed. "We're going into action." Similar cries of relief came from the assembled group, and one after another the officers leaped to their feet to receive their orders. The Lieutenant, breathing quickly, read off the message.

"It's just five minutes of six," he concluded, consulting his watch. "You've got two hours to get the boys ready. Each man to his post now." They saluted him gravely and turned to go.

"Just a moment!" he called. "There's one thing more." He smiled. "See that all the men have a good stiff drink before we go into action. They're going to need it."

The smile still lingered on his face as he entered the trench for his morning inspection. The dawn was breaking and the forms of a long line of khaki-clad men, still shivering from the night's intense cold, were just barely visible. Orloff spoke a few encouraging words as his men saluted, but as he passed along a little inward voice kept asking: How many of you are going to be missing at the next inspection? To Orloff his men were not inferiors, but fellow-fighters in a common cause.

Inspection over, he returned to the dugout, listening intently the while for the familiar booming of the Russian artillery from the lines in the rear. It would announce the beginning of the engagement, but now, at ten minutes after six, it was already overdue. "Two hours are hardly enough to destroy the entanglements," Orloff muttered to himself. "And still they are delaying." Scarcely able to contain himself, he re-entered the trench, and another quarter of an hour passed while he strove to hide his gnawing agitation. His subordinate officers looked toward him as if to question him, but military discipline held them back.

Orloff had kept up a nervous pacing. At seven o'clock he came to a halt, took off his cap, and wiped the sweat from his brow. He could hear the roar of cannon in the far-off distance but from his own sector not a sound.

"My God! Only one more hour," he groaned. "What can the matter be?"

He hurried into the dugout. "Was there a call from headquarters?" he asked the operator.

No, sir. Not a word," was the reply.

Orloff turned away. His face was pale with rage and fear, and as he raised his field-flask to his lips his hand shook.

"Some more of their damn blunders—that we must pay for with our lives," he wheeled around again to say. With this he rushed out into the trench. But in a moment he was back. A look of dumb appeal on countless human faces was more than he could bear. He took the telephone receiver in his hand. He hesitated but a moment. Then, "Damn the discipline," he said aloud, and when a voice answered his ring his voice had the same edge of angry protest in its tone.

"What's the delay?" he demanded. "I am to go over the top at eight and the artillery hasn't started firing yet."

"Orders have been given," came the reply. The voice was a grey monotone.

"But what am I to do?" protested Orloff.

"Obey orders," mechanically returned the voice, and there followed a sharp click as the receiver at Division Headquarters was hung up.

The soul of Lieutenant Orloff was at that moment a battlefield; and his face showed it. There the unquestioning obedience of the seasoned soldier fought with the passionate revolt of youth faced with death for himself and his comrades. Once more Lieutenant Orloff hurried into the trench; once more he faced the mute glances of his men.

Second Lieutenant Osol saluted him

"What's the order?"

Their eyes met. All too well they understood each other. But Lieutenant Orloff resumed the military mask.

"You have your orders. Eight o'clock. All the men to carry snipers. Wire snipers...is that clear?"

Osol repeated the order and withdrew. Orloff looked despairingly at his watch. Only ten minutes of the hour remained. His glance swept up and down the ranks of men, waiting, with fixed bayonets, for him to give the signal. He thought of what awaited them and a sob of pity tore at his throat.

Sharp on the hour of eight he raised his signalling whistle to his lips. A shrill note rolled along the line and with a shout, "For the Czar and the Fatherland," Orloff leaped out of the trench. A thousand voices echoed the cry as the Russians followed their leader. A short and furious run across No Man's Land and they had reached the wire entanglement.

"Down and cut through," shouted Orloff, panting for breath.

"Ra-ta-ta-ta," answered the German machine guns, and the Russians began to drop, while those who escaped the bullets cut feverishly at the wires. Terrific explosions now began to sound from the rear of the German lines and shells to plow the ground around the attackers. A shell burst over the head of Lieutenant Orloff and his face contorted with fury.

"Damn you!" he shouted. "Damn you! You're two hours too late!"

His men wavered. They were caught in a curtain of fire, the barrage from their own cannon. Their retreat was cut off.

"Forward!" shouted Orloff, and his order was repeated down the line. Again the men threw themselves upon the wire entanglement. In cutting through it lay their only hope.

"Ra-ta-ta-ta-ta!" The enemy's machine guns ceaselessly spit death. Boom! Boom! Boom! Boom! and the Russian shells burst over their heads, raining deadly fragments among them.

Ramloff was on his knees, the blood streaming down his face. He staggered to his feet and shook his fists toward the Russian lines.

Fools! Murderers! You have betrayed us!"

"Ra-ta-ta-ta-ta!" And Orloff crumbled up.

"Boommoooooooooooo!" roared the Russian artillery, tearing up the wire entanglements.

Too late...Forever too late!...For Lieutenant Orloff and his men obeyed orders.

The efforts of "Prosperity President" Hoover, Big Business, and industry in general, and other agencies to hide the acute conditions among the working masses caused by unemployment already directly affecting seven million workers, are of no avail. Figures and reports from all parts of the country show wide distress and misery in a situation that has become now worse than the depression of 1920 and 1921. Charity flops are overcrowded; black coffee and cheap bread are the luxury doles handed out to those who wait in the long lines of mission houses, charity institutions, etc. Capitalism cannot employ men and women willing and able to work, and so millions of human beings must suffer cold and hunger. Not a single copper cent of their unearned increment will the rich masters give up without the compulsion of the mass pressure of the workers. That is the way of the capitalist system—the system of the claw and fang.

Protests and demonstrations of the unemployed masses in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Minneapolis and many other cities throughout the country are met with clubs and black-jacks, guns and tear gas, police wagons and jailings of working men and women and their children. It is government—the government of the American ruling class—the Wall Street bosses—in action. Thus they try to maintain dominion over the masses. With cohesive organization of all their forces they meet the protests of the workers.

Capitalist society cannot eliminate unemployment. Only a social system serving the interests alone of the proletariat and exploited peoples can lay the basis for the elimination of unemployment, exploitation, misery and degradation of the masses. Only in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics has the basis been laid for cooperative work on behalf of the producers. The working masses in the United States also must have as their objective the abolition of the capitalist system and its replacement by a Workers' Republic.

Join Unemployment Demonstrations on March 6th

But today mass unemployment, the problem of the masses to exist is a pressing consideration. The unemployed and employed, the workers organized in labor unions and the unorganized workers, men and women, white and colored—all must unite in protest and action to demand of the bosses that exploit them and the government that protects them—work or compensation; shorter hours of labor to provide work for the unemployed; abolition of the speed-up system that saps the energies of the workers and leaves them worn out and useless at an early age.

All elements among labor, no matter what their particular economic or political views, if sincerely wishing to endeavor to relieve the distress prevalent among all strata of the working masses can find a basis for united action against the common enemy—the wealthy employing class and their governmental hirelings. Sectarianism and aim for group advantage can do only harm. The problem of mass unemployment will face the workers for a long time to come—till the overthrow of capitalism lays the basis for its elimination. From industry and government can be forced certain measures of relief, provided there is militant united action.

Demonstrations have been conducted in many cities already under the direction of organizations, including the Communist League of America (Opposition).

On March 6th demonstrations against unemployment and for relief of the unemployed will be held in cities throughout the United States and in other countries similarly affected. They are under the auspices of the Trade Union Unity League in the United States. We have spoken before of the narrowness of the movement sponsored by the official Communist party and the T. U. U. L., and its failure to endeavor to develop a genuine and broad united front movement for the unemployed. We shall have occasion to speak of it yet again, including the adventurism in calling for strike action in the height of the depression.

On March 6th, however, all militants and Communists, workers of every shade and opinion should make it their business to get into the demonstrations wherever they are held; to help broaden them; to protest as one body against the scourge of capitalism—unemployment; and to demand work or compensation.

"In the name of the rank and file!" This is the pretentious claim of the call issued for a convention of the United Mine Workers to meet at Springfield Ill. on March 10. The call is by a self-constituted organization committee, the main body of which is made up of the Fishwick Farrington Illinois union administration under the Lewis regime.

With the exception of Howat, Brophy and Derchy, who have at certain times in the past upheld the standard of militant struggle and fought against the destructive, treasonable policy of John L. Lewis, the other signatories to the call have all, during these years not only indorsed the whole of Lewis' policy, but actively carried it out in every one of its treasonable acts.

The destiny of the rank and file coal miners lies in their own hands and theirs is the task, now more than ever, to act, and to act in their own interest. Militancy and courageous self-sacrifice by the coal miners everywhere gained union conditions for them in the past. Militancy and a knowledge of what needs to be done will show the way out now. To the rank and file this convention can become another opportunity to extend the struggle so well fought in the past. It will become so only by courageous action on their part to put a stop forever to the sell-out policy of the officialdom which has brought the union to almost complete destruction and forced degradation upon the miners.

Immediate Needs of Miners

At innumerable times the coal miners have given voice to their burning needs and decisively brought forth their demands. They are yet to be translated into action and no opportunity should be lost sight of. Again it is necessary for the militants among the rank and file to point the way to united struggle for severance with all the corruption of the past and with all those who have served as the tools of the operators. To take up the struggle aggressively against any further wage reductions; for a minimum wage scale and for control of operation of machine mining by the workers; to eliminate the deadly speed-up and divide the work among the miners; to fight for the shorter workday so as to afford employment for all and to organize the coal miners in every field.

Audacity and militancy in every working class organization and the battle is half won. This is the particular task of progressive and Left wing coal miners to thus show the way.

Send Delegates to March 10th Convention

The progressive and Left wing miners should send the largest possible number of delegates to this convention to endeavor to compel a genuine struggle for these immediate demands and needs of the coal miners. The Left wing, organized in the National Miners Union, has a two-fold task: to strengthen and extend their own independent organization, and, at the same time, to build a Left wing in the U. M. W. of A. The Left wing, the N. M. U., must demand from the progressives—Howat, Brophy, etc.—a stand on the numerous burning issues confronting the miners. The program and declaration of policy presented by the Communist League of America (Opposition) in the March 1st issue of the Militant indicates the path the coal miners of America need to take for the revival of a militant miners' movement and organization.

FLOOD CONTROL CONTRACTORS GYP NEGRO LABORERS

MEMPHIS—(FP)—How U. S. government contractors gyp Negro laborers is revealed by workers employed in the "willow fleets" that ply out of Memphis to work on Mississippi flood control. The willow fleets make the willow mats for the levees.

Hundreds of colored workers employed on these ships are paid off daily in flimsy paper checks redeemable only at the ship's commissary. These checks, printed with weak ink, soon become smudged and illegible. In that condition, the company refuses to redeem them. The laborer then loses the money due him. At the end of the trip, the Negroes present their checks but receive cash only for those which are in good condition.

STALIN PERSECUTES RAKOVSKY

At the same time that Stalin, in order to face the difficulties accruing from his peasant politics, again and again makes use of the proposals of the Opposition, but in distorted form, or resorts to dangerous ultra-Leftism; when events have confirmed the analyses of the Opposition, he becomes more and more brutal to the members of the Left Opposition who persist in understanding and representing the clear tactics of the proletarian revolution.

Yesterday it was the assassination of Blumkin. Today we receive the most alarming news concerning the health of comrade Rakovsky.

Christian Rakovsky is weakened by malaria and is ill with serious heart trouble. The doctors most categorically ordered a stay in the Caucasus. The political Bureau refused. Deported together with his sick wife to the Siberian winter, Rakovsky at Barnaul is exposed to the most miserable living conditions, to temperatures of 40 and 50 degrees below zero. Our comrade has recurrently suffered from most alarming heart crises.

In addition the usual tactics made use of to exterminate the Opposition—the difficult conditions and hunger—have been directed at him. They have destroyed his means of livelihood in refusing him the historic work which he was fitted for.

The working class remembers the role played by Rakovsky, latterly in France where he represented the proletarian state as Soviet Ambassador. That was before the united fury of the reactionary Le Matin of Paris and the hatred of Stalin resulted in his replacement by the clumsy Dogalevsky, aided by the traitor, Bessedovsky. The working class, particularly in the Soviet Union, the Ukraine, in France, know well Rakovsky's heroic and valorous life, completely devoted to the Revolution. He has remained steadfast and inflexible to the Bolshevik ideal in the face of the fury of the Stalinist degeneration.

The bureaucrats of the Secretariat are preparing a new assassination. But the workers will not permit the cruel persecution of one of the most tried and valuable fighters, for his devotion to their cause, for his high-minded firmness.

Over 8,000,000 Women Toil at Low Wages

According to the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor there are 8,500,000 women wage earners in this country at the present time. Their figures assert that one woman out of every five works in the mills, factories, stores and offices throughout the land; and that out of every five workers in the country one is a woman.

These figures compiled under the direction of the capitalist government of the United States show how important is the winning of the women workers to the labor movement. With 20% of all the workers women, the need of actively drawing them into the labor movement is of major importance.

Throughout the United States, the women workers are the lowest paid and most exploited section of the proletariat. The employers in the unorganized industries are in very many cases, discharging the men workers and hiring women to do the same work at much reduced rates of pay. In addition, the employers are attempting to force the women to toil long hours, in which they are quite successful although some states have adequate laws that are supposed to prevent the women from working more than a certain amount of hours weekly. It has been shown in many cases

THE COMING PATERSON STRIKE

The National Textile Workers Union is planning a general strike of the Paterson silk workers within several weeks. Since the Passaic struggle of four years ago which laid the basis for the present organization of the N. T. W. U., there has been no outstanding New Jersey strike. After the Associated Silk Workers Union was split, the N. T. W. conducted a strike of several hundred workers for more than a month.

The N. T. W. is largely known to the silk workers of Paterson through the Passaic strike of 1926, led by the Left wing now organized into the N. T. W. The Paterson workers aided this heroic struggle of the Passaic strikers by raising funds for the relief of the strikers.

At present, as a consequence of the split in the Associated Silk Workers and the weak organization drive conducted in Paterson since then, the N. T. W. has several hundred members signed up. It is upon these forces that the N. T. W. is basing the proposed strike.

Better Preparations Are Needed

As things stand now, unless more thorough preparations are made before the strike is called, it will be virtually still-born, even as was the recent N. M. U. strike in Illinois and other even more bombastic "strikes" that have been called by unions directed by the Communist Party officialdom.

The attitude of the entire apparatus of the N. T. W. U. is one of disregard for preparation. It is further, wholly inefficient to care for its tasks properly. As national secretary of the N. T. W. now rests one Clarence Miller, a stupid, lazy careerist, who has a long record for inefficiency and laxness in the Young Communist League, the Passaic strike, etc. But he will take any and all orders of the Stalinized Foster-Minor, et al, Communist Party apparatus.

The N. T. W. has held but very few mass meetings and distributed hardly any literature, as well as taking other organizational steps, in preparation for its proposed general strike. The Paterson local of the N. T. W. is headed by Kushinsky, a colorless and unqualified worker for such a task as the local leader of a big strike. His "qualifications", as with most Stalinist officials, is the readiness to take orders without question. A prerequisite to any successful work among the textile workers by the N. T. W. U. is the removal of incompetents and untrained people such as Miller and Kushinsky. The rank and file of the union need to have a say in the selection of their officials and the conduct of any contemplated activity.

With a proposed strike of the proportions of a general strike of all Paterson silk workers, there is need of far more adequate and detailed preparations. To call the strike in the near future, as planned and with the "leaders" in charge, dooms the strike before the first day is over. Mass meetings, shop meetings, systematic distribution of literature; a rank and file strike committee, the sound formulation of a set of demands of the strikers are among the preparations that yet need to be made. The Stalinists cannot be permitted to play with strikes for the sake of records and the verification of the "third period". The conditions of the Paterson silk workers have steadily worsened. There is need for a movement and struggle that will bring about a strong and large organization of the silk workers and gain them better conditions of livelihood, more wages and shorter hours.

Miner's Death Toll Mounts

By Federated Press

Coal mine workers' death toll in 1929 was 2,181, according to figures on fatal accidents just released by the U. S. Bureau of Mines. This is an increase of five over the number of deaths in 1928. Besides these men killed on the job, more than 120,000 workers suffered an injury involving loss of working time. Every week 42 men are killed and more than 2,000 injured in or about coal mines of the United States.

In spite of safety campaigns, the death rate in bituminous mines has been higher since 1921 than it was for several years previously. It is now higher than the death rate in the anthracite, although this has also risen above the low points touched in 1924 and 1926.

Mine workers in the United States face a death hazard about twice that of German miners, about three times that of British or Belgian miners, about four times that of French miners. In the American mines out of every ten thousand full time workers more than 40 are killed on the job in the course of a year; in Great Britain, less than 15.

Even the mining companies enrolled in the National Safety Competition in the United States, have brought their average death rate only about one-fourth below the average death rate in other mines. The hazard for workers of all these selected companies is still far greater than the hazard for miners in European countries.

Explosions and mine fires that slaughter many workers in one disaster have been fewer in recent years. But the explosion two months ago at McAlester, Okla., the disaster at Kinloch mine, Parnassus, Pa., a year ago, the Mather disaster which killed 195 men in 1928, and others only less horrible that have found their way into the headlines, remind us that advances in the technique of safety are too largely confined to the laboratory. Many mines are still operated in such a way that an explosion of gas and coal dust can sweep through the workings and kill instantly all the men who are underground.

But spectacular disasters carry off only a small fraction of the miners who are killed on the job. While they have been decreasing, the daily, unnoted tragedies have continued to roll up a stupendous total. About 2,000 workers a year are caught in these "trifling" accidents that never reach the city press.

Mine Owners Concerned Only with Profits

More than half of all the coal mine deaths in 1929 were due to falls of rock or coal. These falls of rock and side go on steadily, crushing out one or two lives at a time—rarely as many as five men together—and slaughtering more than a thousand workers in the course of every year. The death rate from these falls is steadily higher than it was before 1920, a direct result of wage-cutting and speeding up within the mine. Timbering at the working face to make the roof safe for the workers is in most mines "dead work" for which the unorganized miner commonly receives no pay. Companies making a drive to cut down the death rate from falls of roof usually stiffen up the rules and standards for timbering but do not set up a fair rate of pay for the timbering. So the workers continue to take chances—driven to it; even in "safety" mines.

Haulage accidents underground have also in recent years killed more mine workers than the big disasters. Increase in motor haulage has pushed up the death rate from this cause, especially in bituminous mines. Electricity is in general an increasing hazard underground. Power lines imperfectly protected lead to electrocutions from direct contact. Electric machinery is in use in which the making and breaking of the current flashes a dangerous arc—an explosion hazard as serious as the open lights which are now banned in many mines.

REGISTRATION OF ALIENS FOUGHT
NEW YORK—A campaign to prevent the passage of any form of legislation registering aliens in the United States has been undertaken by the American Civil Liberties Union in cooperation with other organizations following the action of the Senate Immigration Committee in voting to report favorably the voluntary registration bill introduced by Senator Cole Blaise. The bill has been temporarily referred back to the committee through the efforts of Senator Copeland of New York. It is expected that the issue will be fought out on the floor of the Senate. Two compulsory registration bills are pending in the House.

The Union is opposed to any scheme of registration whatever, on the ground that it is "a monstrous scheme of espionage conceived by would-be patriots fearful of alien radicals, and useful chiefly to persecute alien members of trade unions and the Communist Party".

CAB MEN REJECT SCAB TERMS

By ARTHUR G. McDOWELL

PITTSBURGH—Another effort to break the taxi drivers' new union, strikeborn and tested in conflict with the Parmelee Transportation Co., was defeated by the strikers themselves when they rejected a proposed settlement, 1,153 to 1.

Cramming the roof garden of Moose Temple to the doors, the taxi men in the largest meeting held since the beginning of the strike rejected almost unanimously the proposal that they abandon their union and receive in return certain wage concessions. The taxi monopoly agreed to a 37 1-2% commission, abolition of fines, damage costs and special charges but opposed recognition of the union.

Sensing before the meeting that the unionists would not tolerate a non-union agreement, Parmelee once more started recruiting of scabs. Mayor Kline's order banning Parmelee scab cabs from the streets still holds, but the company is expected to win a court order with the aid of the state public service commission to permit their appearance.

This commission, headed by a former Mellon Standard Steel Car Co. lawyer, has consistently refused to permit smaller taxi companies to operate, although they have been able to guarantee service through recognizing the union.

A big benefit entertainment was held at a Pittsburgh theater through the solidarity of unionized theatrical workers who contributed 2 acts of vaudeville and all stage, electrical and musical labor involved. The entire city is alive to the challenge to Mellon control of the great open shop iron and steel center. From nearly every variety of organization—including religious—contributions are coming to the strike chest.

The union is maintaining an emergency taxi service for hospitals and similar agencies. "Union Car" signs are seen on the streets constantly as emergency vehicles go about their work with union sanction. The union is thus maintaining a successful taxi service for the city's minimum needs.

The Proletarian Revolution and the Shooting of Blumkin

By MARTIN ABERN

Lenin died. No sooner had the leader of the Bolshevik Revolution and of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union closed his eyes in eternal sleep, then began the open and systematic revision of the basic theoretical principles and conceptions of Marx and Lenin. Coupled with this revisionism, the Stalinist regime also undertook the falsification of the history of the Russian Revolution.

For a period of years now, since and before the death of Lenin, Stalin and his scribblers, the Yaroslavskys, Thaelmanns, Fosters, Minors, Cachins and numerous others have lied about Lenin and his teachings. They lie about Trotsky. They have falsified and distorted the history of the greatest event of all time for the toiling masses—the proletarian revolution of Russia. They have disfigured the Revolution in a grotesque and shameful manner.

With a procedure completely out of line with the practice of Lenin and the Bolsheviks, the Stalinist Centrists jointly with the Right wing, suppressed the views and Platform of the Russian Opposition, led by L. D. Trotsky, the platform that represents the continuation of the Bolshevik line of Lenin. They have persecuted the revolutionary Leninist-Bolsheviks; they have expelled the outstanding Communists, with services of many years to the revolutionary movement from the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. Stalin and his followers have made a mockery of ideas and theory and independent Bolshevik thought.

The Five Year Plan

The regime of the bureaucrats has exiled to far-off and desolate points the Bolsheviks who fought against the Stalin-Bucharin policy that gave encouragement and support to the Kulaks and Nepmen and that were sapping and undermining the strength of the proletariat and poor peasants and hired men.

Trotsky, after a long struggle against the revisionism of Stalin-Bucharin, presented the Platform of the Opposition to the XVth Congress of the C. P. S. U. in 1927 which, among other things contained the FIVE YEAR PLAN for socialist construction in the Soviet Union. But Trotsky finds himself deported by Stalin and Bucharin from the Soviet Union to Kemal Pasha's land at Constantinople, Turkey, there to be in continual danger of assassination by the thousands of Russian White Guards that swarm about Constantinople. Because Leon Trotsky remained and remains a Bolshevik; because in the suppressed (in the Soviet Union) Platform of the Opposition, he insisted upon the revival of genuine workers' and Party democracy and upon a campaign against the growing bureaucracy in the Party, the trade unions and in the Soviets; because he and the Opposition demanded the adoption of an INDUSTRIALIZATION PROGRAM that would develop industry along modern lines as the technical and economic foundation for genuine socialist construction; because he stressed and fought for a systematic and widespread development of COLLECTIVE AND SOVIET FARMS; and because he demanded an end to the policy of Stalin-Bucharin that encouraged the Kulak, gave him economic strength, the Right-Center bloc (Stalin-Bucharin) deposed Trotsky and increased their persecutions of Bolshevik-Leninists.

The Bureaucracy and the Working Class

But the neglect of the basic interests of the city proletariat and the hired hands and poor peasants by the Stalinist regime caused wide-spread dissatisfaction in the C. P. S. U. and among the working masses. Under the pressure of the working masses and the Bolshevik Opposition, the Stalinist Center was compelled, after many years of joint policy and work, to break the Right-Center bloc and to undertake another zig-zag, a "New Turn" to the Left. The Opposition Platform is now being adopted in piece-meal fashion by the Party bureaucracy. The turn is in the proper direction, but unless the "Leftward" swing is carried through with genuine belief and conviction; unless the turn is accompanied by an analysis of the present relationship of class forces in the Soviet Union, so that the strength and possibilities of struggle of each class grouping are understood and measures applied in accordance by the Party; unless the industrialization and collective and Soviet farms program is linked with a campaign to advance the cultural and political consciousness of the working masses and poor peasants (retarded in recent years by the policies of the Stalin-Bucharin regime)—the Five Year Plan can easily defeat its own purpose.

There is no doubt that the ranks of the Communist Party and the mass of workers in the Soviet Union welcome the new course of the Party. Therefore, the Opposition correctly warns against eclectic, piec-meal adaption, arbitrary selections from the Platform of the Opposition by the bankrupt Stalinists. A genuine Left course can only mean the adoption of the Opposition Platform as a whole, and the reinstatement of the Opposition to help carry out the Left turn.

Stalin Splits the Communist Movement

Stalin and Bucharin not only in Russia, but on an international scale, split and decimated the ranks of the Communist Parties and converted them into factions. Behind the factions of Stalin and Bucharin in the C. P. S. U. particularly, stood the conscious and unconscious forces of the class enemy—the Kulak and the Nepmen. The Opposition warned and pointed this out, despite all oppression, and demanded that Stalin and Company change their course. It is sad to say, but it is the truth nevertheless: The Stalin apparatus-men, without definite principles or platform, swaying between the classes, the proletariat and the poor peasants on the one side and the Kulak and Nepmen on the other, for these past years carried out a Right program which objectively aided the return of the bourgeois forces to power. They could not see what was taking place in the class relations in the Soviet Union and many yet do not want to see.

It is only by recognizing that these epigones, Stalin and Company, have changed, for a time, their ways, but not their minds, that one can understand how the Centrist bureaucrats have proceeded from one backward step to another and have arrived at length at an extreme act—the murder of Blumkin at Stalin's behest. The person of Stalin cannot be removed from his policies and the policies cannot be removed from the personality of Stalin.

Lenin Rejects Stalin

Lenin years ago recognized what would come of the brutality and disloyalty of Stalin. A brutality and disloyalty that would affect not only the revolutionists themselves in a personal way, but would in time adversely affect the proletarian revolution itself. Lenin saw clearly the true Stalin—the splitter and wrecker of the international revolution, of the Communist International and the C. P. S. U. Lenin therefore in his final Testament to the Party, still suppressed in the Soviet Union, DEMANDED the REMOVAL of STALIN AS SECRETARY OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY. Lenin, in fact, finally found it necessary to cut off all comradely and hence political relations with Stalin. At the July Plenum of the Central Committee of the C. P. S. U. Zinoviev said:

"And the third warning consists of this: That at the beginning of the year 1923, Vladimir Ilyich, broke off all comradely relations with him (Stalin)." This speech refers to Lenin's letter of March 5th, 1923, written after Lenin's testament. But the Party membership has yet to hear of this.

Now, Trotsky is deported, and as the next step of the lost bureaucracy, the Bolshevik, Blumkin, a supporter of the Opposition has been shot upon Stalin's orders. This act is a personal act of Stalin, but it is also, and more important, an evidence of instability and lack of confidence of the Centrists in their latest zig-zag to the Left. Why has Blumkin been shot? Why was this crime against the Revolution committed? With us it is not a matter alone of the person of Blumkin, but rather where does such acts, and the approval of them lead.

The Daily Worker "Answers"

The Daily Worker, under the barrage of questions of the Militant and the indignation of large numbers of workers, has twice been compelled to "answer", but it yet has given no fitting reply. The Hearst-like scribblers of Stalin on the Daily Worker and the Communist Party first answered (Daily Worker, 2-15-30) by professing ignorance: "The name of Blumkin is little known." This was no answer at all. The Militant has fully told how Blumkin travelled the road to Bolshevism; how he became a trusted, active, loyal and leading member in the service of the Bolshevik Revolution. His work was of sufficient importance that not even his open adherence to the Opposition and to Trotsky brought his removal from his post. The murder of a Bolshevik, Blumkin, is accomplished for the first time by professing Bolsheviks, the Stalinists. How to explain such acts of terrorism against the Opposition Bolsheviks that one could expect only from White Guards? What is behind it all?

With utter irresponsibility they lie about Blumkin and speak of Blumkin's "flight" after July, 1918 to avoid being shot for his activities while he was yet a Left Social Revolutionary. They neglect to speak of his years of prominent work as a member of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, as an up-standing Bolshevik, holding an important post and carrying out his duties till the day of his murder by Stalin. Still the Daily Worker and the American Party perform one doubtful service. They endorse the shooting of Bolsheviks and take full responsibility thereof. All in the name of the "Five Year Plan" and "building socialism!"

The arguments of these Stalinists sycophants! What alone matters is the Five Year Plan and the building of socialism. How? By shooting Bolsheviks? By removing and deporting them? By removing those most capable to lead the proletariat and the Revolution? By suppressing the ideas and ignoring the thousands of comrades, men and women, who first brought forward a Five Year Plan, a program of industrialization and soviet and collective farms? That is the way to hinder, not to advance, the Proletarian revolution.

Rakovsky on the Centrists

Ch. Rakovsky, now exiled under bitter conditions at Barnaul raised this very question of the "New Turn" to the Left and makes an analysis of the class content of the turn now being executed by the Stalinist Centrists. He says:

"You (the Centrists) made a principally new and important step in the question of industrialization. But this step will not achieve your purpose if you will not make radical reforms in regard to the Party, the trade unions, and the Soviets. If you sincerely and seriously want to get on this road you must first of all reestablish the Opposition in the Party."

At the same time, Stalin now acknowledges (N. Y. Times, 2-23-30) that he is appropriating the program of L. D. Trotsky and the Opposition, and gives in extenuation the late excuse that Trotsky was "too early". So! We will not at this point argue the merits of "too early" or "late". But we put the question: Since when does being "too early" merit expulsion, persecution, imprisonment and death of Bolsheviks? It is rather, that Stalin and the Centrist apparatus are making a late turn, and then only under the pressure of the Opposition and the proletarian masses.

What Is to be Done?

There is imperative need for still another turn. Blumkin is dead—at the hand of Stalin. He cannot be brought back to life. But his death can yet serve the revolutionary cause. But the answer, further, lies with the proletariat and the worker-Communists whose only interests are service to the Revolution. They in increasing numbers will demand, as a tribute to Blumkin: RETURN L. D. TROTSKY AT ONCE TO THE SOVIET UNION; REESTABLISH HIM IN HIS RIGHTFUL POSITION AS A LEADER OF THE BOLSHEVIK REVOLUTION. And likewise, return all the Left Opposition once again to the Communist Parties. Reinstatement and the use of the services of the Opposition is the only guarantee for an honest and militant campaign to carry out the Five-Year Plan, to smash the Kulaks, to build anew and on its original revolutionary foundations, the Communist International and Communist Parties. The reinstatement of the Opposition lays the basis for a correct Bolshevik policy and program in the Soviet Union. This is our view of the Blumkin shooting.

«IN THE NAME OF GOD»

Every day that passes without a blow struck at the Soviet Union means for the imperialists a day wasted in promoting their own interests. "The Soviet Union must be destroyed." This is their hope and slogan. Their methods to accomplish this end have been many—and unsuccessful, and the workers will continue to see that any new schemes of the Black Hundreds everywhere are thwarted. Military intervention by U. S. Imperialism, Great Britain, France united with the counter-revolutionary movements of Deniken, Wrangel, et al, failed miserably in the face of the determined defense of the proletarian revolution by the workers of Russia. The round-about scheme of the Hoover Relief expedition (A. R. A.) in the period of the famine also failed miserably. The economic blockade was attempted by the capitalist powers in the endeavor to starve out the Revolution. They failed. In the Donetz Basin, foreign and bribed Russian specialists sabotaged the development of the area. That was exposed.

The Sick War-horse of Religion

Now the old, but failing war-horse, "religious persecution" is dragged out of the imperialist Augean stable; and on this mount the imperialists are placing their stakes and hope to ride to victory over the Workers' Republic.

No sooner did the Pope, that apostle of tolerance modeled after the Inquisitor Torquemada, issue his encyclical, than the whole religious tribe, Catholics, Jews, Protestants and all, took up the cry. The cynicism of these willing tools of their capitalist masters has no bounds. The world of religion is rallying to the defense of the Russian priests. In reply, it suffices only to point out the oppressive role played by the church under the Czar, their counter-revolutionary activities after the Bolshevik revolution, and now secretly to brand as hypocritical and lying the charges of "religious persecution" that are leveled by them at the Soviet Union. The workers of Russia have every reason to hate and despise religion and the church, but in spite of that, religion and the church have been tolerated so long as their supporters did not engage in counter-revolutionary practices against the Soviet Union, of which there have been all too many instances to need recounting.

The Opium of the People

The Soviet Union and the Communist Party rightfully regard religion as the "opium of the people", but it is fought through the methods of education and propaganda and not persecution. The latter way has been the way of religion and the church of all creeds. Theirs is the method of the medieval inquisition. Their practices and ideas, their support always of reaction and today of capitalism and all it stands for are becoming clearer to the Soviet masses through the dissemination of scientific knowledge and modern education in the Soviet Union. Hence the church and religion becomes ever less popular. That explains in the main why there are less churches and even less attendance in them as time passes. Its marked decline has come to the attention of the religious defenders and the imperialists, and they hope by lying and scandal-mongering to arouse among peoples in other countries a feeling of hatred against the Workers' Republic. In the corners of their mind is the hope of united effort of the imperialist powers to war on the Soviet Union. After all, in the pre-world war days there was first a preliminary propaganda of "virgin raping", "breast cutting" etc. Workers everywhere have the duty to combat this latest anti-Soviet campaign and to expose the combination of the bosses, the government, the church and the press to attack the Soviet Union.

The Policy of the Leadership and the Party Regime brought out the working class and the Party from its numbness, which was simultaneously a condition and a consequence of the rule of Centrism. Objectively Centrism is condemned by history. Precisely because of this, in its desire to preserve itself as a leading group, it takes measures in order to still more strengthen itself organizationally and ideologically. For that purpose it utilizes the gigantic power which the revolution concentrated in the hands of the party leadership. Centrism excluded and is still excluding the Rights from the leadership in the Trade Union and the Comintern, the Soviet and Party organizations, but only for the purpose of substituting Centrists for the Rights.

By CHRISTIAN RAKOVSKY

But what is most characteristic of the Centrist leadership is that with doubled and tripled energy it concentrated its severity against the Leninist Opposition, enriching daily its arsenal with new guns of compulsion. The most remarkable invention in this respect which was made after our platform had been written, is the invention which leaves its impression on the present epoch and which resurrects in the Soviet Union, the clerical methods of the Middle Ages. This is the effort to compel by all means that the Oppositionists of the Communist Party give up their Communist views (which was proven by the attitude towards the so-called "Left-Centrists"—Schatzkin, Sten, and others; the impatience of Centrism, has lately increased still more). Life proved the whole inconsistency of the Centrist ideologic zig-zags wrong and anti-Leninist ones.

But Centrism, having a monopoly on the press, continues to falsify the Leninist teachings and leads astray the Party and the working class by saying that it is not the Kulak that attacks us, but we attack the Kulak (Bauman, Molotov). The claim of the capitulators, that Centrism has changed although it still rests on the same ever-widening social base—the "functionaries" with a corresponding ideology, and its peculiar apparatus methods of ruling the country and the Party, only proves that the capitulators have lost all their theoretical conscience and have rolled themselves into the mud of Centrism. Because Centrism is condemned by history as a current not possessing the requisite qualities, and sooner or later will cease to be a determining factor in the life of the Party, the liquidation of the Leninist Opposition, its dissolution in the Centrist mud, would mean nothing else than the presentation of the power to the Rights. In betraying the Opposition, the capitulators betray the interests of Communism, the Party and the working class.

The Changes in Class Relations

The capitulators befog the capital question: what kind of a turn is taking place in relation to the class forces in the country? It is true, as we shall see, they sometimes talk about it, but then only when they have to sow panic in the midst of the Opposition. But ordinarily to them the turn in the country and the Party is covered by the turn in the policy of the Centrist leadership—which is of course not the same. The turn in the country continues to unfold unfavorably for the proletariat. There undoubtedly is a Left turn in the Party, but its reasons and character are distinguished from the turn in the leadership. For the Centrist leadership the turn towards the struggle with agrarian capitalism was a matter of compulsion. This is a turn of the bureaucratic group under the pressure of events but the turn in the Party—we have in mind the working section of it—is a class turn. But while the Center makes its Left steps on the agrarian question, with excuses adapting itself to the moment, the turn in the Party is a genuine revolutionary one.

The Centrist leadership conceals very carefully the contradictory processes going on in the country. One of the most harmful peculiarities of the Centrist leadership is to cover up the traces and to present every thing in a rosy light (everything goes from good to better). But it does not succeed in hiding everything. The loud scandals that occur periodically prove how far the decomposition of the Right-Center apparatus has gone in the Party as well as in the Soviets and Trade Unions. Beginning with the heights of the commissariats themselves and ending with the county committees bourgeois rust penetrates the pores of the proletarian dictatorship. The pri-

We give below another excerpt from the theses of Rakovsky, Okudjava and Kossior, which characterizes the economic policy of the Centrist leadership in connection with the Party regime. That the new five year plan, worked out under the whip of the Opposition, represents a big fact and an important support for the further struggle of the Opposition, only the pedants of the ultra-Left phrase can deny. On the other hand, the claim that the Five Year Plan removes all or even the basic differences, can only come from the capitulators, who have been waiting for an excuse to get on their knees. Rakovsky very correctly insists on the unbreakable bond and relationship of all the parts of our platform. In connection with this he gives the basis for the declaration of the opposition to the Central Committee, and over its head, to the Party.

The sense of the declaration in the interpretation of comrade Rakovsky is the following:

"You made a principally new and important step, in the question of industrialization. But this step will not achieve your purpose, if you will not on the one hand evaluate a series of theoretical assumptions, and on the other hand. If you will not make radical reforms in regard to the Party, the trade unions and the Soviets. If you sincerely and seriously want to get on this road you must first of all reestablish the Opposition in the Party." This political syllogism, the Opposition transformed into a political act, by presenting the declaration for its reestablishment on the Party. —Editors.

owner in the village have already succeeded in partly getting hold of the apparatus, subordinating it to their class interest.

Sometimes through the official material which presents a picture of general welfare and idyllic relations between the working class and our government, there breaks through like lightning through clouds, tragic facts, such as the murder and lynching at the Grivno Station which throw an instantaneous but clear light on the realities. The press had to register the words of the defense at the trial: "A passing quarrel occurred between the working class and the apparatus created by it". In the same newspaper, in the speeches of the prosecuting attorney, was noted the fact of passive and indifferent conduct of the Communists and Young Communists present in the mob during the wild lynching scene. If one can analyse politically the event at the Grivno Station, he will understand that it has a more symptomatic significance than one or another resolution at a Party conference. A no less symptomatic significance is the fact that a worker was boycotted by his craftsmen for joining the Communist Party, or the fact included in the report about organizational conditions in Bakinsk, where the falling off of workers reaches 25% of the number of applicants in a year. Workers leave the Party in spite of the fact that membership in it insures to a certain extent against the loss of one's job. As far as the moods of the village are concerned is significant to point out, that the results which were brought by the "chaotic character of the grain collections" resulted in the village in a bloc between the poor and middle peasants with the Kulaks.

Industrialization and the Classes

The capitulators try to single out the industrialization and the building of collective farms from the whole chain of Centrist measures—from its general policies. Considering them as a sort of "matters of their own" they also attempt to regard the "new course" of Centrism as independent of the immediate reasons that called it forth. Finally they avoid or befog the biggest and most basic questions: What conditions must be fulfilled that the industrialization and the building of collective farms shall not remain mere paper resolutions (like the resolution on Party democracy at the end of 1923), that it shall not be stopped half-way, or that they should not give results directly opposite to those expected.

The new Centrist servants and accountants, the capitulators, supporters of unprincipledness, and possibleism, avoid analysing the most important sides of the question of industrialization and the struggle against agrarian capitalism; knowing that an honest discussion of these questions would reveal the double facedness and contradictions of Centrism, its inability to get on the road of continuous Socialist construction. In reality such a discussion would have revealed that

1. The policy of Centrism remains Right on the Labor question and the Party regime (here it even went to the worst compared to the past) and partly in the village (not allowing unions of poor peasants).

The sharpening of the class struggle between the well-to-do and the poor peasants, the new law on food taxes, the raising of prices on grain which gave the well-to-do peasants an additional 350 million rubles; all this not only disturbs the industrialization and building of collective farms but puts it under the direct threat of a break-up.

2. The Left swing of the Center (industrialization, building of collective farms) is a compelled one—on the one hand, by the pressure of the Rights who wanted to sweep aside the Center with the aid of the Kulak and grain strikes, and on the other hand, by the pressure of the dissatisfaction of the working class, whose interests were hit by the grain strike; and finally by the pressure of the Leninist Opposition. The removal of the effect of the latter two factors would immediately create the condition for a new Right swing of the Center, either with the leaders remaining at the head, or by way of removing the present leaders of that part of the Party which follows the Right leaders.

3. The only real guarantees against a new recession of the Center to the Right is the Leninist Opposition which consistently expresses the interests of the proletariat and the village poor.

The Five Year Plan

The capitulators consider the five year plan from the arithmetic viewpoint exclusively, not taking into consideration, even from such an approach, that as a result of inflation and the drop of the buying power of the Chervonetz, the figure of investments is in reality much smaller than the five year plan shows. They leave out the main question: what change in the class relations in the country will the five year plan bring? This "oversight" on the part of Radek and Company is fully understood insofar as the five year plan is the fig leaf to cover up their capitulation. Meanwhile here is what a coeditor of the official organ of the Gosplan Planned Economy" (Strumlin) is compelled to admit. If the Five Year Plan will be realized fully—at the end of five years the rise of the per capita national income will be 51% in the city, 52% in the village and 40% for the well-to-do part of the village. However, this is under the condition of the stabilization of prices on agricultural products on the level of 114%, that is 14% higher than in 1927-28. Meantime the index of the private agricultural sector has risen 37.9% in only this one year.

Further, the actual income of the worker (city) is supposed to go up by the end of the five years by 58%, but the productivity of the worker is supposed to rise 100-110%. At the same time, the village, through only the difference in prices, will get 3.5 billion rubles, and in the government expenditures for industrialization only about 10% will be allotted. The growth of wages in the first part of this year amounted to 7.1%, but the price index of the collectivized sector went up 8.5%, private, 19.3% and the agricultural, as we already saw, 37.9%. The conclusion: the center of gravity of the wealthy part of the village in the general economics of the country will grow further, notwithstanding the talk about the struggle against agrarian capitalism.

Without unions of poor peasants, the political influence of the wealthy peasantry and the Nepmen in the city and the well-to-do will grow to a still greater degree, insofar as the Kulak will continue to group about himself the middle peasants and part of the poor. Further, the bureaucratic methods of rationalization, with the aid of administrative pressure, "blacklisting" and tricks of a la Larin may create such a break away of the working class from the Party, such a political minus, which it will be impossible to compensate by the best achievements of industrialization. The Party leadership expects to support itself on the groups of poor in the village, but the latter are a mere fiction. "There is almost no work conducted among the groups of poor" wrote one of the members of the collegium of the Commissariat of Agriculture, Latzis (Pravda, December 23, 1928). Another fact: In Siberia there are 15 thousand cooperatives, and in them there are only 266 groups of poor organized (figures by Komarov, member of the territory committee.)

Centrists Fear Workers and Poor Peasants

In regard to the working class as well as the peasant poor, Centrism continues its former policy of fear and lack of confidence—this is a feature of bureaucracy generally. Centrism fears the real participation of the laboring masses in Socialist construction. Of course it would like to support itself on them, but with the conditions that the masses should not occupy themselves with "politics", that is, shall not judge and what is more, criticize the "general line". Centrism kills the actual initiative of the masses. If under the influence of sharpening struggle in the village Centrism should be compelled to permit unions of peasant poor, it will put them under such bureaucratic supervision, that they would very rapidly resemble our trade unions, out of which bureaucracy has castrated the class and revolutionary content. Industrialization and a struggle with agrarian capitalism, directed by the apparatus, which is partly worn off and which has lost its revolutionary enthusiasm and in many of its links is decomposed, will be under constant threat of break-up.

The Party Regime

The Opposition of the years 1923-24 foresaw the tremendous harm to the proletarian dictatorship coming out of the perversion of the Party regime. Events have completely justified the prognosis: the enemy has climbed in through the bureaucratic window.

Now more than at any other time it must be said loudly: a correct democratic Party regime is the testing stone of the present Left course.

There is an opinion held even by some steadfast revolutionaries, that a "correct line" in the sphere of economics must "of itself" bring about a correct Party regime. This view, with its pretence to dialectics, is one-sided and anti-dialectical, because it ignores the fact that in the historic process, cause and effect change their places repeatedly. A wrong line will increase a wrong regime and a wrong regime will still more disfigure the line.

Under Lenin there was a correct line. But it was precisely Lenin who pointed out that the apparatus with its anti-proletarian methods, turn a correct line into its opposite.

"The machine isn't going where we guide it, but where some illegal, or lawless or God-knows-whence derived speculators or private capitalistic businessmen, either the one or the other are guiding it. A machine doesn't always travel just exactly the way, and it often travels just exactly not the way, that the man imagines who sits at the wheel."

That is how Lenin expressed himself at the Party congress at which he appeared for the last time. What Lenin signalled at the time—as proof of the influence of the bourgeoisie on the apparatus, developed thanks to the policy of the Centrist top. By selecting people not according to their ability, experience and tried honesty, but exclusively according to the principle of adaptability, the Centrists gave that luxurious obsequy the squire followers of which bear the names of our great cities: Smolensk, Baku, etc. Centrism did not create bureaucracy. It inherited it together with the other general peculiarities, cultural and others—with the conditions of our country. But instead of combatting bureaucracy, Centrism developed it into a system of government, carried it over Stalin and the Centrist apparatus are making.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION IN GERMANY AND THE CRISIS IN THE COMMUNIST PARTY

By KURT LANDAU

I. The Legend of the New Revolutionary Wave.

"Our sister-party has measured up to its tasks. It is our party which is stimulating, promoting, and organizing the grandiose revolutionary revival of the laboring masses. It can be stated that not a single day passes in Germany which is not marked by the mobilization of the masses and street-fighting."

These are the words in which the French Communist organ, Humanité, describes the situation in an article entitled, "Street-fighting the position in Germany".

How the German Communist Party itself appraises the position is clearly revealed by the illegal leaflet which it distributed on the first of February, proclaiming that "the tottering chariots of capitalism at break-neck speed career towards the abyss and destruction." Every issue of the Berlin Rote Fahne purports to represent the workers as engaged in "conquering the streets", in putting the police to flight and here and there in setting up barricades.

But daily the hard language of facts contradicts this legend of the rising revolutionary tide. Of the three million unemployed who with their families compromise some six to eight million proletarians, not one percent heeded the call of the party to join in the hunger demonstrations—the call of this great and powerful party which rallies three million votes.

When the workers of Hartmannsdorf near Chemnitz in red and highly industrialized Saxony were recently shot down like rabbits by the unbridled police fury, the factories were not closed down, the workers did not storm out of the shops to demonstrate against the fearful bloodbath, as was the case last Fall on a hundred different occasions in Austria. No, the wide masses of the proletariat remained as dumb as the red shops of Berlin were the first and second of May when Zoergiebel was shedding the blood of the workers. The workers remained as silent as when in September the party called for the struggle against the worsening of unemployment relief, and later called upon them to fight Hilferding's finance program in December.

The most important symptom of a rising revolutionary wave—the extraordinary rise in the activity and initiative of the masses—is missing.

II. Towards the New 1923?

In the last few weeks and months the analogy of 1923 has been used more and more often in the German party as well as in the entire Comintern press.

The German party leadership and the Comintern regard the present situation of German capitalism hopeless. They point to the extraordinary rise of the index of unemployment, the symptoms of crisis in a section of industry and talk already of the approaching collapse of stabilization. The general social crisis following the collapse of the stabilization will, so the theoreticians of Stalinism think, reach in the immediate future, the intensity and profundity of 1923. The pace of this process, they consider, will be accelerated by the beginning crisis of American capitalism.

There can be no doubt that a series of crucial phenomena are making themselves felt in German capitalism. The closing down of industries, bankruptcies, etc. does not however, signalize the approaching general collapse of German capitalism but the extraordinary degree reached in the process of the concentration of capital. The year 1929 was record-breaking for the number of mergers, cartels—in a word for the gigantic advance on the road of concentration. The enormous increase of unemployment also is intimately bound up with this. The gigantic concentration makes possible the vast extension of the rationalization process. In the most important branches of German industry production in 1929, despite the numerical decrease of the workers employed, actually increased. That is, productivity actually rose. It is just such phenomena that reveal the fundamental contradictions of stabilization. In the same measure that the productive forces develop they come into conflict with the prevailing social order.

In the wake of these processes the social antagonisms have also grown unusually acute. The huge proportions of the mass unemployment is exciting the unrest of the entire working class. The execution of the Young Plan in the form of imposing its whole burden on the masses, the forced increase of the indirect taxation, the custom duties, and tax-remissions to the bourgeoisie accentuate this unrest.

But it is a long way from the dissatisfaction of the masses to their revolutionary will to struggle. If anything sounds the death-knell of the present policy of the German party it is obviously the fact that in 1929, the year of the most brutal and reactionary offensive of the social democratic government, our Party has not been able to advance the working class a single step forward. The parliamentary and democratic illusions of the masses which a far-seeing Bolshevik leadership could in this stage have surmounted, have instead remained intact, thanks to the adventurist and zig-zag policy of the Thaelmannites. In so far as these democratic illusions were undermined, it was, however, not in favor of Communism but of national socialism (Hitler) which has doubled and tripled its ranks in the industrial centers.

Do we find ourselves then, on the eve of an acute revolutionary situation—of a new 1923? Positively not. But if there were a real Bolshevik party in the leadership, the German working class could indeed organize its effective resistance to the developing capitalist offensive. If, indeed, the German Communist Party organized a systematic struggle against the Young Plan, rallying the workers in the shops and the unemployed about the concrete tasks of the day, it could lend wings to the activity and initiative of the masses and prepare them for the victorious counter-offensive of the morrow.

III. Radicalization of the Workers, Political mass Strike, and Struggle for the Streets.

Something has already been said in the foregoing concerning the radicalization of the masses. It would be ridiculous to deny—as the Rights do—that a certain degree of radicalization of the masses is perceptible. That, despite Thaelmann and Neumann, the German party has remained a mass party with great sympathy in the proletariat and that this is the case despite the sense of shame that these sympathizers feel at the bombastic phrases and systematic self-deception of the Communist leaders and press—is due to the circumstance that great masses of the proletariat want to fight. That they do not fight, that they do not follow the battle-slogans of the party, is not their fault but exclusively that of a leadership which is incompetent to apply the ABC of a bolshevist policy.

The Thaelmann leadership has placed the German party in the state of self-delusion in which the Austrian party has found itself for many years. Since 1919, the Austrian Communist Party has been waiting—except for short intervals—for the revolution. Dedicated to the bold idea of the armed insurrection, the Austrian party has not, by and large, worked in the mass organizations and workshops; and whenever the proletariat begins to move, this party immediately proclaims the general strike and only stops short of talking of soviets.

In the "Third Period" the Austrian school has attained to international ramifications. The theses of the Wedding Congress of the German party explain why the struggle for "every-day demands" has outlived its usefulness in the following terms: "the process of the radicalization of the masses has made rapid progress and is being transformed into open mass action. The balance of forces has undergone a fundamental change... The May-Day struggles in Berlin are a turning point in the political development of Germany. The conditions are maturing for the approach of an immediate revolutionary situation, in the course of the development of which the question of armed insurrection will inevitably arise on the order of the day..."

It is from this appraisal of the situation that the party leadership approaches every question. This fateful over-estimation of the given processes of crisis cripples it in the task of the real systematic organization of the revolution in Germany

The slogan of the political mass strike met with catastrophic failure already the first and second of May; later it met with an even fainter echo. It is the very failure of this watch-word that should have opened the eyes of the Thaelmannites to their exaggerations—if they had eyes to see.

In 1923—which is represented to have so much in common with the present situation—there were no less than 47 political strikes, embracing 3506 shops and 320,000 workers. The number of working days lost through political mass strikes amounted to 1,048,293. What of 1929? Not a dozen shops, fewer than 30,000 workers joined in a political mass strike—despite the events of May First.

The economic struggles, for the year 1929, no less contradict the party thesis of the "stormy will to struggle" and the resolute counter-offensive of the proletariat. The following comparative index figures show this to be the case.

Year	No. of Workshops	No. on strike	No. of working days lost
1929		115,000	1,800,000
1928	5,672	328,529	8,519,713
1927	8,144	232,704	2,945,815

These figures bear an unmistakable meaning. They show that the party leadership has not succeeded in combatting the reformist trade unions' policy. The leaders of the "free" unions, on the other hand, did succeed to a large extent in bolstering up their class-collaborationist policy of "Industrial Peace."

We have the same picture of the "successes" of the struggle for the streets. If the party was yet able, despite all its preceding mistakes, to lead out tens of thousands on to the streets, the position has become considerable worsened since then. The first of February which was to have been the signal for a large scale mass action against unemployment and the rise in the cost of living, resulted, it is generally recognized, in a pitiable fiasco.

If one were to believe the party press, the outlawing of the party is a matter only of days or weeks at the most. The party leadership is daily engaged in preparing the working class for the imminent illegality of the C. P. and proudly proclaims that the Party cannot be proscribed, as little as the Red Front Fighters League.

IV. Is the Party Threatened by Illegality?

It is a fact that the left wing of the bourgeoisie, particularly the Social Democratic party and its press, energetically supported by the Democratic Party, demands exceptional measures against the Communist Party. In this sharpened offensive against the party, the Right press has been left far behind the "Vorwaerts" and the pacifist-democratic "Welt-am-Montag". This remarkable fact naturally has its deeper explanation.

The more the Coalition regime crumbles, the more the heavy-industrialist and right-wing circles of the German bourgeoisie demand the head of the Muller Government,—after Hilferding has already been ignominiously driven from the cabinet—all the more does the Social-Democracy inveigh against the Communist Party, in the hope of impressing its indispensability as a police-guard of the bourgeois republic. The legend of the putschist plans of the Communist Party, which are circulated daily by the capitalist press, is the axis about which revolves the struggle of the S. D. P. to preserve the Coalition. The proletarian dead of Hartmannsdorf, Worms and Hamburg are an integral factor in this struggle.

Apart from this, the Social-Democracy has latterly become confident that the Communist Party is impotent to carry on a successful fight for its existence in a state of outlawry. The inglorious end of the Red Front Fighters League which on its proscription simply disappeared, confirms the Social democracy in this expectation.

The possibility of the suppression of the Communist Party certainly exists.

But the S. D. P. clearly perceives that the banning of the C. P. G. would be anything but popular; granted anywhere near a reasonable policy of the party leadership, the struggle for legality could evoke a deep response from the masses. If this is not the case to-day, if to-day the wide masses of the revolutionary proletariat stand aside in a waiting attitude, the S. D. P. should be grateful, first and foremost to the "Barricade-philosophy" of the Communist leadership and the methods of pseudo-revolutionary gymnastics that the C. P. daily applies, inasmuch as it proclaims struggle to be an end in itself.

But what the S. D. P. fears and what will probably deter it from driving the Communist Party into a state of illegality after the fascist precedent, is the awakening of the masses, who are sympathetic towards Communism and who would be able better to control the policy of the party than at present. Finally it is precisely in a condition of legality that the contradiction between the policy of the party and the revolutionary necessities becomes more and more crass, so that the outlook for the gradual disintegration of the Communist Party appears more attractive to the social-democrat than the risk of illegality.

But in the last analysis, this question will not be settled by a careful weighing of the pros and cons by Zoergiebel and Grzynski, but by the further development of the class-struggle in Germany. The tragedy of the situation lies in this: that the Thaelmanns and Neumanns objectively play into the hands of the Zoergiebel and Severings, inasmuch as their pseudo-revolutionary gestures push the revolutionary proletariat into passivity.

So for instance, the illegal leaflet of the party on February first called for demonstrations for the slogans—"All Power to Workers! Long live the Struggle for the dictatorship! For Soviet Germany!" Besides this the leaflet contains a long dissertation on the "History, Forms, and Technique of Barricade-Fighting".

The masses responded to these slogans with their feet: they did not appear.

And louder than ever the bourgeois press is calling for exceptional measures against the C. P. G.

V. The Struggle for a New Left Wing in the Party.

Up till now the gainers from the enormous mistakes of the party have been exclusively the Right wing, which has become a serious menace to the Party. They seize hold of the glaring mistakes and defeats of the party leadership to broadcast their own opportunist views of the united front policy, trade union tactics, etc.

The one-time Left Wing in the Party, that had already for the most part been expelled years ago, has up to the present been unable to re-form its ranks. The decisive obstacle to the reorganization of the forces, has become the Leninbund. Of its grave confusion in the fundamental international questions in connection with the Russo-Chinese Conflict, the declaration of Rakovsky, etc., much has been said and written. No less fateful for the Leninbund and through it, for the whole Left movement, has been its sectarian and opportunist policy in all the basic German questions. Above all, its radically false position on the Communist Party, which the Leninbund considers as already lost. This attitude which underlies the organizational form of the Leninbund as an independent organization, has led to the complete isolation of the Leninbund from the party masses and has resulted in a permanent crisis of disintegration, in the course of which a number of good comrades of this organization have separated themselves from the Leninbund and the policy of its leadership and embarked on open opposition.

The Leninbund which, at the time it was founded, was an organization of some thousands of largely active comrades, now ekes out only a shadowy existence. Except for some more active and firmly established groups (Westphalia, Baden, Central Germany) the Leninbund no longer disposes anywhere of strong positions.

The meandering way of the Leninbund has caused the Left groups that had remained in the party, to adopt a waiting attitude, to avoid being overtaken by a like fate. This is particularly true of the so-called Wedding Opposition which dominated Wedding two years ago—the most proletarian and powerful districts of the party in Berlin.

The Wedding Opposition too has many

WORKERS NAIL EMPLOYMENT LIE

DETROIT—(FP)—Published reports of increased employment were branded as "damned lies" by workers interviewed by Federated Press.

Ford workers, asked to comment on a recent report that most Ford workers are to go on full time, said that a layoff is now actually in progress. They claim that 35% of the remaining workers have been laid off since the big layoff of 30,000 workers last fall. This is due to the new policy of the Ford Motor Co. in letting out contracts for parts to sweatshop firms. Until recently this policy was confined to bodies and wheels but now it has expanded until the brake, housing, rear-axle and shock-absorber departments have shut down. Workers in those departments have been thrown on the street. Newspapers report from time to time the visits of parts company officials with the announcement that this policy is but beginning.

The tool department, affected by this, has already dispensed with 200 of its skilled workers and foremen admit the probability of another 200-500 being laid off.

Foundry workers laugh at the possibility of full time with the comment that cylinder blocks are stacked by the thousands in the foundry yard. They expect a shut down in the foundry within a week. Already many departments having direct connection with the foundry are working six hours a day, two or three days per week. Their wages are correspondingly low, for Ford River Rouge workers are paid, not by the day, but by the hour.

Reports of increased production are "so much hooey", according to one worker in a strategic department. Far from increasing production, he says, officials contemplate a cut from about 5,000 to 2,500 cars daily.

Ford salesmen bear out these reports. "The New Ford just ain't goin' over," said one to Federated Press. Chevrolet salesmen take up the refrain with the added point that in spite of an extension in time payments the new car just isn't selling. One Chevie salesman, of the "up-and-coming" variety lamented that he had not made a single sale in five months. "And the new Chevie is a flop," he lamented.

500 girls have been laid off from the J. L. Hudson Co., foremost department store in town. Other stores had already done so. Chrysler office workers report a cut of 40% in their force some time ago.

The Employers' Assn., which usually publishes employment statistics weekly, has not done so since the beginning of the fall. Requests for such figures have brought the response that the figures are not being compiled.

Inconspicuous statistics from three companies show the factual situation in the auto industry. Buick reports January 1929 shipments as 7,299 compared with 13,008 of January 1929. Reo reports a slight decrease of 329 and Hupp, a larger firm, reports a decline of 1,400.

No wonder the city welfare department reports "the worst situation in 35 years", with over 14,000 families directly dependent on it for their subsistence!

POLISH CONDITIONS GROW RAPIDLY WORSE

WARSAW—(FP)—Unemployment is rapidly growing, and all industries except coal mining are depressed. Agriculture is suffering despite the export bounty on grain. Government allowance for unemployment relief is only $1.50 per month for a man with a wife and child. The minimum subsistence cost for 3 persons in a family is estimated at $13.00 per month. LONG HOURS, LOW WAGES, FOR FOUND-DRY WORKERS

WASHINGTON—Average full-time hours per week in foundries in the United States in 1929 were 51, and in machine shops 50.3, while foundry wages averaged 82.4 cents an hour and machine shops wages 63.3 cents an hour, says the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

MASS. UNEMPLOYMENT IN ROCHESTER ROCHESTER, N. Y.—Alarmed at the number of unemployed, the Rochester city council has voted to establish an emergency unemployment bureau to handle "all new cases which present themselves to the private agencies who will, in turn, refer them to this bureau." It is estimated that out of a working population of 100,000, 25,000 are idle.

that these so-called restrictions have not been lived up to, and have been placed upon the statute books as a concession to certain groups that have conducted campaigns for their enactment.

Long Hours for Women

Referring to the wages of women workers, Mary Anderson, director of the Women Bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor, speaking recently in Kansas City, Mo. stated that

"The approximately 80 reports already published by the Bureau, stress the fact that thousands of women still fail to receive a living wage and that thousands still toil more than 8 hours a day and 48 hours a week, many as much as 10 hours daily and 60 hours a week, and some much more. In too many instances women are forced to work in crowded, poorly ventilated, dirty workrooms, to strain their eyes because of glare or insufficient light, to stand all day or sit continuously in a cramped by unguarded machinery and their health jeopardized by lack of comfort and sanitation in plant service equipment."

Of course, Miss Anderson as an official of the United States capitalist government will not advocate any drastic changes to better the conditions of the working women. It is only the women workers themselves by being organized in militant fighting unions and fighting shoulder to shoulder with the men workers for equal pay for equal work who will be able to better their conditions. They must become active advocates of increases in wages, the abolition of speed-up, sanitary working conditions and a shortening of hours. In such a struggle they will also develop issues of special importance to the women workers.

From all parts of the country reports of the long hours and low wages of the women workers are received. The Newark, (N. J.) Trades and Labor Council, an American Federation of Labor body, reveals that girls' working hours are 12 to 14 hours in many big stores, including the powerful Sears-Roebuck corporation. Their report also points out that laws that are supposed to limit the hours of labor for women are difficult to enforce because fines are nominal and girls who complain are discharged.

Reports from Albany, N. Y. state that and powerful district of the Party in Berlin. The Wedding Opposition too has short-comings, characteristic of the German Left Wing of 1923-26, which it has not completely overcome even to-day. This is particularly true of its ultra-left position in the trade union question. The best of these Left groupings has maintained itself in the Pfalz district, where it publishes a paper called "The Pioneer."

The catastrophic development of the party since the Sixth Congress has alarmed these scattered Left groups. In the past few months the scattered Wedding groups have again united and begun to discuss, seriously and actively, the basic problems of the party.

These forces that have set themselves into motion are still weak, here as opposition in the Leninbund, there as Left faction in the party, at first in Wedding and Pfalz.

But one thing is clear: the old forms of the struggle with its outlived traditions and watch-words — of which the German Left had more than enough — must be surmounted. The new trend of the Comintern and the Communist Party of Germany since the Sixth World Congress demands more elastic, theoretically more deeply grounded and active factions than the past.

Despite a thousand difficulties in the struggle against innumerable obstacles and difficulties, the pieces are gathering inside and outside the party that will build the Left wing and that will have to understand how to represent and to apply the basic teachings of the international Leninist Opposition in Germany.

BUILDING ON THE CHUTE IN PENNSY

HARRISBURG, Pa.—(FP)—In January showed an unprecedented decline in building and construction in Pennsylvania. Building permits dropped 77.5% compared with January, 1929. Philadelphia reported $2,719,000 in permits this January against during January of this year two women and five boys and girls died of injuries received on the job, according to the state labor department. The sharp decrease of employment in New York state is accompanied by the lowering of safety precautions, which is usually the case during industrial depressions. Of course, the amount of men killed during the same period was larger than that of women, nevertheless the latter are daily facing the same risks as the men.

Night Shifts in Auto Plants

The Federated Press reports that in Detroit women are working 12 hour night shifts in the Briggs Body plants, a flat violation of the state labor law. Wages, run from $10 to $14 per week. Before the unemployment crisis, the women workers were able to earn as high as $18 weekly, but the plant taking advantage of the surplus labor, cut the pay, knowing that under present conditions there are many jobless who would replace them.

When celebrating International Women's Day, March 8, the working women of America must declare emphatically their determination to fight for better working conditions — equal pay for equal work, end of the speed-up, raise in wages, sanitary working conditions, reduction of hours and no night work.

The women workers have shown in many past struggles that they were militant fighters and in the future will again show that they can fight courageously for the rights of the working class. Who will forget the bravery of the wives of the coal miners who in a score of struggles have fought shoulder to shoulder with their husbands on the picket line in spite of the machine guns of the bosses thugs. They have been among the most active participants on the picket line in the needle trades struggles in New York, the textile strikes of Passaic, New Bedford and Castonia and many smaller strikes throughout the country.

International Women's Day is a time for the militant women workers to rededicate themselves to the class struggle and prepare for future activity. The Communist League of America (Opposition) calls upon all women workers to join in the celebration which is held every year for the working women of the world when they measure their victories and defeats of the past twelve months and prepare for future struggles.

Reveals Crime of Archangel Expedition

By Federated Press

The leading article in the American Mercury for March is the Archangel Adventure, written evidently by an American army officer who went through that criminal piece of British muddling for which Woodrow Wilson was generously ready to pour out American lives and treasure, all to no avail. The return of 75 bodies of American middle western soldiers, uselessly and tragically sacrificed on the Arctic Russian soil from which they were exhumed last fall, is the occasion for returning to that 12-year old wild goose chase against the Soviet Union.

Right at the outset the Mercury author states that the adventure "cost hundreds of lives, millions of dollars and an immense amount of suffering."

Wilson lightly promised American cannon fodder and American dollars to the British general staff and on August 18, 1918, announced that the doughboys would be used to guard war material for czarist Russians against the revolution. In addition they were to get control of the northern arm of the Trans-Siberian and its feeder railroads from the Bolsheviks. The author points out that the Bolsheviks had already taken all the war material there would have been to guard and that a very much larger total force would have been needed to grab the railroads.

He concludes: "From the 102 caskets shipped to the United States from Archangel in 1919; from the 75 that arrived in New York the other day; from those waiting disposition in France; from the hundreds of lonely unmarked graves in the tundra — Yankee, British, French — there comes no singing. I should hate to be the staff man who planned that dream of a winter march through Arctic Russia."

That brainless crusade was all for democracy. Another is now being planned in

STALINISM IN CHICAGO I. L. D.

CHICAGO—On Monday, February 3rd the Chicago Joe Hill branch of the International Labor Defense held its regular elections—well organized. I say organized advisedly as I noted several comrades present who otherwise do not attend much, neither to meetings nor to work of the I. L. D. Knowing them all well, I soon observed that they were members of the official Communist Party brought there to vote. Why that was "necessary" became clear to me later.

Comrade J. R. Booth had been our branch educational director for a long time, being elected unanimously; his program had in the past been accepted without opposition. His very active work for the movement and for the I. L. D. in particular had always been recognized; at one meeting he alone brought in 25 new applications for membership. His general working class record is well known, including one year and a half in jail for opposition to the last world war. He was now again nominated for the position of educational director to succeed himself but that started the "works". Those Party members brought there to vote objected to the nomination on the grounds that comrade Booth supports the Opposition—the Trotskyites—no other reason was advanced.

Narrowing Down Labor Defense

Although not on the "inside" but still having heard enough discussion from time to time about the "new line" it is quite clear that this is what has been put into operation in the I. L. D. and used against comrade Booth. There used to be a time when the I. L. D. had room for all revolutionary and class conscious workers who were ready to fight for labor's prisoners and for the working class movement in general; but that is all over now.

Comrade Booth defended his right to continue in active work for his class. He reminded the voters of the act that while he himself, a "Trotskyite", had been present defending the "Freiheit" during the severest days and nights of attack by the bourgeois zionists he had failed to see these voters present. He stated that no organized caucus could prevent his active work for his class even though they may prevent his being elected for the post for which he was nominated. They might even carry through their threats of expulsion; but, turning to the other branch members he asked them not let such Stalinist tactics interfere with the work of the branch or break it up. "Whether outside or inside," said comrade Booth, "I will continue to work for the I. L. D., and I ask you all to do likewise."

A couple of members, not belonging to the party, spoke against the objections made to Booth's nomination and when it came to election things had been carried so far that all the non-party members present abstained from voting one way or another, not wanting to take part in such manipulations. Thus the party caucus won a victory; but a few such victories and there will be no I. L. D. branch left.

No Murder Charge Against This Judge

By FRANK L. PALMER

DENVER—(FP)—"Passing the buck" from one city to the other struck a snag in "Justice" Court in Denver. It was noticed for a day however and then forgotten.

A father was brought into court for failure to provide for his family. "I can't get work," he pled. "Then I'll give you 90 days," the judge thundered. "I couldn't support them any better if you did," the desperate father countered, with some apparent justification.

"I'll sentence you to 90 days in jail and suspend sentence to give you 48 hours to get out of town and take your family with you."

Some way he got an old Ford and started through the Colorado winter to "get out of town". The baby was ill but fear of the judge was strong. In a Nebraska town the pleas of the mother that the baby be taken to a doctor, even if there were nothing to pay the bill, was agreed to.

The baby was dead.

Murder charges have not been filed against the judge.

YOUNG VANGUARD

- - A Section Devoted to Problems of the Working Class Youth

:-: Whither the American League? :-:

The Enlarged Plenum of the Y. C. I. found its echo in the recent plenum of the Young Communist League of the U. S. A. The "New Turn" and watchwords were all faithfully reproduced according to schedule. Undoubtedly the new zig-zag was very welcome to Rijack, Harvey and Green. It saved them the embarrassing trouble of really explaining the causes for the disintegration of the League. The Y. C. I. plenum provided them in advance with all the necessary explanations. The resolution adopted (Daily Worker, February 5-8, 1930) reveals the miserable situation in which the Y. C. I. finds itself—but explains nothing, and lays the basis for further decline.

There is much "self-criticism" in the resolution. Self-criticism plays today a special role in the official Parties and Leagues similar to a safety valve in a steam boiler. Genuine self-criticism could never serve the interests of an opportunist bureaucracy. They indulge in "self-criticism" in order to forestall criticism from below. The bureaucracy use self-criticism as the bourgeois liberals view free speech—to relieve the internal fermentation. So they confess their sins, and the membership feels that a new clean revolutionary atmosphere surrounds them. In reality, the new atmosphere is a most congenial place for committing new errors.

"The struggle of the young workers were often allowed to pass unobserved, and when we did participate in these struggles we too often failed to give independent leadership or to develop the necessary new forms of struggle (New York, Boston, Kansas City, etc.), and to build the league". Really a most remarkable leadership and a most remarkable state of affairs in the League. The silence with which such a statement (which reveals paralysis and impotence) is received in the League, is a sign that the process of disintegration and demoralization is very far advanced.

In the "Third Period" it is necessary to exaggerate without limit (in order to conceal the very increasing bankruptcy of the present leadership). The third period must be confirmed at all costs. Facts are no longer of any importance; so think our youth "leaders". "Thus the economic crisis is causing the young workers to move to the Left at an extremely rapid pace (so!). This growing activity on the part of the young workers finds expressions in the ever increasing number of youth strikes..." Of course in the "third period" it isn't necessary to mention just in what industries these youth strikes are to be observed or to name any of them. Only those who are still lagging behind somewhere in the second period want to have exact and accurate information on these youth strikes. To determine the extent, the main tendencies, the number involved, light or basic industries—all this seems to be of no concern to the marionettes in the leadership of the League.

If anyone is in search for a quotation expressing underestimation of social reformism, here is one of the outstanding examples: "The radicalization of the young workers takes away the base of the social reformists among the young workers and while social reformism remains the chief ideological barrier, which we have to overcome amongst the young workers, there can be no real growth of reformist youth organizations—but only disintegration, providing the Young Communist League plays its role." Everything here is wrong and muddled. It is false to say that radicalization takes away the base from the social reformists and only politically irresponsible people who trifle with the interests of the workers would state such a thing. It is precisely in the period of radicalization that social reformism has all the opportunities of growth among the working class. This period likewise makes for greater opportunities for Communism and makes more fertile the possibilities of its growth. Who will grow faster, which will outstrip the other depends on several conditions, among which the tactics of the Party play an extremely important and decisive part.

An expression of the "Left" danger we are told is "vanguardism". But may we ask, What is the origin of this tendency? Who cultivated and nourished it? Who was it that always flattered the youth and taught them that they played a special, sanctioned role in the struggle against deviations in the Party? Who told the youth that they were the best interpreters of the Comintern decisions? Who always used the youth as a pawn for every zig-zag move on the Centrist chess-board? It is exactly that leadership which today cries loudly against "vanguardism" that is entirely responsible for the growth of such a tendency in the Y. C. I. It was found then to be expedient in the struggle against comrade Trotsky and the Leninist Opposition. But today when dissatisfaction with the course of the present leadership (Shatzkin-Sten) the E. C. finds it necessary to struggle against the very tendencies for which it was responsible, and which it nurtured.

The Y. C. I. and American League plenums were important in that it foreshadows the "new turn" that is to follow in the C. I. and its sections. The "new turn" stated in the resolutions as the need to struggle against the "Left Danger" is a forerunner of the beginning of the new wave of repressions and persecutions against the Leninist Opposition. It foreshadows the adoption again of a Right course by the Stalinist Center. The excuse of the League, that the need of a struggle against the "Left" is the result of sectarian isolation, is just an excuse. The cause of the sectarian isolation is the result of the adventurist and recent ultra-Left course of the International, arising from the spurious theory of the "third period". In this "new turn" the League will once again be the "best interpreters" of the Comintern decisions, and struggle against the "Left deviations"—and prepare with the Party the swing to the Right. Such is the honorable role that the Young Communist Leagues, the world over, are fated to play under the regime of the Centrist bureaucracy.

The Militarization of the American Youth

A new feature in the militarization of the American youth is taking place in New York. This act, in face of the recent London Conference, and all other peace and disarmament negotiations, belies the attempts of this government to appear as a promoter of peace. A bill has been introduced into the New York State Legislature calling for the conscription of all students between the ages of 10 and 18 to compulsory military training.

To avoid resentment to this open attempt at making soldiers of the American youth the bill states in its title that it is "Instruction in boy scout training and kindred subjects". But even such a covering fails to hide the fact that the aim and purpose of this bill is the preparation of cannon fodder for the coming war. As in all forms of military service, the weak and sick are eliminated, and the best physically are allowed the "privilege" of participation, which in this instant would mean compulsion to service.

The bill if passed would mean that all students, regardless of attendance at private or public schools would be forced to wear the uniform, take 30 minutes drill daily, and special training during the holidays, and summer vacation periods.

Need of Mass Movement

The passing of such a bill would necessarily set a precedent that would undoubtedly be pursued in other states. At the present moment only the Teachers Union of the State has protested against "this attempt to exploit the children of the state and thus keep alive the institution of militarism". That however, is far from sufficient.

This particular attempt of the state of New York must be linked with the whole attempt at militarization of the youth in

The Class Character of the Constitution

Since the close of the World War a group of new sects has appeared in America, made up of self-styled defenders of the American Constitution. The most fervent of these are the American Security League, the Key Men of America, the Army and Navy League, the Constitutional Defense League, and the Ku Klux Klan. Even the old corpse of the Sons of the American Revolution—not to mention the Daughters—has been revived and shouts loudly with the rest.

These organizations have to a degree succeeded in foisting on America a new religion in which the fathers of the revolution are made the saints and the Constitution a holy book. Like all religious fanatics, the makers of the new religion are ready to inflict punishments on anyone who dares to question the truth of their doctrines. To suggest that the revolutionary forefathers were after all only human beings, with no more power to look into the future than we have today—and perhaps with less—is to bring down their wrath upon you. They are equally ready to condemn any one who declares that the Constitution is now obsolete; for they are not realistic enough to recognize that the framers of the Constitution were not inspired by heaven but only by the social and economic conditions of the time in which they lived.

Not content with practicing their jingo religion by themselves, these holy crusaders have done and are doing their best to instill into the American workers a worship of the past and a fear of questioning the American institutions. Like the early Christians the American workers are ready to suffer rather than reason out whether or not these institutions having their foundation in the Constitution serve their interests or not.

As a matter of fact, the evidence is on the negative side. Take, for example, private property and the protection of the individual, comparing conditions today with those of 150 years ago. At that time, most property in America was the result of individual labor. America was primarily an agricultural country, with an abundance of virgin land. Very little capital was necessary to establish a man's independence. Almost anyone was able to get land and clear it for cultivation. After a few years of labor, he would be the owner of property that was the result of his own toil. A man with a few simple tools was able to carry on a trade without the assistance of a capitalist. The Constitution in those days served to some extent also the interests of the bulk of the population (with the exception of the slaves) who consisted of small farmers and independent craftsmen, or, in other words, of small property owners.

The Exploitation of Labor and the Law

Now let us see if that holds good today. For example, Henry Ford, the outstanding individual capitalist in America today, is the reputed owner of an industry worth at least $1,000,000,000. Is this billion dollars the result of Ford's own labor? Of course not. It is the result of the labor of hundreds of thousands of wage laborers who work "for" Ford. It is the product of social toil. It is possible under a private-property system for Ford to exploit these hundreds of thousands of men, or to speak more simply, possible for him to legally rob them of by far the greater part of what they produce.

Ford has, during the last four months, laid off 50,000 workers, denying them the right to work in the industry which they, not he, were the builders of. Yet the government would back up Mr. Ford when he deprives workers of the means whereby they live. According to the Constitution, it is his factory, not theirs. Suppose that the Ford workers should demand that he turn over the plant to them. Ford would stand on the right given him by the Constitution which says: "No person shall be...deprived of...life, liberty or property without due process of the law...Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." And the armed forces of the state would protect him in that right.

But what about the right of the 50,000 workers to life, liberty and the right to work—which is the only "property" of wage slaves? Well, the Constitution and the state laws have nothing to do with that. Property rights come first, and that holds good throughout the nation. Why? Because, though an industrial revolution took place in America, and we have changed from an agricultural country to an industrial, from individual production to social, yet we are still bound hand and foot by a document written in a pre-industrial era. Today a small minority own nearly all the land, the raw material, and the industries, while the greater part of the population are propertyless (proletarians). But we have failed to change our institutions to meet the changed economic conditions.

Abolish Capitalism

To speak of "we", however, is to be inexact. The nation is made up of those who own and those who work. Of these two great classes, one, the minority, namely, the propertied class, still derive benefit from the existing order. It would be futile to expect them to bring about a change in the social system of America. That can only be done by the other class, the propertyless ones, when they waken to a realization that a national constitution drawn up 150 years ago is now obsolete and must take its place in a museum as a thing of the past. New institutions must instead be created. We, the proletariat of today know far better than did our forefathers, what the social and political requirements of today are. We cannot let the past stand in our way, nor can we allow a handful of professional patriots and ancestor-worshippers to hold back the wheel of progress. The proletariat must and will brush all such aside and write its own constitution and make its own history.

TRADE UNION MEMBERSHIP AT STANDSTILL

WASHINGTON—Total membership of all trade unions in the United States in 1929 was 4,331,251, according to a summary published in the latest edition of the Handbook of American Trade Unions, published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This is somewhat less than the total for 1926. During these three years 10 national organizations, chiefly dual passed out of existence. American Federation of Labor unions report a gain of 126,430 over their 1926 total. The chief gains were made in the construction and public service industries.

MY PART IN THE OCTOBER

By L. D. TROTSKY

The following is a chapter of the "Real Situation in Russia" by L. D. Trotsky, dealing with the falsification of the history of the Russian Revolution by the Stalin regime. This chapter is of special interest now in view of the celebration of the founding of the Red Army. The translation, including the notes, is by Max Eastman.

As to my participation in the October Revolution—in the notes to Volume 14 of the Complete Works of Lenin you read:

"After the majority of the Petersburg Soviet passed into the hands of the Bolsheviks, Trotsky was elected its president and in that position organized and led the insurrection of October 25:

How much is true here, and how much false, let the Bureau of Party History decide—if not the present one, then some future Bureau. Comrade Stalin has lately categorically denied the truth of this assertion. Thus:

"I have to say that Comrade Trotsky played no particular role in the October insurrection and could not do so, that being president of the Petrograd Soviet, he merely fulfilled the will of the corresponding party authority, which guided his every step."

And further:

"Comrade Trotsky played no particular role either in the party or the October insurrection, and could not do so, being a man comparatively new to our party in the October period." **

In giving this testimony, Stalin forgot what he himself said on the sixth of November, 1918; that, is on the first anniversary of the revolution, when facts and events were still too fresh in the minds of all. Even then Stalin had already begun that work in relation to me which he has now developed on such a grand scale. But he was then compelled to conduct it far more cautiously and underhandedly than he is now. Here is what he wrote then in Pravda under the title, "The Role of the Most Important Party Leaders":

"All the work of practical organization of the insurrection was conducted under the immediate leadership of the President of the Petrograd Soviet, Comrade Trotsky. It is possible to declare with certainty that the swift passing of the garrison to the side of the Soviet, and the bold execution of the work of the Military Revolutionary Committee, the party owes principally and above all to Comrade Trotsky."

Those words, spoken by no means for the purpose of laudatory exaggeration—on the contrary, Stalin's goal was then wholly different, but I will not dwell on that—those words sound absolutely incredible today as coming from the lips of Stalin.

It was said long ago: A truthful man has this advantage, that even with a bad memory he never contradicts himself. A dishonest, unscrupulous, and dishonest man has always to remember what he said in the past, in order not to shame himself.

Comrade Stalin, with the help of the Yaroslavskies, is trying to construct a new history of the organization of the October insurrection based on the fact that the party created a "practical center for the insurrection," of which, it appears, Trotsky was not a member. Lenin was not a member of that committee. That fact alone demonstrates that the committee had only a subordinate organizational significance. It played no independent role whatever. The legend about this committee has been created today for the simple reason that Stalin was a member of it. Here is the membership: "Sverdlov, Stalin, Dzerzhinsky, Bubnov, Uritsky." However unpleasant it is to dig in the rubbish, it seems necessary for me, as a sufficiently close participant and witness of the events of that time, to testify as follows:

The role of Lenin, of course, needs no illumination. Sverdlov I often met, and I often turned to him for counsel, and for people to help me. Comrade Kamenev, who, as is well known, occupied a special position, the incorrectness of which he himself has long ago acknowledged, took never the less a most active part in the events of the revolution. The decisive night, from the twenty-fifth to the twenty-sixth, Kamenev and I spent together in the quarters of the Military Revolutionary Committee, answering questions, and giving orders by telephone. But stretch my memory as I will, I cannot answer the question in just what consisted, during those decisive days, the role of Stalin. It never once happened that I turned to him for advice or cooperation. He never showed the slightest initiative. He never advanced one independent proposal. This fact no "Marxist historian" of the new style can alter.

A Supplementary Insertion

Stalin and Yaroslavsky, as I said above, have wasted much effort these last months in proving that the organizational center created by the Party, consisting of Sverdlov, Stalin, Bubnov, Uritsky and Dzerzhinsky guided, so to speak, the whole course of the insurrection. Stalin has emphasized, every way he can, the fact that Trotsky was not a member of that center. But alas! through sheer carelessness on the part of Stalin's historians, in Pravda for November 2, 1927—that is, after the present letter was written—there appeared an accurate excerpt from the report of the Central Committee for the sixteenth to the twenty-ninth of October, 1917.

"The Central Committee creates a military revolutionary center with the following members, Sverdlov, Stalin, Bubnov, Uritsky, and Dzerzhinsky. THIS CENTER IS TO BE A CONSTITUENT PART OF THE REVOLUTIONARY SOVIET COMMITTEE."

The Revolutionary Soviet Committee is the Military Revolutionary Committee created by the Petrograd Soviet. No other Soviet organ for the leadership of the insurrection existed. Thus these five comrades, designated by the Central Committee, were required to enter as a supplement into the staff of that same Military Revolutionary Committee of which Trotsky was the president. Superfluous it would seem, for Trotsky to be introduced a second time into the staff of an organization of which he was already president! How hard it is, after all, to correct history after it is finished!

November, 11, 1927.

I wrote at Brest a short outline of the October Revolution. This book went through a great number of editions in various languages. Nobody ever told me that there is a flagrant omission in my book—namely that it nowhere points out the chief guide of the insurrection, "the military revolutionary centre," of which Stalin and Bubnov were members. If I so badly remembered the history of the October insurrection, why did not somebody clear me up? Why was my book studied with impunity in all the party schools in the first years of the revolution?

Even in the year 1922 the Organization Bureau of the party seemed to think that I understood fairly well the history of the October Revolution. Here is a small but eloquent confirmation of that:

Moscow, May 24, 1922.

"No. 14302

To Comrade Trotsky:

"Excerpt from the report of the session of the Organization Bureau of the Central Committee for May 22, 1922, No. 21.

Commission Comrade Yakovlev by the first of October to compose under the editorship of Comrade Trotsky, a textbook on the history of the October Revolution.

"Signed, Secretary of the Sub-Department of Propaganda"

That was in May 1922. And my book about the October Revolution having appeared before that time in many editions, was well known to the Organization Bureau—the head of which, at that period was already Stalin. Nevertheless the Organization Bureau considered it necessary to lay upon me the task of editing the school book of the October Revolution. How does this happen? It happens because the eyes of Stalin and the Stalinists were opened to "Trotskyism" only after the eyes of Lenin were closed forever.

 No. 241.

* This is a mild reference to the fact that Kamenev and Zinoviev opposed the seizure of power in October, held negotiations against it, with the Mensheviks, and even made known in a non-Bolshevik paper the secret resolution of the Bolshevik central committee calling for the insurrection. They were denounced as "traitors", "deserters", "strikebreakers", etc., by Lenin in a long letter which I published in my "Since Lenin Died".

Zinoviev subsequently stated that the two greatest mistakes of his life were this opposition to Lenin in 1917 and his opposition to Trotsky in 1924. "I am working with Trotsky now for long," he said. That was two years ago, and he has since deserted again and is writing anti-Trotskyist articles at the behest of Stalin.—Trans.

The Policy of the Leadership and Party Regime

from the Soviet apparatus into the Party and gave the latter forms and dimensions which are unheeded of, which are indefensible, in view of the role of political leadership the Party has to play.

The Stalinist Bureaucracy

On top of that the Centrist leadership has raised to Communist dogmas ("organizational principles of Leninism") the methods of command and compulsion, refining them to a degree rarely known in the history of bureaucratic virtuosity. With the aid of these demoralizing methods, making machines out of thinking Communists, killing the will, character and human dignity—the Centrist top succeeded in becoming an irreplaceable and inviolable oligarchy, substituting the Party and the class.

The capitulators do not like to talk any longer of the Party regime and Party bureaucracy. This seems to them now to be natural, as if it were part of the proletarian dictatorship. From the moment the capitulators decided to achieve a place under our Soviet bureaucratic sun, the Stalinist regime has become to them the very best of the best; a democratic, a workers, and a Party one. A particularly cynical apologist has become—Radek. With ease he threatens his former comrades with article 58; in his declaration of July 13, he tries to defend the methods of the leadership, which served to decompose the apparatus within the country and has done harm to the dictatorship outside the country. Those who talk about Party democracy (evidently Lenin is to be included) are nothing else but vulgar liberals, struggling for freedom in the abstract! Meantime the struggle with the class enemy, that regenerates and becomes more ugly, in the future too will be hindered by the wrong and extremely abnormal Party regime.

The old methods are already condemned, they top recognize, but as always it tries to throw off responsibility, to throw dust in the eyes, to deceive the masses, to whose justified dissatisfaction, they toss a few scapegoats. It tries to deceive the masses with so-called self-criticism. Everyone is permitted to criticize himself, but those who are chiefly responsible and guilty they do not permit themselves to, but they do not even permit the Party to criticize them. They are gifted with the godly attribute of infallibility.

What Read?

However, they are not able to conceal the conditions from the Party and the working class. The question is put edge-ways and it is necessary to give an answer. This must be done without delay. Before the Party are two roads—either it will be capable to give the proletarian dictatorship a directing organization based on confidence, and about which Lenin spoke, which will be capable to establish a workers' democracy and to restrain an unruly stubborn apparatus, its misuses and mismanagement, the incapabilities of which costs hundreds of millions of rubles, besides the tremendous moral harm it does to the proletarian dictatorship. Either the Party will be sufficiently mature to do all this, or else it will help—against its own will and to the greatest harm to itself, the revolution and Communism—the class enemy which will thus break into our Soviet fortress under the banner of a false, hypocritical, vile, bourgeois democracy in order to pave afterwards the way for unrestrained fascism. Either—or. There is no other way o is the only newspaper in the United States that regularly publishes the writing of L. D. Trotsky, Ch. Rakovsky and other leaders of the Left Opposition of the Communist movement based upon the teachings of Marx and Lenin. In addition it is the only periodical in the English language in any part of the world that prints the correct estimation of world events based upon a Leninist conception.

THE MILITANT is the organ of those who want to reestablish the international Communist movement on the basis it was up till the death of Lenin. Published weekly, it is a powerful factor in mobilizing the working class along the correct ideological lines. Without its regular appearance the Left Opposition not only in America but throughout the world would sustain a severe loss.

In a recent letter, Comrade Trotsky asserted that La Verite the weekly organ of the French Left Opposition and THE MILITANT were the two best organs of the movement that is conducting a campaign for a return to Lenin's teachings. To enable THE MILITANT to continue publication, the immediate support of all its readers is necessary. A donation to its Sustaining Fund will enable it to continue to exist.

The Militant

Dear Comrades:

Many thanks for your letter. Yes, I have had a serious turn for the worse. My heart is now in a state in which it may give out at any moment—the valves being worn out. For this reason I shall not be able to meet a comrade who is proposing to come from Paris to arrange for the distribution of the Russian Bulletin and to organize the Opposition in the Communist Party in England. This needs to be done badly. I have sent an address in North Shields, where a useful helper will be found, who has lived on the Tyne Side for a lifetime...I shall never be able to leave home again, and if the heart does not improve I am likely to be "out of it" very shortly.

The news that Comrade Trotsky's health is improving is the best you could possibly have sent me...I had noticed that his writing was as accurate in detail and as genuine as ever. Also, that the old humour was not wanting. His books and articles have energized me for years. Like most people in feeble health I am inclined to pessimism. Whenever I am at my worst, I invariably turn to some of Trotsky's writings and always with good results.

The workers who get the Militant cannot afford a cent for a copy. I will continue to pay whilst I can. The poverty on Tyneside is ghastly and unemployment is getting worse.

MARCH 6 AND AFTER

London Naval Debacle

The collapse of the London Naval Conference, coming on the heels of the fall of the French cabinet, bears out all contentions of the impossibility of the imperialists even to pretend at limitation of armaments. The attempt to mask itself as an apostle of peace for the world was a farce; the conference was made up purely of the leading imperialist powers—to the exclusion of all others. The issue of parity strength proved to be not one of reduction, but, on the contrary, one of increased construction of naval armaments.

We have all along pointed out the impossibility of the capitalist powers to attempt to solve and patch up their differences through conferences and negotiations. We said further that the London conference was actually a session of the leading capitalist powers, jockeying for advantages in the world political arena, and preparing their allies in preparation of an impending conflict. Furthermore, it was obvious from the outset that one of the main objectives of the conference would be to lay the plans for an alliance of the powers against the Soviet Union. In the beginning, it was clear that nothing could be achieved in the way of diminishing construction and reduction of armaments, and that the conference would reach a blind alley in a short while.

These views have been substantiated. For over two weeks, the conference has lapsed. The pacifists and the Conference attempt to lay the blame for this on the collapse of the French cabinet. While this is a factor, it does not eliminate the fact that the whole conference was leading to a point where its further deliberations would be checked.

Issues at the Conference

At the beginning of the conference, the following conditions were the basis for the negotiations: The parity ratio between the United States and England. The demand for increased parity on the part of Japan from the original proposal of 5-5-3 to 10-10-7. The demand of France for a tonnage of 724,000 tons, and Italy's position calling for parity with France. This presented the curious picture of a disarmament conference with a program of increased naval construction.

The various issues during the first month of the conference whether or not battleships should be expunged from naval service, whether submarines were "humane instruments" during war, etc., were only confusing and played their part in delaying the discussion of disarmament. They allowed for time so that the various powers could obtain information on their opponents' strength.

The real obstacle remains unsolved—what shall be the naval ratios of the participants? On this there is unanimous disagreement. While United States and England apparently agree to parity the remaining countries continue to disagree unless their commands are granted. France, which today has taken the place of pre-war Germany as the outstanding militarized nation, insists that her "freedom and interests" demand a naval tonnage of 725,000 tons, to be built for the most part by 1936. This means that France, in a short period, would have one of the largest and most modern navies in the world. Neither the United States, England, nor Japan agree to this. Japan on the other hand refuses, on the basis that she is an "island nation", to reduce her tonnage, and Italy continues to insist on parity with France, to allow protection of her interests in the Mediterranean Sea. Both France and Japan refuse to liquidate their submarine fleets, which are the backbone of their smaller naval strength against both the United States and England. The above was the condition prior to the opening of the conference, and on which the conference today has lapsed because of its failure to even make initial progress.

Each of the naval powers demand "security" and are willing (!) for reduction if the other begins it. That no progress

The unemployment demonstrations on March 6th which, particularly in New York, Detroit and other industrial centers, assumed huge proportions, have proved in irrefutable language that unemployment is a living issue in the United States. They smashed the conspiracy of the ruling class to deny or minimize the unemployment crisis and sent them scurrying for measures of amelioration and fear of the coming storm. They proved that issues which directly affect the life interests of the masses are the ones which rouse them. The demonstrations compelled reformists of the socialist party and a section of the trade union movement who up till now have done little but echo the Hoover pronouncements, to come forward with independent proposals in an attempt to take over the leadership of the unemployed masses.

On the other side, the March 6th unemployment demonstrations were the signal for unleashing an unprecedented police brutality against the workers; a new wave of incitement by the capitalist press against the Communist organizers of the movement; an attempt to bury the issue of unemployment under a "Red Scare"; and an attempt to frame up the arrested leaders—in short a general offensive of the ruling class and the government designed to lay the basis for again outlawing the Communist movement. The New York capitalist papers, including the pseudo-liberal Telegram, are crying with one voice for the rigorous prosecution of the arrested Communists, who insisted that the right to parade the streets, always enjoyed without question by reactionary elements, should be taken for one day by the workers. The unemployment movement, which on March 6th marked a rise in the militancy of the masses, remains a defensive movement in the face of a continuing and intensified capitalist offensive.

Haitians Demand End of Wall St. Rule

WASHINGTON—In a public statement on the history of the so-called American treaty with Haiti, which never was ratified when secretly negotiated in 1917, the Patriotic Union of Haiti demands that American imperialism shall get out of Haiti and rid the country of military occupation.

"We denounce the Act of 1917," says the Union. "We protest its invocation before the civilized world, before the Congress of the United States, before the Investigating Committee, before President Hoover..."

"To critics who might add 'revolution', we say: 'Let it not be a repetition of the Aux Cayes affair, where innocent men, women and children were slaughtered by United States marines.'"

Hoover has been in office now one year, but military rule in Haiti remains as before. The masses of Haiti are just as determined in their demand for freedom from the economic, political and military bondage of U. S. imperialism. The Hoover Committee "investigates" and of course does nothing. The Haitian masses continue to protest the American occupation through demonstrations and other measures

The March 6th demonstrations which brought a period of preliminary agitation to a point, represent a beginning in the work of organizing the defensive struggle of the masses on issues which go to the very heart of their daily lives. It is necessary now to arrive at a realistic estimation of the actual strength of the unemployment movement, and the influence of the Communists upon it, in preparation for the next stages of the struggle. The spectacular demonstrations, magnificent as they were in many respects, are not, standing by themselves, alone a sufficient guide for this estimation. Scarehead newspaper publicity concentrated public attention on these events in such a way as to insure a big attendance in any case.

The question of how many were demonstrators, how many passive sympathizers, and how many merely curious spectators, cannot be easily answered. It is self-evident that enormous numbers belonged to the latter two categories. To classify all who appeared at the demonstrations as real participants in the movement for relief of the unemployed would be an obvious mistake on which profound illusions would be based. Subsequent stages of development and the various forms it will necessarily take, will provide the criteria for measuring the extent of the actual movement.

This development must now take the form of organizing the forces set into motion, of consolidating and extending their strength. The success of this work depends on the further course of the economic situation in the first place, and on the tactics of the Communists in the second. These questions stand in the center of the revolutionary task.

Unemployment—a Permanent Phenomenon

Unemployment has become a permanent phenomenon of American capitalism. Even such a cautious economic writer as Stuart Chase estimated 3,000,000 unemployed at the height of the Hoover prosperity in 1923. While exact figures on the present situation are not obtainable, there is plenty of ground for the assumption that the figure today stands at twice that number. This is a powerful force undermining the structure of American capitalism. Moreover the effect of unemployment on the workers is cumulative. As the savings and credits of the unemployed workers are exhausted and other resources and devices are used up, they become faced more and more with the stark problem of subsistence. Neither police clubs nor prosperity propaganda can do away with it. It is true that American capitalism has enormous resources at its disposal—a fact which must not be forgotten. These resources give a possibility—if they are fully extended—of ameliorating some of the most acute phases of unemployment, but they cannot reach the essential problem. Unemployment is a permanent cancer gnawing at the vitals of American capitalism.

The ensuing period will give the possibility of gauging the strength and tempo of the movement and of organizing it accordingly. The series of protest meetings against the arrests and police brutality

"Church of Wall St. Shows $1,462,340 Income Last Year. Trinity reports $15,000,000 Realty.—Assets $16,923,956."

With these headlines the Wall St. Journal introduces a story on the increasing capital owned by Trinity Church Corp., of New York. The Episcopal Church of which Wm. T. Manning, now bishop of New York, was formerly rector, is the wealthiest single parish in America. But other organizations in this denomination and in other churches boast of investments, steadily increasing in amount rolling up into millions of dollars. The $17,000,000 of Trinity parish is only a small fraction of the total.

So when Bishop Manning called upon all religious bodies to join in a day of prayer as a protest against Soviet policy, the Friends of the Soviet Union arranged for the same date a demonstration "against the capitalist preparations for war on the Soviet Union under the guise of a religious campaign." The crusade of the churches against Soviet Russia, according to the friends of the workers' government, is a capitalist crusade against a socialist republic. The pope and Bishop Manning, leading the crusade, not only represent two of the richest religious bodies in the world, but also represent propertied interests—J. P. Morgan, Wall St. and organized capital, the critics say.

That American property holdings of the churches have vastly increased in recent years is revealed by the latest U. S. census figures on religious bodies. Church buildings are now valued at $3,842,500,000 as compared with $1,676,600,000 in 1916. These billions pay no taxes.

More than 50 denominations reported property valued at over $1,000,000,000. Six

Amalgamate Engineers and Firemen MARCH 6TH AND AFTER

The course of events is gradually teaching Locomotive Engineers and Firemen the necessity and importance of uniting in one organization, as a preliminary step in the process of amalgamating the present helpless and expensive Railroad Crafts—21 in number—into one union in the Railroad Transportation Industry.

The interests of the locomotive engineers and firemen are identical. Practically every hardship, every difficulty, has to be borne and suffered alike by the two men in the locomotive cab. Poor coal and equipment, heavy trains, added duties without additional pay, poor working conditions and the many known and unknown hardships and dangers of the rail, such as snowdrifts, washouts and defective track, are all mutual problems of both men in the cab.

The old argument of the Grand Lodge Officials that the craft form of organization is the best kind of organization to look after the interests of the membership, no longer holds good, because neither the B. of L. E. or the B. of L. F. & E. are any longer craft organizations. Since its Milwaukee convention in 1906, when the "E" was added to the Firemen's name, the B. of L. F. & E. officials have kept organizers in the field to retain its Engineer members. On the other hand, the B. of L. E. officials have maintained organizers to pull firemen out of the Firemen's organization, as soon as they had passed the examination for engineer. This in spite of the fact that such firemen will have to fire a locomotive for years after they have been examined for engineer. So the B. of L. E. will take all the firemen they can get so soon as they have passed the engineer's examination and the B. of L. F. & E. is fighting to retain as many of its engineer members as it can.

leading church bodies reported immensely increased value of buildings, as follows:
Protestant Episcopal

Roman Catholic	$837,271,053	$669,746,780
Methodist Epis.	406,165,659	274,162,895
Presbyterian
Church in U.S.	338,152,743	275,821,868
Protest. Epis.	314,596,738	277,375,539
No. Baptist	185,370,576	154,894,435
Congregational	164,212,552	82,036,763

But church buildings tell only part of the story. Endowments of church organizations, excluding local churches, are estimated at totalling at least $575,000,000 and probably much more. Most of the church missionary societies have large trust funds. The Protestant Episcopal church missionary society reports over $9,000,000; the Presbyterian home and foreign boards about $3,000,000; the Baptist foreign missionary society over $7,000,000; and the Methodist home and foreign boards over $3,900,000.

The church pension fund of the Protestant Episcopal church, with J. P. Morgan as treasurer and chairman of its finance committee, now totals over $25,500,000. It started in 1917 with less than a third of that amount. The fund is invested in the leading railroad and industrial corporations in the United States—including the Santa Fe, Baltimore and Ohio, New York Central, Pennsylvania, American Telephone and Telegraph, American Radiator, General Motors, International Mach Corp., Standard Oil and U. S. Steel. Practically all have anti-union labor policies, and most of them have broken strikes with gunmen, spies and state and private police.

Other endowment funds of other church organizations now enlisted in the anti-Soviet campaign, are similarly invested in railroad bonds, telephone and telegraph bonds municipal state and government bonds. Investments of the churches also include notes secured by real estate, mortgages and trust deeds.

From the foregoing, then, it can clearly be seen that if there ever were any reasons for two organizations in the locomotive cab, there are no such reasons now.

Bureaucrats Hinder Progress

There is just one thing that keeps us apart now, and that is the high salaried official bureaucrats who control both organizations. In spite of what pressure the rank and file is putting on these officials to amalgamate, they always find some foolish and worthless excuse for not doing it.

As long as the two Enginemen Brotherhoods are controlled by swarms of office holders who draw from $7,000 to $15,000 a year, plus a most liberal expense account, it is going to be hard to unite the men in the cab. For years these officials have been busy intrenching themselves in office. They have secured a strangle-hold on the Brotherhood press, such as the Journals and Labor, the railroad weekly. They have gag-laws, like section 84 of the Engineers' Constitution, enacted to stifle all expression by other means. Then we have the notorious "obligation" which constitutes another safeguard for the officials. Every time a working member advocates something to which the bureaucrats are opposed, if they cannot find a law to hang on him, then they will contend that he violated his obligation and out he goes via the expulsion route. But no matter what the officials do, obligations and gag-laws never affect them.

Ridding the two Enginemen's Brotherhoods of excessive salaries, foolish obligations, gag-laws and secret work will go a long way toward clearing the track for the amalgamation of the Engineers and Firemen.

The coming convention of the Engineers, which convenes in Cleveland on the first Monday in June, can do a whole lot toward amalgamation by appointing a rank and file committee consisting of engineers who are known to favor amalgamation and provide this committee with means and full power to prosecute the question of amalgamation to its final conclusion.

The Brotherhood press, circulars and other printed matter, should be employed in the campaign for amalgamation of the Engineers and Firemen and other needed reforms within these two organizations.

ity will provide, by the attendance at them, one means of ascertaining to what extent the attendance at the open demonstrations was sympathetic and conscious. The attitude of the masses toward the prosecution of the leaders, attendance at meetings, responsiveness to appeals, the circulation of the Communist press, etc., in the coming period will be reliable indicators of the depth and consciousness of the movement. All these factors will have to be noted carefully as a basis for further steps.

The Failure of the "General Strike"

Counter-balancing the apparent response to the demonstrations was the total failure of the call for a general strike, issued by the Communist Party. This call fell flat everywhere and its failure is an ominous proof of the fantastic over-estimation of the movement entertained by the Party leadership, and the falsity of the tactics which flowed from this over-estimation. It is impossible to play with calls for a general strike without discrediting this slogan and those who lightly proclaim it. The general situation gave no ground for such a slogan in connection with March 6th, and it was particularly wrong for the Party to issue it, like a casual phrase, when it has been losing one trade union position after another, and thus losing the possibility to give this slogan life even on a partial scale: Needle Trades, Miners, Boot and Shoe Workers, etc. Every failure to make good with a strike call has the effect of still further weakening the trade union position of the Left wing. This is the inevitable penalty of careless phrase-mongering with great slogans.

A continuance of this policy, after the events of March 6th have clearly revealed its unmistakable falsity, prepares the ground for disastrous defeats and a possible loss of those gains actually realized. This, unfortunately, appears to be the line of the Party leadership. Blinded by the spectacular, and more or less external, aspects of the demonstrations, and overlooking these fundamental factors, they are proceeding with the call to "prepare the political mass strike". Thereby they again misjudge the strength and tempo and consciousness of the movement and open the door for colossal blunders which will facilitate reaction. The capitalists and their reformist agents will be the ultimate gainers from this irresponsible and wholly unfounded perspective of the present movement.

The Reformists Step In

The action of the reformist socialists and sections of the trade union bureaucracy in setting up "An Emergency Conference for Unemployment" on the heels of the March 6th demonstrations is a significant event. On the one hand it is a tribute to the great working class action set in motion under the leadership of the Communists; on the other hand it is an obvious attempt to seize the leadership of this movement in order to strangle it. This represents an important danger to the movement in which the Communists up till now have had a virtual monopoly. The outcome of this attempt, and others of a similar nature which are bound to ensue, depends also to a large extent on the tactics of the revolutionaries. Mere denunciation will not be sufficient to cope successfully with such flank attacks.

Now is the time for the Communists to come forward with united front proposals which, if properly applied, will serve the double purpose of consolidating and broadening the movement of the unemployed and of defeating the aims of the reformists. The failure to utilize united front tactics up to now has been a big mistake which paved the way for this maneuver of the socialists and labor fakers and gives it a certain possibility of success.

The United Front Tactics

The right step now is for the Communists to put concrete proposals for common action in behalf of the unemployed to all labor organizations. Such proposals should be put directly to this so-called "Relief" in order to call their bluff. The demands should be few and simple, directly to the issue, and centering around a militant fight for work or compensation for the unemployed workers. This includes of course a demand for united defence of those arrested in connection with the demonstrations on March 6th. It is incorrect in this connection, as it is incorrect in general at the present stage of development, to bury the essential concrete and living demands, which really move the workers, under a long list of so-called "political" demands which the workers do not understand and are not prepared to fight for. The challenge to the officials of all labor organizations to join in a united fight for the interests of the unemployed will create the best conditions for effective agitation for the issues in the ranks of these organizations—a work sadly neglected if not actually ignored, up till now. By these means the base of the movement can be broadened and the revolutionary influence extended.

Unite the Left Wing Forces

Above all, in the face of the growing reactionary offensive and the worsening conditions of the workers it is necessary to unite the Communist and Left wing forces for common action. This is the prerequisite for the mobilization of the workers in defense of their interests around the revolutionary standard. This common action of the Communists and Left wing forces has been blocked and sabotaged by the official leadership of the Party, and the working class movement has been thereby weakened. The attacks, slanders and misrepresentation against the Communist Opposition, the attempts to exclude them even from participation in the actions of the Left wing, are blows against the working class. They help to disarm and disorganize the unemployment movement as well as all other working class movements in the face of a growing unity and aggressiveness of reactionary forces.

We speak now as before for the unity of the Communists and the Left wing forces in a common fight for working class interests, and we appeal to the workers in the ranks of the Party and Left wing to compel a course in this direction.

MINERS NOT CONSULTED IN DRAWING UP AGREEMENT

WILKES-BARRE, Pa.—(FP)—Anthracite coal diggers will have nothing to say in the framing of the new agreement to replace the 5-year contract expiring Aug. 31. This is the word brought back from Indianapolis by international board members of the United Mine Workers, following the union's board meeting.

The tri-district convention of anthracite miners, usually held before the expiration of agreements in order to lay down demands for the new contract, will not be called, Int'l Pres. John L. Lewis has decided. Instead the miners will be summoned into session after the agreement has been negotiated by Lewis and the operators. Faced with an accomplished fact, they are expected to put their approval on a contract which will merely extend the existing document.

The Paris Commune and the Proletarian Revolution

By MAURICE SPECTOR

"... the Franco-German War was the bloody prelude of the great world-holocaust... The French Commune was the lightning-like prophecy of the proletarian world revolution."

Out of the last of the great national struggles of a western bourgeoisie for capitalist state unification sprang the first attempt of the modern working class to conquer political power.

Regardless of Bismark's diplomatic machinations and provocations, the Franco-Prussian struggle of 1870 was for Germany a war of national self-defence. The task of national unification which the middle and working classes had failed to solve in 1848 by revolutionary democratic means, history passed on to Bismark to achieve by means of Blood and Iron. The empire of Napoleon III, Marx considered "the only possible form of government in the epoch in which the bourgeoisie has already lost the power of governing the people while the working class has not yet acquired it". The war, he predicted, "would ring the death knell of the Second Empire; it will end as it began—in a parody". The Little Napoleon could only maintain his regime on the basis of the continued feudal particularism and dismemberment of Germany.

The course of the war swiftly revealed the entire rottenness of the Empire. The French armies were outgeneralled and outnumbered; the military demoralization was the measure of the general state of political decay. Sedan was the logical culmination of a series of disastrous adventures in the Crimea, in Italy and Mexico.

On September 4th, the French bourgeoisie hastened to proclaim the Third Republic and to set up a "Government of National Defence". The war now entered on its second phase, the four months siege of Paris. It now ceased to be a war of national defence for the Germans, a "war not against the French people but the French emperor", and had definitely become the instrument of aggression, the "Prussian military camarilla" whom Marx, on behalf of the International, unreservedly denounced, warning that "the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine would drive France into the arms of Prussia." Paris capitulated on January 28, 1871. The National Assembly with its reactionary monarchist majority authorized Thiers to conclude peace with Bismark by the cession of Alsace-Lorraine and the agreement to an indemnity of five billion francs.

The War and the Misery of the Workers

As usual, the masses had borne the brunt of the suffering and calamity of war; this peace now provoked their deepest resentment as savoring of national betrayal. While the big bourgeoisie, the landlords, the speculators and manufacturers had enriched themselves, the petty bourgeois artisans, peasants and shop-keepers had been ruined and the worker suffered from widespread unemployment. The bourgeois government was aware of the ferment among the people and proceeded to re-establish "law and order" by characteristic means. It pitilessly cancelled the moratorium on rents and other debts, thereby increasing the wholesale misery of the masses; but their cup was full to overflowing, when Thiers attempted to disarm the National Guard, that is to say, the 200,000 armed proletarians. The discontent of the masses broke out into open revolt and on March 18th, the Commune was proclaimed by the Central Committee of the National Guard which constituted itself as the Provisional Government until regular elections could be organized. Thiers and his ministers unfortunately were allowed to remove themselves with impunity to the reactionary Assembly with its headquarters in Versailles.

"France," wrote Engels, "is a country in which the historical struggle of the classes, more than in any other was carried each time to a decisive conclusion..." In the veins of the Parisian masses flowed the tradition of the Commune of 1793-4, of the revolutions of July, 1830 and 1848. Paris was now the scene of the first independent proletarian struggle for power, and Versailles the armed camp of the bourgeois coalition supported by Bismark who returned 100,000 French prisoners to help Thiers crush the Commune. The proletarians of a number of other cities (Marseilles, Lyons, etc.) also proclaimed Communes but were smashed by the bourgeoisie before they could render assistance to Paris, which remained isolated.

The Proletariat Struggles for Power

The Commune lasted for seventy-two days, from March 18 to May 29, 1871. The Central Committee of the National Guard, according to its pledge, proceeded to the communal elections on March 26 and transferred its authority to the elected council. These democratic elections on the basis of universal suffrage have rejoiced the heart of Kautsky. But the Commune is great despite and not because of its infirmities. Its democratic forms cannot obscure its real import as an "anticipation of the dictatorship of the proletariat". In that penetrating study of the Commune called the "Civil War in France", Marx writes with unerring genius that "the Commune was essentially the government of the working class, the result of the struggle of the producing against the appropriating class; it was the political form discovered at last under which labor could work out its economic emancipation."

This was borne out in his view both by the structure of the Commune and the nature of its practical program of legislation. The Commune was the direct antithesis of the Empire. It was to have been not a parliamentary but a working corporation, legislative and executive at the same time. It should not be misinterpreted as the resurrection of the medieval communes. The communal constitution would have brought the rural producers (peasantry) under the intellectual leadership of the towns. The unity of the nation was to be organized by means of the communal structure. The standing army and the police were abolished and their place taken by the people in arms. A blow was struck at the clerical power by the separation of church and state and the expropriation of church property. The judicial functionaries lost their sham independence and were to be chosen by popular mandate. A further blow was aimed at the bureaucracy by setting the maximum pay at 6,000 francs a year and introducing the right of recall. The schools were thrown open to popular education. Night work was abolished in the bakeries; workshops that had been closed down were seized, with the aim of transferring them to groups of cooperative workers.

The Shortcomings of the Commune

But the Commune was not destined to carry out its program. For a successful social revolution, at least two indispensable conditions are necessary, the sufficient development of the forces of production and the preparation of the proletariat. Unfortunately, both of these necessary pre-requisites were lacking.

To take the latter first. The great misfortune of the Commune was the absence of a centralized single-willed revolutionary Communist party, such as dominated the Russian situation in 1917. The Parisian proletariat was led by the most motley crowd of petty-bourgeois socialists—who did not seem to understand the mission of the Commune and who seemed as anxious as possible to shift responsibility. "They could not understand," wrote Lisagaray, an eye witness, "that the Commune was a barricade and not an administration." As a result, the history of the leadership of the Commune is an incredible series of strategic blunders that played right into the hands of the reactionary camp of Versailles.

The major task of the Commune, if it had been guided by a revolutionary party which understood the meaning of civil war, was to crush the National Assembly at Versailles. But instead of assuming the offensive, the Commune waited passively while the Versailles counter-revolution mobilized and organized its forces. Thiers and the rest of the bourgeois executive and bureaucrats were allowed to slip out of Paris under the very noses of the National Guard. The agents of the National Assembly were allowed to carry on their work of sabotage and conspiracy from within the walls of Paris. The Commune suffered from the precipitate transfer of power from the hands of the Central Committee of the Guard to the Council, and then from the lingering division of authority between them. The military work was in a state of confusion. While the bourgeoisie organized its calumny of the Commune on an international scale, the Commune did almost nothing to counteract this poisonous propaganda by popularizing its own true aims. Dissension and disunion prevailed. The Committee of Public Safety that was established, lacked a realization of its true function as an extraordinary commission to protect the revolution.

The Triumph of the Bourgeoisie

The result was that the initiative passed over into the hands of the bourgeoisie, who now had a preponderance of forces. Thiers understood very well what the Commune signified and he suffered no "democratic" and humanitarian illusions in circumventing its destruction. The Versailles entered Paris on May 21st and eight days of fighting and white terror followed. Vae victis! In the course of that bloody week 30,000 communards were massacred and tens of thousands of others were deported or incarcerated. Altogether the Parisian proletariat was bled white of a generation of its elite. The Commune was crushed. France was made safe for the Third Republic, that monument to the fraud of bourgeois democracy, that regime of the Panama scandals, of Millerandism, of the Dreyfus affair, of Poincaré and the alliance with the Tsar, of the press subsidized by the Tsar's minister, Iavolsky, of the murder of Jaures, of Clemenceau and the Treaty of Versailles.

The fall of the Commune spelled the end of the first international also. The French government hounded the internationalists out of France. Bitter dissension arose among the political emigrants. The anarchist opposition of Bakunin based on the Latin countries of small industry, brought about a split. But the real reason for the decline of the International was the same as for the fall of the Commune—the fact that capitalism had not as yet exhausted its latent possibilities. Stalin had not yet been invented and in the view of Marx, the social revolution could be proclaimed, but not solved, within the limits of national boundaries. Neither on the continent nor in Great Britain was the level of economic development ripe for the finish of capitalist production. The British manufacturers dominating the world market, took advantage of the industrial revival to bribe their labor aristocracy, and the desertion of British labor was another heavy blow to the International.

The Lessons of the Commune

The center of gravity of the international labor movement, as Marx had foreseen, now passed to Germany, which experienced its era of great industrial expansion. In the epoch of the Second International and capitalist imperialism, "there could be no more talk of a premature revolution," wrote Kautsky. It was a period of the preparation of the proletariat. But if the First International disappeared in the glory of the Paris Commune, the Second crashed on the shameful betrayal of the social democracy.

The Lessons of the Commune, its essence as a form of the dictatorship of the proletariat, and the necessary role of the revolutionary party as organizer of victory, only became the practical politics of the working class again with the development of the Russian Revolutions of 1905 and 1917. It was Lenin who brought into brilliant relief the teachings that Marx had derived from the Commune and he made them the material for epoch-making theses in the struggle against the Provisional Government and menshevism. One of the foremost of these lessons he applied was that "the working class cannot simply lay hold of the ready-made state machinery and wield it for its own purposes". The slogan—All Power to the Soviets—is the resurrection of the Paris Commune on a gigantic scale, in the epoch of the final struggle between the world proletariat and the imperialist bourgeoisie.

AUTO INDUSTRY MOVES SOUTH

By ROBERT L. CRUDEN

DETROIT—Like all other industries, the auto industry is quietly moving south. This has been brought to light within the past week.

The Kelsey Wheel Co., makers of Ford wheels, have reopened their Memphis, Tenn., plant and are now planning extensive development. They are putting out Ford wheels more cheaply than Ford himself. As a result, the Ford wheel plant at Hamilton, Ohio is being shut down.

Southern workers in the Detroit Kelsey plants are being offered jobs "back home" at fair wages—but they fear that after a month or two their wages will be slashed to 35-40 cents per hour. That is the prevailing rate there at present. The Federated Press was warned, however, not to take these figures too seriously. "Just wait until they get the hill people and the southerners back from Detroit and wages will go down to 20-25 cents an hour," your correspondent was informed.

Fisher Body—General Motors unit—is also building in Memphis. It is intended to develop a real manufacturing center there while Detroit will remain merely as a center of distribution for the northern region. Many Fisher plants in Detroit have been permanently closed. "Integration of manufacture" is the reason given by officials. Movement to the low wage south is the real reason.

The notorious sweat shop, Briggs, has also gone south. Reports here tell of plants opening in Memphis and other southern centers. Workers here are being offered opportunities to go "back home" and teach the "hill billies" at 60 cents an hour. "Yeah, and how long will it last?" is the cynical question which never produces a quite satisfactory reply.

Nevertheless, thousands of southerners have left the city. Penniless and destitute they have gone away, bitter, cynical. Perhaps the auto masters may yet meet their Waterloo, not in world-famed Detroit, but in the unknown towns of the sweated south.

SACCO-VANZETTI CASE REOPENED IN BOSTON

BOSTON—(FP)—The best people in Boston are mortally affronted by a full page advertisement in their morning papers asking, in type two inches high, Were Sacco and Vanzetti Innocent or Guilty? This question solved by Pres. Lowell of Harvard, former Gov. Fuller and other leading dignitaries of the Bay State by sending the two labor men to the electric chair in Charlestown state prison, bobs up again to reopen the famous labor case in an advertisement sponsored by Liberty magazine.

Liberty is offering $10,000 for the "best solution" to the Sacco-Vanzetti mystery, despite the judgement of the Lowell committee. Another $10,000 is offered for the solution of the preparedness day bomb explosion for which Tom Mooney is wasting away his life in San Quentin.

The temerity of a leading national magazine, the pet of the reactionaries, in bringing up these labor cases is another source of amazement in Boston, still sullen and resentful because the rest of the world insists on believing in the innocence of Sacco, Vanzetti and Mooney.

THE NEW COURSE IN THE ECONOMY

ADVENTURE IN ECONO

The success of the industrial development of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics is of universal significance. The Social Democrats deserve nothing but contempt. They do not even attempt to estimate the tempo which Soviet economy has attained. This tempo is neither stable nor assured. We will discuss that later. But it gives experimental proof of the immeasurable potentialities which are inherent in socialist methods of economy.

If in 1918 Social Democracy in Germany had used the power which had been given to it by the Revolution to establish socialism, (and it had every possibility to do so) it would not be difficult to understand, in view of the experience of Soviet Russia, what economic power the socialist masses in central Europe, eastern Europe and considerable portions of Asia, would now have. All the world would have a different aspect. But now humanity will pay for the betrayal of the German Social Democracy by further wars and revolutions. Never was there a greater crime in all history. However, this question is not the subject of our discussion.

The initial estimation of the possibilities of socialistic industrialization was briefly analyzed by us in the book "Whither Russia? Towards Capitalism or Towards Socialism", in the early part of 1925, prior to the end of the reconstruction period. Then we proved that even after all the equipment inherited by the bourgeoisie was exhausted, i. e., after the transition to increased independent reproduction on the basis of socialistic accumulation, Soviet industry would be able to give a coefficient of growth absolutely unattainable by capitalism. After every consideration, we counted on a fifteen to twenty percent annual growth. Philistines of the type of Stalin and Molotov derided these hypothetical figures as though they were a dream of "super-industrialization". Reality left our calculations far behind. But after this there occurred what has often happened before. These empirical Philistines, overwhelmed by the success, decided that from now on everything was possible.

The Meaning of the Stalinist Zig-zag

During recent months it finally became apparent that the Stalin faction has, in the question of domestic economy of the Soviet Union as well as in the policy of the Comintern, transformed its Left zig-zag into an ultra-Left course*. This ultra-Left course is a negation and adventurous addition of that opportunism which has controlled since 1923, and especially from 1926 to 1928. The present day policy represents no less a danger and in certain aspects a greater danger than the policy of yesterday.

The ultra-Leftism in the economic policy of the Soviet Union is now developing along two lines: Industrialization and Collectivism.

Since the beginning of 1923 the Opposition has demanded a quicker tempo of industrialization. It based its demands not only upon the necessities but upon the actual economic possibilities.

The dominating faction (Zinoviev, Stalin, Bucharin, and later Stalin and Bucharin without Zinoviev), accused the Opposition of the intention, in the name of super-industrialization, to "rob the peasants" and thus to break the economic and political connection between town and country.

Experience showed that the Opposition was correct. The opportunistic leadership systematically underestimated the resources of nationalized industry. The actual development of industry, impelled by markets and the pressure of the Opposition, left the official figures from year to year far behind.

The struggle between the central leadership and the Opposition became especially acute, just at that moment when the stand of the Opposition was confirmed along all lines. The leadership was compelled within a few months to forsake their old minimum five-year plan, which had been criticised in the platform of the Opposition, and to replace it with a new and incomparably bolder plan. When the first year demonstrated the possibility of realizing the projected tempo, evidently to the surprise of the leadership itself, the latter at once abandoned their petty doubts and rushed to the opposite extreme. Now, the slogan is: "Forward, without stopping, forward!" The plan is being constantly revised in the direction of its extension.

From passive possibilism the opportunists have turned to unlimited subjectivism. A reference by an economist or a worker to actual obstacles—as for instance, poor equipment, lack of raw material or its poor quality—is considered a betrayal of the revolution. The government demands: speed, action, offensive! Never mind the rest.

How Stalin Handles the Five Year Plan

The first quarter of the present economic year, the second year of the five year plan (October-February), in spite of the significant progress in comparison with the first quarter of the preceding year (about 26% of the growth) missed fire. For the first time during the epigonean leadership, industry remained behind the outlined plan. Especially lagging was the heavy industry. Something was wrong with the cost prices. To lessen or to disguise their straggling, the mills of the heavy industry took recourse through the deterioration of the quality of the products. The amount of "brak" (imperfect products) dangerously increased. The Central Committee answered with the categorical demand not only to fulfill the program, but to surpass it.

The objective data began to testify more and more convincingly, as could have been also foreseen theoretically, that the start was bigger than the strength. The industrialization is upheld more and more by means of the administrative whip. The equipment and the labor-power are being forced. Disproportions of production in different fields of industry are accumulating. Retardation in the following quarters of the year, might prove more threatening than in the first. The government, on its part, sees itself compelled to patch up the newly opened industrial gaps by new budget or credit assignments. This leads to paper money inflation, which becomes, in its turn, a source for the artificial increase of the demand for goods, and consequently makes individual branches of industry surpass the calculations of the plan, and thus increases the accumulation of new disproportions.

The Soviet economy depends on the world economy. This dependence expresses itself by import and export. The foreign trade is the narrowest point of the whole system of the Soviet economy. The difficulties of foreign trade are fundamentally the difficulties of our backwardness. At present, an important fact of conjunctural character must be added to it. The symptoms of crisis of world economy already affect the Soviet export through the decrease of the demand and the lowering of the prices of the exported products. If the world industrial and commercial crisis deepens and prolongs itself, the further narrowing of our, even now, insufficient export, will affect the import, i. e., the import of machines and of the most important kinds of technical raw material. This danger does not, of course, depend on the will of the Soviet leadership. But the leadership can and must take it into consideration. Hazardous speeding up of industrialization, without coordinating the activities of its different branches, runs an obvious risk of finding itself, through its foreign trade, in the midst of the world crisis: the import of the necessary means of production will be cut off, and a new factor of disorganization will enter as a wedge into the five year plan.

It is true that the industrial crisis in America and Europe might open a possibility of commercial and industrial credit for the Soviet Union. But this knife has also two blades: when the economic development has a correct rhythm, the foreign credits are able to ease and speed the progress of industrialization. In the face of the accumulated contradictions, they can only postpone the crisis, giving it later a double force.

However, we mention here the dangers that come from world economy, only in passing, and as a hypothesis. The central question of today is not in them, of course. Immeasurably greater and more direct are the dangers concentrated along the most important line of Soviet policy: the line of the relation between the town and the village.

The Bureaucracy and the Kulaks

For several years the Opposition has demanded the more decisive taxation of the rich layer of the peasantry in the interest of the industrial development. The official leadership denied the fact of accumulation of the rich peasants (Kulaks), and accused the Opposition of the intention of "robbing the peasant". Meanwhile, the Kulaks had developed into a considerable figure, and, leading behind them the middle peasant, subjected the cities and industry to a starvation blockade. The height of the demonstration of the Kulak's strength coincided with the moment of police dispersal of the Opposition (the beginning of 1928). The bureaucracy had to change its policy abruptly. A crusade was declared against the Kulaks. The measures for the limitation of tendencies of exploitation by the Kulaks which the Opposition had proposed the day before, were found insufficient, immediately after the beginning of the struggle with the Kulaks for grain.

The Kulaks, however, are not separated from the middle peasants by an impenetrable partition. In a setting of goods (trade) economy, the middle peasants automatically bring out from their midst a Kulak. The hail of administrative blows, inconsistent and panicky, directed against the Kulaks (and not against them only) cut short the way for the further development for the top layer of the middle peasantry. So-called disagreements with the peasantry became apparent. The peasantry, after the experience of the revolution, does not easily resort to the method of civil war. It rushes around agitatedly looking for another way out. Thus the "wholesale collectivism" was born.

The Soviet government patronizes, in full accord with its main purpose, the cooperative methods, both in trade and industry. Up to the very recent time, however, the productive cooperation in the country (collective farms) has occupied a very insignificant place in the agricultural economy. Only two years ago, the present Commissar of Agriculture, Jakovlev, wrote that collective farming, in view of the technical and cultural backwardness of our peasantry and its scattered character, will remain yet for a long period of time, "little islands in a sea of peasant private farms". Meanwhile, unexpectedly for the leadership, at the very last period, collectivism developed a grandiose speed. It is enough to say that, according to the Five Year plan, the collective economy was supposed to include at the end of the five year period, about 20% of the peasant farms. Meanwhile, the collectivism already, i. e., at the beginning of the second year, includes more than 50% of them. With this speed kept up, collectivism will cover all peasant farms in a year or two. It seems a great success. In actual fact—a great danger.

The Basis for Collective Agricultural Economy

A productive collectivism of agriculture presupposes a definite technical basis. Collective agricultural economy is first of all, a large economy. The rational use of this economy is determined, however, by the character of the applied means and methods of production. With the aid of peasant plows and peasant nags, even all of them put together, it is not possible to create a large agricultural economy, even as it is not possible to build a ship out of a flock of fishing boats. The collectivization of agricultural economy can be achieved only through its mechanization. From this follows that a general development of the industrialization of a country determines the possible speed of the collectivization of its agricultural economy.

But in reality these two processes turned out to be separated. In spite of its fast development, the Soviet industry still is, and will for a long time yet, remain extremely backward. The high coefficients of its growth are to be considered in relation to the general low level. We must not forget for a moment that, even in case the intended plan should be fully carried out, the Soviet industry would be able to supply with tractors and other kinds of machinery only 20-25% of the peasant farms. And that only at the end of the five year period. That is the real scale of the collectivization.

While the Soviet Union remains isolated, the industrialization (that is, the mechanization and electrification, etc.) of agriculture could be thought of only as a prospect of a number of consecutive Five Year plans. The present leadership itself so looked at this matter till yesterday. But now it appears that the collectivization has already fulfilled itself by 50%, and that during the next year it will be completed to 100% in a number of the most important agricultural regions.

It is perfectly clear that the present tempo of collectivization is defined not by the productive but by the administrative factors. The sharp, and, as a matter of fact, panicky, change of the policy toward the Kulaks, as well as toward the middle peasant resulted, during the last year, in an almost complete liquidation of the NEP.

A peasant represents a small productive unit and as such cannot exist without a market. The liquidation of the NEP presented for the middle peasants the following alternatives: either to go back to the natural consuming economy, i. e., to disappear, or to become involved in a civil war for the market; or to try his hand at the new way in the collective economy.

In collectivization the peasant finds not persecution but advantages: lesser taxes, supply of agricultural machinery on easy terms, loans etc. If at present the peasantry is crowding into collective economy, it is not because the collective economy has already shown its advantages. It is not because the State has already proved to the peasant (or at least to itself) that it has the possibility to reconstitute the peasant economy on the collective basis in the near future. It is because the peasantry, and first of all, its top layer, which was during a number of years of the liberal Stalin-Ustrialov policy, getting more and more into a mood of a capitalistic farmer, suddenly found itself in an impasse. The gate of the market was padlocked. The peasants stood frightened in front of it a while, and then rushed to the only open gate, that of collectivization.

The leadership itself was not less surprised by the sudden rush of the peasants into the collective economy than the peasants were surprised by the liquidation of

* We state with great satisfaction, the fact that our friends in the Soviet Union do not in the least deceive themselves about the Stalinist "ultra-Leftism", which Right Mensheviks and Liberals call "Trotskyism", realized by Stalin. We succeeded during recent months in exchanging a number of letters with our friends in different parts of the Soviet Union and found a common agreement on the attitude toward the new course. Some of the letters received by us are being published in extracts in the present number of the Bulletin of the Opposition (In Russian).

(The Militant will shortly publish a number of the letters here referred to by comrade Trotsky.—Editors.)

OF THE SOVIET UNION :--: by L. D. Trotsky

MICS AND ITS DANGER

the NEP. But getting over its astonishment, the leadership created a new theory: the building of socialism—it enters its “third” stage: there is no more need for a market; in the near future the Kulak as a class will be liquidated.

The Bureaucrats About-Face

Essentially it is not a new theory. It is the old theory of socialism in one country; only the gears are shifted to the “third speed”. Formerly we have been taught that the building of socialism will go with a “snail’s pace” (Bucharin) and the Kulak will be painlessly “growing in” to socialism. Now the “snail’s pace” is replaced with a speed almost that of aviation. The Kulak does not “grow in” any more—not a chance at such a speed—the Kulak is simply being liquidated through the order of an administration.

The liquidation of the Kulak, seriously taken, is unquestionably the liquidation of the last capitalistic class. Without the basis of the Kulak, a jobber, a speculator, a city Nepman, cannot exist economically. It is even more so since the official program of the liquidation of the Kulaks as a class, includes in it the petty bourgeois elements of the city.

To include the entire peasantry in the socialistic economy means to transform the Soviet Union into a society without classes in two or three years. The society which has no classes does not need a government, especially such a concentrated form of government as a dictatorship. No wonder that some of the young “theoreticians” of the new course expressed an idea that it would be advisable to liquidate the Soviets, at least in the villages, and to replace them with the merely productive organizations, namely, with the administration of the local collective economy. These “theoreticians” were, however, brought to their senses by a declaration, from the top, that the dictatorship will be necessary for a long time yet. But why and what for it will be necessary to have a dictatorship after a complete liquidation of the Kulaks—that is to come in a year—the leaders did not explain. And it is not an accident either. Otherwise, they themselves would have to admit that the program of the speedy liquidation of the Kulaks, with the aid of peasant ploughs and old mares and wagons, is a bureaucratic adventure, spiced with theoretical charlatanism.

The Kulaks and Industrialization

In practice, the liquidation of the Kulaks led to merely administrative methods of the confiscation of the Kulak’s property, his house, his lot and to his exile. This policy has been carried out in a way which regards the Kulak as an entirely foreign body among the peasants, some kind of invader, like a nomad or a Tartar. As a matter of fact, the Kulak represents only one of the stages of the development of the middle peasants. It is possible, of course, to liquidate every individual Kulak. It can be achieved with the aid of two well-armed policemen. But to prevent the re-appearance of Kulaks, at least in the collective economies, is much more difficult. For that, industrialization and the cultural revolution are necessary.

There are three types of collective economies in the Soviet Union, depending on the degree to which the means of production are in common use. These kinds are: the Partnerships, the Guilds and the Communes. In a Partnership the work in the fields is being done by private equipment: the labor is common, but the means of production belong to the individuals. In Guilds the most expensive machinery is the common property. And, finally, in Communes all means of production are the common property. The ways of dividing profits among the members of these types of economies differ according to the forms of ownership: from the capitalistic to the near-communistic way.

These three types of collective economies represent the three stages of the progress of collectivisation. The highest type demonstrates to the lower one its tomorrow.

The transition from one stage to another—its volume and its tempo—is fundamentally determined by the technical conditions of production. Therefore it is perfectly clear, that the wider is the scale of the present collectivisation, the more primitive form it will have to take, thus opening the way to capitalistic tendencies. But the last order of the Central Committee demands as far as possible, full common ownership of the means of production from the very beginning. In other words wholesale collectivisation, supported mainly by peasant equipment, must occur in a form approximately between a Guild and a Commune. The contradiction is striking: the wider the scale of forced collectivisation, and consequently, the lower its technical basis, the higher is the type of social relations that the utopian-bureaucratic leadership is trying to impose.

At the same time the question of intra-relation of the collective economies is not discussed in the press. To avoid the decisive social question concerning the distribution of profits, the leaders and the executors replace the Marxian analysis with an unbearable propagandistic noise.

The Class Character of the Collectives

It goes without saying, that if the state industry could supply the collective economies with state means of production, it would soon remove the difference between these collective economies and the state farms. It would transform the peasants into regular socialistic workmen for state wheat factories, and would once and forever, take the ground from under the feet of the Kulaks. But from such a regime we are as yet separated by many years. The prevailing majority of collective economies will be compelled, for several years, to fall back upon the live-stock and other equipment of the peasants themselves.

Let us admit, however, that even under these conditions, collectivisation will show serious and direct advantages, capable of overcoming the individualistic tendencies of the peasants. Immediately, a new difficulty arises; not one of an administrative but of a social nature; not the difficulty inherent in methods of collective economy, but the class character of small producers: namely, the problem of distributing profits. Would a peasant who gave to the collective economy two horses, have a right to more profit than a farm-hand who brought with him only his two arms? If the percentage on the “capital” should not be credited, nobody would want to supply his own property for nothing. Then the state will meet with an insurmountable task: to equip anew all the collective economies with necessary machinery. Should the percentage on the “capital” be allowed, an economic differentiation of individuals within the collective economies will inevitably follow. And in case collective economies prove to have considerable advantages in comparison with individual farming, differentiation through them will develop faster than it did before.

The problem is not, however, exhausted by the matter of equipment alone. A family which has three workers, would want to receive more than a family with only one grown-up worker. Should a collective economy want to use the unexpended part of the earnings of its members as a loan to buy new machinery, or for a turn-over of capital, again it would have to pay a percentage. This in turn opens the way to more differentiation within the economy, and thus, to its possible transformation into a petty bourgeois cooperation, with the concentration of leadership in the hands of the well-off, and the majority of its members in a position close to that of a mere farm-hand

Such phenomena have already been observed in the past, when collective economies remained, with rare exceptions, entirely selective. They are even more inevitable in face of the wholesale collectivisation, which, by retaining the practical basis of a small farm, brings with it all the contradictions inherent in the small productive unit, and thus the inevitable re-appearance of the Kulaks within the collective economies.

The Kulaks in Masquerade

It means that the next day after the official “liquidation of the Kulaks as a class” i. e., after the confiscation of the property of “named Kulaks”, and their exile, the Stalinist bureaucracy will declare the Kulaks within the collective economies to be progressive or “civilized co-operators”, falsely quoting, of course, Lenin’s formula (“Concerning Cooperation”). The collective economy may become, in this case, only a new form of social and political disguise for the Kulaks. As director of such a masquerade, the present Commissar of Agriculture, Jakovlev, is perfect. Not in vain did he occupy himself for several years with statistical equilibristics to prove that the Kulak was invented by the Opposition. Not in vain was he, till yesterday, together with other officials, declaring that the Platform of the Opposition was a counter-revolutionary document—the Platform which demanded the speeding up of collectivisation on the basis of planned industrialization.

In the meantime the peasants react to the contradictions between the collectivisation and its insufficient technical basis in advance, by selling their live-stock right and left before joining the collective economies. The official press is full of alarming reports of the mass destruction of working live-stock and its sale to slaughter houses. The leadership reacts to this with orders, telegrams and threats. But it is obviously insufficient. A peasant does not know whether he will get credit for his horse or his cow, or in what way. He hopes that a collective economy will get a tractor from the state. In any case he does not see any reason why he should give his cow to the collective economy for nothing. A peasant is still a narrow realist. Seeing himself compelled to join the collective economy, he hurries to get the advantages from the liquidation of his individual property. The working live-stock decreases. Meanwhile the state has no possibility to replace it with mechanical power, or at least with other stock of better quality. This prepares the exceptionally acute difficulties for the collective economies at the very beginning of their activities.

The Panicky Retreat of Stalin

It is not difficult to foresee that after the present insecure offensive, the panicky retreat will follow, elemental down below, and pretending to be a “maneuvering” policy above. The collective economies hastily built up, will either simply fall apart, or will begin their degradation. In a cruel internal struggle, the individual means of production will be liberated, thus opening the way to capitalistic tendencies. Irreproachable leadership will blame, of course, the executors of being “Trotskyists”, and will bring out from some hidden corner Stalin’s capitalistic-farmer’s formulae of 1924-25, in case the party will give the bureaucratic fourflushers the necessary time.

What the Bureaucrats Will Say

It is not difficult to foresee what reaction our analysis will arouse in the official circles. The government officials will say that we are gambling on a crisis. Scoundrels will add that we desire the fall of the Soviet government. People of Yaroslavsky’s type will explain that we write in the interest of Chamberlain. It is possible that the Mensheviks and liberals will drag out a score of sentences to prove that it is indispensable for Russia to come back to capitalism. The Communist officials will again establish the “solidarity between the Opposition and the Mensheviks”. So it happened before, so it will happen again. But that will not stop us. Intrigues pass, but facts remain. The Stalinist bureaucracy, after several years of opportunistic policy, is going through a period of short-lasting but acute madness of ultra-Leftism. The theory and practice of the “Third Period” carry with them equally destructive consequences within the Soviet Union as well as outside its borders.

Some people will say: the Opposition has changed places with the Apparatus. The Opposition accuses the Apparatus of super-industrialization while it itself pulls to the Right. Other thoughtful souls will add: the Right wing that used to accuse the Stalinists of super-industrialization and of “Trotskyism” has capitulated to Stalin, while the Left Opposition, it seems, is taking the point of view of the Right wing.

All such reasonings, comparisons and approximations can be foreseen beforehand. And it is possible to write in advance all articles and speeches that will be written and said on the subject. It is not difficult to disclose the superficiality of these reasonings.

The Opposition has never undertaken “to catch up and pass in quick time” the capitalist world. We demanded the speeding up of industrialization, because it is the only way to secure a leading position for the cities in their relation to the country, and thus to the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Our Estimates for Industrialization

Our estimation of the possibilities of industrialization was immeasurably broader and bolder than that of the bureaucrats during all the time till 1928. But we never regarded the resources of industrialization as inexhaustible. We never thought that its tempo could be regulated by the administrative whip alone. We have always advanced, as a basic condition of industrialization, the idea of the necessity of a systematic improvement of the conditions of the working class. We have always considered collectivisation as dependent upon industrialization. We saw the socialist reconstruction of peasant economy only as a prospect of many years to come. We never closed our eyes to the inevitability of internal conflicts during the socialistic reconstruction of a single nation. To remove contradictions in country life is possible only by removing contradictions between the city and the country. This can be realized only through the world revolution. We never demanded, therefore, the liquidation of classes within the scope of the Five Year plan of Stalin and Krzhizhanovskiy. We demanded the limitation of the exploiting tendencies of the Kulaks, and the systematic cutting off of his accumulation in the interest of industrialization. For that we were exiled on the strength of article 58 of the Criminal Code.

The Marxian Opposition was denounced by the bloc of the Right and the Center. They separated for a while. But now they are united again. They have a common basis: nationalistic-socialism. Together they made a curve of 180 degrees over our heads. They transform more and more the problem of industrialization into a hazardous bureaucratic super-industrialization. They abolished the NEP, i. e., committed the very “crime” of which they falsely accused the Opposition and for which our friends are still filling up the prisons and places of exile. The limitations of the Kulaks they replace with the official “liquidation”, which yesterday they have been ascribing to us and which we denied with clear Marxian conscience.

The Rights, who were afraid to take the most necessary steps ahead, now joined with the Center in a frantic rush “forward”. The bloc is restored and the snail’s pace is replaced by the speed of an airplane.

Next Steps of the American Workers

By ARNE SWABECK

Arising largely out of the present conditions of a deep depression and widespread unemployment, working class forces are now being set into motion. The most pressing question of the moment before the American revolutionary movement therefore, is a correct orientation as a base for formulation of its strategy and tactics among the masses.

It is not yet possible to estimate the extent, the depth and the duration of the present deep depression of American capitalist economy; but certain characteristic features are clearly visible. Financial experts, when speaking seriously and not for mere public consumption, acknowledge the depression but stress every production increase in single industries, particularly the recent gains in steel output in some quarters, as signs of an early recovery. This, of course, is a deliberate policy, which does not alter the actual situation in the least. However, there is today a noticeable difference from the various pre-war crises. The latter were distinct symptoms of growth which were chiefly stoppages in the violent growth of productive machinery and the expansion of markets to make possible certain adjustments necessitated by this rapid process.

Today the United States has reached the stage of large scale structural unemployment, which, in other words, means a standing army of unemployed. This is not merely of those cast out from some industries to be quickly absorbed into other or new developing ones, but "superfluous" workers eliminated by the rapid development of machinery and immensely increased labor productivity in practically every sphere. This is sufficiently borne out by all available reliable statistics.

Unemployment—A Spur to Class Action

The spectre of the standing army of unemployed will hence be haunting the exploiters and become a mighty spur moving the workers toward class action. The direction and the speed this will take in its first stage depends, however, a great deal on the present level of development. Unfortunately it cannot be expected, or even hoped, that the workers will as a mass move with one leap to the Communist party or the "revolutionary unions". Any orientation based upon such hopes will surely come to grief. On the contrary, it is the duty of Communists to be with the masses set in motion and to show the proper direction through such steps that the workers are now ready to take.

With the lines of those seeking work growing longer in front of factory gates, it cannot be expected that the working class will engage in widespread offensive battles. But we know, from what is inherent in the capitalist system, that precisely in this situation the capitalists seek to get out of economic difficulties by increased pressure upon the workers through further reduction of their standard of living and conditions of work. This added pressure leaves no way open for the workers but one of resistance. The logic of this deduction leads to the conclusion of a coming period of defensive battles. The history of the American workers throughout the various crises of capitalist production is replete with defensive battles, before the offensive could again be assumed during the period of recovery. It is also one filled with many attempts to seek a solution in political reform activities, as the most immediate outgrowth of the crisis. This suggests another conclusion that this is the trend of development we face at this moment.

Some Labor History and Struggles

A cursory glance at labor's history from the beginning of trades unionism in the thirties, through the various periods of cyclic crises, shows with almost unvarying regularity the same phenomenon. During times of "prosperity", with its labor shortage and the cost of living invariably out-leaping raises in wages, aggressive strike offensives and expansion of trade unions were on the order of the day. These just as surely changed when a new crisis set in. While these were often accompanied with desperate and violent revolts, the character and often repeated defeats of the defensive strikes turned the workers' attention toward struggle for political reforms which were often expressed through various forms of labor or middle class parties. This may be said to have been particularly marked up until the "great upheaval" in '85 and '86; but a similar recurrence of developments of more recent date can be noticed. As an example a few facts from the last industrial depression at the end of 1921 and beginning of 1922 will prove very instructive.

The U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics gives the following figures on the character and cause of disputes during the depression. We quote from the years 1919 to 1923, which, although incomplete, are very suggestive. Disputes for wage increases (offensive character) reached in the year 1919 a total of 1,074; for the year 1920 a total of 1,323; 1921 a total of 120; 1922 a total of 133; 1923 (first six months) a total of 310. Disputes in resistance of wage decreases (defensive character) were as follows: Year 1919 a total of 86; year 1920 a total of 147; year 1921 a total of 895; 1922 a total of 255; 1923 (first six months) a total of 20. This is sufficient to show clearly the large extent of disputes of a defensive character, to ward off wage decreases, during the depression, to be immediately reversed and become offensive struggles, for wage increases, during the period of recovery. Similarly, the disputes around demands for union recognition reached their highest during these years with a total of 350 in 1919 and its lowest with only 53 in 1921. The employers' offensive netted them the highest number of direct victories in these disputes in 1921 with a total of 701.

The Political Action of Labor

How does the matter stand, then, with labor political action? One can, of course, speak only of labor political reformist action since the American workers as a mass have not yet learned the necessity of revolutionary action. The more recent labor and farmer-labor party developments arose in 1919 with the formation of the National Farmer-Labor Party at Chicago. In 1920 there was the first appearance of the Farmer-Labor Party of the state of Washington. In some other states there were labor activities within non-partisan political leagues. But in 1922 this movement received a pronounced impetus. During the summer the American Labor Party of New York City was organized; the Minnesota non-partisan political league became re-organized to the Farmer-Labor Party, while a similar reorganization took place in South Dakota. The same year saw the organization of the Progressive Party (farmer-labor) in Idaho and one year later the Farmer-Labor Party of West Virginia. At the "Conference for Progressive Political Action" conference in Cleveland in 1922, at which a number of international unions and central bodies were represented, a motion made by the Chicago Federation of Labor group to "declare for independent political action by the agricultural and industrial workers through a party of their own" was defeated with a vote of only 64 to 52.

It is significant that these were the developments following right upon the heels of the last industrial depression. The culmination and beginning of the decline of this movement were reached at the July, 1923 convention in Chicago at which the Federated Farmer-Labor Party was formed, but alas—on paper. From the last gasp at the Farmer-Labor Party convention at St. Paul the following year, there have been but little actual signs since in this direction.

The Rising Struggles

The present depression finds the vast gulf of class distinctions greater than ever in the United States. According to government reports the total net profits of all corporations in 1929 after all deductions were made have almost doubled since 1922, rising to an estimated amount of $9,900,000,000. While profits thus soared, wages paid to workers in manufacturing industries during the same period advanced but 19 per cent, not to speak of the level of the cost of living. From December, 1928 to September, 1929 the Labor Bureau, Inc. estimates that the average wage in the country decreased 2 percent.

It is a foregone conclusion that American imperialism will make efforts abroad to get out of its economic difficulties, through war and otherwise, while simultaneously strengthening its world hegemony. The first steps are already being put into operation. Leaving aside here the matter of the effects of these efforts abroad, American capitalism of course likewise tries to make the workers at home bear the increased burden. The results will almost surely lead to a repetition of past history. But this will take place now, however, under conditions of a higher development of capitalism and also on a higher plane for the working class. The crushing capitalist offensive during the present heavy unemployment, with the aim to reduce wages, increase speed-up and to cripple the unions, will bring forth resistance through workers' defensive struggles. It will certainly involve workers organized in the existing trades unions. The necessarily accompanying despotic use of the capitalist machinery of the state, to carry the offensive through more effectively, points to the workers' resistance in this field taking a direction towards political reformist activities, most likely to be expressed in a labor political party.

The Labor Party and the Communists

Under such conditions would a labor party spring forth as a full fledged instrument of imperialism? Reactionary labor "leaders" would surely become part of its composition and strive for "leadership" there the same as they do in all other broad non-revolutionary workers' organizations. They will, of course, continue in their role as tools of imperialism. Very consciously American imperialism will learn to utilize them as "saviours" of their system and privileges fully as well as in the case of the McDonald government in England today. The American McDonalds in turn will exert all energies to subject the labor party as a whole to further this aim. But their success in this endeavor depends precisely upon their ability to keep Communist influence isolated on the outside. Nevertheless, as a means of helping to separate the working masses from their political bondage to the historical capitalist parties, the labor party would serve as well today as in the past and would occupy the same place in history as previously assigned to it. In that sense it will be one step toward the logical revolutionary position that the American working class must finally assume.

So far, this working class, as its history shows, has only reached the point of more or less localized and sporadic attempts in reformist politics. It is still completely bound within the capitalist political party system which thereby serves as a mighty brake upon the essential character of any economic struggles of the workers. That is today decisive, and the problem is to break through this barrier. Increased pressure upon the workers will lead to finding the forms for breaking through. What road will the first steps take? The road of the revolution with the Communist Party? That is quite inconceivable, even with a rapid tempo of development. Can we in America avoid the stage of a national scale of labor political reformist activities? That is the way to put the question, and to also add, that even though it can hardly be avoided, it will of necessity be of short duration in the present epoch of rapid development. It then becomes pertinent to ask, how can the working class best and most speedily draw the correct conclusion from such political reformist experiences, and how can it best be helped on the further road to a revolutionary position?

Upon the Communist movement devolves the duty of giving a correct answer to this question as well as to employ the tactics which will really be a help in the right direction. This we intend to discuss further in another article.

HOOVER SPEEDS POSTAL CLERKS

BUFFALO—Hoover has issued his cry "Efficiency". The Buffalo postal employees have already been "efficiency-ized" so much that they carried their complaint to Congress. An investigator was sent to Buffalo. He investigated—the clerks sweated; and now the report has been handed in. The official report admits the truth of the complaints that the new system is "nerve-wracking and a slave-driving one", and undoubtedly "showing a lack of consideration for the clerks", but, continues the report, "the mail service comes before the clerk".

In short, the present speed-up helps business and decreases the money necessary for clerks (thus leaving more for the politicians in the form of supervisors and inspectors.) So the speed-up is approved and continued.

The Post Office clerks appealed to Congress and now they are left holding the bag. Thus far they have been afraid to resort to any but congressional action for the improvement of their conditions. The Post Office speed-up is recognized by all connected with the service. Since 1921, according to government reports, the output per man has increased over 32%. Nor has this been due to increased use of machinery. It is due to the system, to the foreman at your side ready to jump on you and "write you up" the minute you turn your head.

A long fight is ahead of the postal clerks before this speed-up is eliminated. No amount of Congressional appeal will ever do away with the constant riding of the "efficiency administrators". The clerks will have to initiate a movement for a bona fide and strong union.

The London Debacle

will be achieved is obvious from the whole viewpoint of capitalist diplomacy, which can only try to solve its differences in the arena of war.

The Lineup against the Soviet Union

The question of the relations of the powers to the Soviet Union received special consideration during one of the sessions in which there appeared no possible solution to the conference negotiations. Japan opened with a defense of its naval program on the basis that her position off the coast of Siberia demanded that she be fully prepared to take part in a general offensive against the Workers Republic. This set a precedent which was followed by the other powers. France and Italy in particular emphasized this as one of the main reasons for their naval program. It goes without saying that all of the powers have in mind an attack against the Soviet Union and that this conference has already posed the question of the relation of forces between these imperialist wolves in that event. The problem of the defense of the Soviet Union grows greater and greater and becomes one of the chief tasks of the international proletariat.

Conference Can Offer No Solution

It is clear that the London conference will arrive at nothing definite regarding naval limitation. The disappointment of Social Democracy and Pacifism is a great one. Their hopes have been shattered through the miserable collapse of the conference in which they planned such exalted hopes. Along with this destroyed hope, the open betrayal of McDonald has become so much the more clear in his resignation from the Independent Labor Party—and his complete solidification with British Imperialism.

The much heralded London conference has collapsed. Attempts to revive it will fall exceedingly short of their mark.

The problem of war remains as ever the problem of the international proletariat irrespective of sham conferences, utilized only to mislead the workingclass and put them in a state of false security. Its solution lies in the destruction of this system of exploitation and war.

—ALBERT GLOTZER

Throughout the World of Labor

From Moscow

At Moscow, political work is carried on principally in a disorganized fashion. A dull and apathetic discontent pervades the workers. At present it is difficult to obtain food even. Manufactured goods are rationed. The lowering of the cost prices, if achieved, will be entirely through increased speed-up. Living expenses not only do not decrease, but, in fact, generally increase. If anyone shows signs of discontent—"the workers demand the discharge of the class enemy". It is thus that the competition and enthusiasm of the masses is assured.

For example: A worker, overcome by exhaustion, is refused permission to leave by the factory manager. In order not to be charged with ill-will, and in order not to incur the consequences of a "fraudulent leave", she continues working until she collapses. Then the workers carry her to the ambulance where it appears that instant medical attention is necessary. Similar occurrences are not rare.

At Solomichino (in the Urals), a place of deportation one of our deported comrades, Ikanevsky, was wounded at night, while asleep, by a shot through the window. He was struck in both hands, the bones of the right hand being broken. Despite the fact that the wound, although dressed by the doctor, became infected, he was not permitted, for two weeks, to go to Guralak for necessary surgical attention. They even attempted to make this appear faked. But they were finally forced to admit the reality of the criminal attack.

Another example: one of our comrades, deported to the Urals, was refused necessary succor for three months (since all work is forbidden). His demands were met with the taunts, "Go get it in Moscow". (The deportees who leave the town are exposed to imprisonment.—N. D. L. R.) Unable to provide for his wants he had to request incarceration.

The administration resorts to the most despotic and frightful measures toward our deported comrades. The infraction of any arbitrary rule of the G. P. U. (for example, the ban against telephoning) carries with it the menace: "Narim or the convict prison". (Narim is a place of deportation in Siberia, notorious for the hardships which the deportees suffer there.—N. D. L. R.)

Recently I had the opportunity to speak to a sympathizer who is a member in the management of a factory. I give his words briefly: "It is difficult to characterize the attitude in the circles of economic administration except as confusion and uncertainty. Very seldom does someone rise up against the five year plan. Yet none is convinced of its possibilities, mainly on account of the successive modifications of the plan. The last time, when we made modifications involving the reduction of costs and the increase in wages, we warned the Supreme Economic Council that their figures were delusive. They replied, 'Do as you are told', and we obeyed."

The masses are silent. We are in a period of stagnation despite the indisputable progress of industry. There is no real growth in proletarian initiative. It is no mistake to say that this period reminds one in many respects of the one following the reaction after 1905. They stay away, they do not attend meetings, or they arrive in time for the motion picture. (Many political meetings make use of motion pictures.—N. D. L. R.) When six hundred are expected at a meeting, only two hundred show up. If the worker is asked, "Why don't you come?" he answers: "They won't tell anything new. It's all right, I won't be missed."

At workers' meetings numerous written demands come to the committee: "Where is Trotsky? What is Trotsky doing?" etc.

Many workers do not come to meetings except for renewing their contracts with the cooperatives. The appeals in the paper reach only a small upper strata of the working class and then not for long.

This year should see vast reorganizations in the factories and shops. Under the present conditions of the regime and of the Party, the system of individual management cannot but worsen the already difficult situation.

The Struggle Against Unemployment in Europe and Its Conduct

The bureau of the C. I. for western Europe—the organization created for action on a set date and on a world scale—has launched an appeal for "powerful demonstrations" which will bring together workers, employed and unemployed, in all countries. Certainly we should rejoice over the fact that the strategists of the new line have, in these last months, discovered the problem of unemployment. But what is less heartening is that they do not consider the problem of unemployment in its relation to the concrete situation in each country, but handle it in that ridiculously mechanical fashion, the failure of which we have already seen on August 1st, the first day of international struggle.

Since the Sixth World Congress it has become customary with the C. I. to discover from time to time a "central problem" which, to conform to the "revolutionary rise" in the entire planet, is thereupon proclaimed a "central problem" for all countries.

Last summer and fall it was the international strike movement being transformed into political mass strikes—if not in actuality, at least in the theses of the Executive; now it is from the supposed revolutionary movement among the unemployed the whole world over that the E.C.C.I. awaits the destruction of the very foundations of capitalism.

Tomorrow it will doubtlessly be the revolutionary peasants who will embark on a revolutionary movement in honor of the international peasant congress which will be held about March 15. It seems that the bureau for western Europe with its wise foresight of this "next higher step in the revolutionary rise", has advanced the day for the world-wide struggle against unemployment from February 26 to March 6—no doubt in order that there may be a somewhat greater interval from one step to the other.

That kind of display, with "great days of struggle", has clearly nothing in common with the need for bringing the mass of unemployed to the general front of working class struggle. Some of the slogans given out by the bureau for western Europe for the day of struggle, such as "creation of organizations of unemployed", are, as a matter of fact dangerous.

If there is any sense to this slogan—that is, if it is less stupid than the one, "unemployment aid equivalent to full wages"—it can mean only the creation of organizations of unemployed, or unions of unemployed.

This slogan alone, reveals the complete lack of seriousness and the extreme ignorance of the phrase-slugging bureaucrats who are now discrediting communism.

What can be the significance of unions of unemployed? At most, to strengthen, in organized form, the isolation from the factory workers which already characterizes the unemployed. This means that they will be playing the game of the trade union bureaucrats; since the latter in most countries lend support to this isolation (which is, to a certain extent, the inevitable result of the removal of the worker from the productive process) by expelling unemployed members from the unions.

The formula of separate unions for unemployed takes for its point of departure the dangerous delusion that organized masses of unemployed can better their miserable conditions without the aid of the workers in the factories and trade unions. Of all the delusions of the third period that are growing with such speed, there is none as dangerous as this one.

Unemployment and the Workers' Morale

Permanent unemployment, such as exists in Germany, Austria, England, Poland, etc., places upon the Communists in these countries the task of preventing, with all their power, the artificial stirring up of tension and disputes between unemployed and employed workers which the reformists are systematically attempting. Unemployment is not, in general, a factor which strengthens the revolutionary current in the working class movement. On the contrary, it allows reformism to reinforce its position in the factories—the fear of unemployment being one of its best allies. In addition, it makes it possible for reformism to throw out of the factories the most conscientious and revolutionary elements. And lastly, there is no doubt that the longer unemployment lasts, the more it demoralizes and paralyzes the workers.

In order that the great dangers which are created by unemployment are not entirely ruinous, all separation between employed and unemployed workers, as far as organization is concerned, must be avoided; therefore: no separate union for unemployed but active struggle in the unions against the exclusion of unemployed and for recognition of the unemployed by the union.

But we have not yet come to the essential question. It is not the form of organization of the movement of unemployed that is decisive, but the methods of struggle against unemployment. On this depends the question of organization.

If the purely union struggle is extremely restricted in the present period, the struggle for serious reforms in favor of the unemployed has absolutely no chance of succeeding. Only great mass actions can wrest temporarily certain concessions from capitalism; only struggles of determined masses, including unemployed and employed workers can teach them that they will achieve lasting betterment of their situation only by overthrowing the existing capitalist regime.

Is there anyone in the C. I. who questions this elementary truth? Even the bureau for western Europe calls for "united revolutionary action of unemployed and employed workers".

Now we come to the point. The appeal for solidarity will never get the mass of employed workers into the streets beside the unemployed. And neither will this appeal for solidarity prevent the masses of desperate unemployed from countenancing wage reductions. The art of a revolutionary party consists, not in launching these appeals with an abundance of gigantic posters and noisy speeches, but in the act of concentrating the struggle on the questions which affect the self-interest of employed and unemployed workers equally. But this plainly goes beyond the limits of a schema valid for five continents, and it would be necessary for the different parties to adapt the struggle to the concrete circumstances of their own countries. The situation in Germany is special: there the party should direct all its action on the basis of the struggle against the Young plan; with which, as the central action, should be connected the struggle of employed workers against the financial, tariff and social policies of the government. The situation in Austria is again different: here the party should turn the struggle of the unemployed into a central action against fascism, for a proletarian program of immediate demands.

One thing only is valid in a general way for all countries: the struggle cannot be conducted in the manner imagined by the bureaucrats of the Stalin apparatus—by means of big displays and high-sounding articles and speeches.

LABOR FAKERS ATTACK ALIEN WORKERS

DETROIT—(FP)—Over 1,600 aliens employed by the city of Detroit stand to lose their jobs by the mayor's approval of a resolution just passed by the council providing for the immediate dismissal of all employees not citizens of the United States. Those with first papers are also to be unconditionally fired.

Last week 748 laborers were fired because they had not yet become citizens. Most of the latest group to be fired are also manual workers, although a considerable percentage comes from the hospitals.

The resolution to fire was introduced by Councilman Ewald, president of the city. Pres. F. X. Martel of the Detroit bricklayers' union and was actively supported by the Federation of Labor.

THE MILITANT

is the only newspaper in the United States that regularly publishes the writing of L. D. Trotsky, Ch. Rakovsky and other leaders of the Left Opposition of the Communist movement based upon the teachings of Marx and Lenin. In addition it is the only periodical in the English language in any part of the world that prints the correct estimation of world events based upon a Leninist conception.

The Militant is the organ of those who want to reestablish the international Communist movement on the basis it was up till the death of Lenin. Published weekly, it is a powerful factor in mobilizing the working class along the correct ideological lines. Without its regular appearance the Left Opposition not only in America but throughout the world would sustain a severe loss.

In a recent letter, comrade Trotsky asserted that La Verite the weekly organ of the French Left Opposition and The Militant were the two best organs of the movement that is conducting a campaign for a return to Lenin's teachings. To enable The Militant to continue publication, the immediate support of all its readers is necessary. A donation to its Sustaining Fund will enable it to continue to exist.

The New Course in Economy of Soviet Union

The Restoration of the Right-Center Bloc

For how many months will the present leadership whip up the Party on the road of ultra-Leftism? We think not for very long. The more frenzied the character of the present course, the sooner and more acutely its contradictions will come out. Then to the former 180 degrees, the leadership will add another curve, coming near to its starting point from another end. So it has been, so it will be again.

The tempo of industrialization must guarantee not the building of national socialism, but the reinforcement of the basis under the proletarian dictatorship, as well as the improvement of the conditions of the working masses of city and country. This is an entirely realistic task. It demands a combination of courage and prudence. It excludes both over-caution and wild recklessness.

It would be absurd to pretend that the Opposition has ready a priori a plan for a painless way out of the new dangers created by a combination of adventurism and opportunism. Having the best directions for following the road with a line of motor-cars will not help, if the head of the line has already succeeded in getting off the road into the mud. Then a whole system of measures ad hoc is necessary to bring the column back on the right road. We can assert that even the best driver staying at the wheel, would not be able to solve the problem. The collective effort of the Party and the class are necessary, with help from below, which presupposes the right and the possibility of collective, creative initiative.

At present, this measure seems most immediate and imperative: the strictest financial discipline. It is absolutely necessary to tighten as strong as possible the strings of the state's purse, along both the budget and the credit lines. There is no doubt that this measure will prove painful from the start, as it will inevitably stop half-way a whole list of undertakings and enterprises. But this measure is unavoidable. Financial discipline must become the first step of a general economic discipline.

What To Do?

The problems briefly outlined in the present article will constitute the object of an extensive work which we hope to bring out in a few weeks. Therefore our treatment of the subject here is in the nature of a synopsis. In the same way we briefly answer the question: what to do?

The industry is racing towards a crisis, first of all on account of the monstrously bureaucratic methods used in the construction of the Plan. A Five Year plan can be constructed with the necessary proportions and guarantees only on condition of a free discussion of its tempos and terms; only with the participation in these discussions by all interested industries and by the working class; with all its organizations and first of all of the Party itself; only with an evaluation of the whole experiment of the Soviet economy of the last period, including the monstrous faults of the leadership.

The most important element of the Plan is not a question of what it is that the peasants want and are able to consume immediately, but what it is that they can save and accumulate. The question of the tempo of industrialization is not a matter of bureaucratic imagination, but one of the life and culture of the masses.

Therefore the Plan for building socialism can not be issued as an a priori bureaucratic order. It must be worked out and corrected in the same way in which the construction of socialism itself can only be realized, i. e., through the broad Soviet democracy. The decision, for instance, of what place should be given to the chemical industry in the plan for the near future, can be established only through a open discussion between different economical groups and branches of industry interested in chemical products. The Soviet democracy is not an abstract political demand and still less a moral one. It has become an economic necessity.

Save the Party and the Proletarian Dictatorship

The first condition for the success of socialism is, for us to conserve, or what is more correct, to save the Party. Without this basic historical instrument the proletariat is powerless. In the meantime the Stalinist bureaucracy is killing the Party. To the wholesale collectivization in the country, it adds the wholesale admittance to the Party of whole plants and guilds. The vanguard is disappearing in the mass. The thought and the will of the Party is crushed underfoot. The bureaucracy has its hands completely free. The leadership is blind and uncontrollable. The Party will not be able to create a far-seeing leadership until it becomes the Party again. What must be done, then? Take from the usurpers' apparatus the power which has been usurped from the Party. Who can do that? The proletarian nucleus of the Party, relying on the working class.

The second conditions is to conserve, or, what is more true, to restore the proletarian dictatorship. This is possible only in case the proletariat shows from year to year an improvement of its economic and cultural level, and the growth of its importance in the state and country, and if simultaneously the scissors of agricultural and industrial prices draw together, offering the peasants real advantages from the October revolution.

If the road to these swollen and insurmountable undertakings is not immediately barred, if the tempo is not brought back to reality, the overinflation might easily enlarge them in the future to a perilous size, with consequences from which not only the false reputation of the ignorant leadership will suffer, the reputation which is founded on moral inflation, but also the values of immeasurably greater importance—the October revolution.

Restore the Comintern

Again and again we decidedly refused the task of building "in quick time" a national socialist society. Collectivization as well as industrialization we bind by an unbreakable tie with the problems of world revolution. The problems of our economy are decided in the last account in the international arena. It is necessary to restore the Comintern. It is necessary to go over the revolutionary strategy of the post-Leninist period and to condemn all three of its stages: Zinoviev's, Bucharin-Stalin's and Stalin-Molotov's stage. It is necessary to remove the present leadership, because it is precisely in the realm of international questions where the Stalinist faction reaches such limits of theoretical cynicism and practical licenses (laissez-faire) which are threatening the proletarian vanguard with numberless disasters. To refute the theory of national socialism and the practice of bureaucratic adventures, is the elementary premise for the renaissance of the Communist International.

CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION CHARTS LABOR DANGER ZONES

NEW YORK—(FP)—Black spots on the union organizers map as drawn by the American Civil Liberties Union include North Carolina textile towns, Pennsylvania coal and steel towns, Ohio mining towns and Southern California. North Carolina is worst of all, with seven killed, 24 wounded, seven kidnapped and seven condemned to prison in 1929, according to the Union's survey of civil liberties—or the lack of them—last year.

Strikers, Communists and Negroes suffered the most frequent violations of civil rights; Socialists and I. W. W.'s escaped prosecutions and injunctions, asserts the liberties report. Three Communists, sent to prison in Pennsylvania under the criminal syndicalism act, were the first political prisoners committed in the entire country since 1924.

Boston, Philadelphia and New York are listed as the cities in which police most frequently interfere with public meetings. Boston remains the hub of censorship, Pennsylvania leads in the number of attacks on free speech press and assemblage while New York City police broke up 43 of the 52 meetings interfered with in 1929.

HOSIERY SCABS KILL STRIKER, WOUND TWO

PHILADELPHIA—(FP)—Carl Mackley, 22, was killed and William Zimmerman and John Cooper wounded when a carload of Aberle hosiery mill strikebreakers fired a volley into a union auto which grazed theirs in traffic. The three men shot are union knitters, members of the Hosiery Workers Union. They carried no weapons.

Four scabs arrested with smoking automatics admitted firing into the union car and regret missing the fourth occupant who escaped unhurt. They are held without bail. Eight unionists were held as material witnesses and released under $1,000 bail each.

Although no scab in the Aberle mill has been shot or seriously injured in the hosiery workers' strike, they have threatened gunplay from the start. An Aberle official drew a gun on a striker 15 minutes after the tragedy.

Labor in Philadelphia lays the responsibility for the murder on Judge Jay Gordon who ruled in the court of common pleas two weeks ago that scabs may carry guns if they feel that their lives are endangered.

ELLA MAY LYNCHING O.K.'D

CHARLOTTE, N. C.—(FP)—North Carolina's unwritten law that union agitators go to the penitentiary while lynchers of unionists go home has been upheld once more in the freeing of five of the members of the Loray mill mob who were in the murder of Ella May Wiggins, the Bessemer City union woman shot to death Sept. 14 while on the way to a Nat'l. Textile Workers Union meeting in Gastonia.

Well-drilled witnesses marshalled by the Loray defense counsel testified monotonously to fake alibis; those at the scene of the murder where the union truck was surrounded by a score or more of autos filled with mobsters recited stories of "happening" to be passing by and stopping to see an auto accident.

The jury ignored evidence from a score of occupants of the union truck that they were surrounded by a mob which opened fire on the open highway. A shot from Horace Wheelus' gun found its way to Ella May's heart they testified, while other workers were fleeing across the open fields, followed by a rain of bullets.

The prosecution was crippled from the start by the unwillingness of Solicitor John C. Carpenter of Gaston county to prosecute his friends, the Loray mill boss-men. A corps of Loray attorneys conducted the defense.

North Carolina's record of "justice" in labor disputes shows seven organizers condemned to prison for terms of 5 to 20 year for defending the Loray mill strikers' tent colony from an unwarranted attack by drunken police, during which Police Chief Aderholt was killed. Mobs composed of Gastonia business men carried on a reign of terror, which resulted in a few indictments for kidnapping and flogging, but no convictions. On the other hand many strikers were framed on various counts and sentenced to jail.

The verdict in the Wiggins case practically sets the state's seal of approval on murder and other violence against union organizers.

Unite For the Unemployed!

Resist Attack of Bosses and Government

The activity of the Communists and Left wing in presenting the facts about the unemployment crisis in the United States and in making demands upon the bosses and the government for work or compensation for the unemployed workers, have drawn the fire and wrath of the capitalist class and various governmental agencies upon the Communists. Hoover and Wall Street, Tammany Hall and Whalen, Mathew Woll and Secretary of Labor Davis, et al, are endeavoring to screen the acute misery of millions of unemployed workers by raising the cry of "RED" around the burning issue of unemployment.

Close upon the heels of the unemployment demonstrations on March 6th, a vicious campaign against the radical groups, particularly focusing upon the Communists has begun. For the moment it takes its most violent and vicious form in New York City under the leadership of Commissioner of Police Whalen and his official thugs, promptly endorsed by Mayor James Walker and the business men of the city. This campaign against the Communists is taking numerous forms. Among these are:

The Proposed Frameups and Police Brutality

1. The arrest of Communist leaders and an endeavor to railroad them to prison for their activity among the unemployed. Every known obstacle was utilized to prevent the release on bail of the New York arrested. Only after repeated efforts and after exorbitant bail ($12,500 each) had been placed, were they released, to stand trial on charges of felonious assault and provoking an unlawful assembly at the March 6th Union Square demonstration in New York City. The outcome of the New York trials will to an extent determine the scale of repression and terror against the Communist movement and labor in general in other sections of the country. But already in many parts of the country efforts are made to railroad the Communists.

2. A wave of terror, brutality and provocation against the radicals and Communists and any rising militancy by the workers. Every form of weapon—club and blackjack, gun and horses, machine guns and tear gas—is either brought into play or held ready for use against the unemployed and those leading the struggle on their behalf. Almost every capitalist paper in the country reports the extremes to which the loud-mouthed Whalen and others like him went in their brutality against men, women and children gathered at the unemployment meetings and demonstrations.

The Labor Spy and Blacklist of Militants

3. The method of OPEN LABOR SPYING and BLACKLISTING on behalf of the employers by police and other governmental agents, thus plainly showing that government and law are instruments of the capitalist class. Police Commissioner Whalen of New York has declared that he has turned over the names of alleged Communists to employers that they may be dismissed and deprived of a livelihood because of the opinions they hold; and that he favors and will pursue such a blacklisting policy in the future. Whalen admits that he maintains stool-pigeons in radical organizations, particularly among the Communists, to frame evidence against the radicals; and that, further, he instructs his stool-pigeons to provoke violence and riots. He thereby admits responsibility for the trouble and brutality at the Union Square demonstration. What Whalen boasts about (until such time as the business men and higher-ups told him to be more discreet) is also done more quietly by police, Federal men, etc. throughout the country. The use of the Labor Spy

Heavy Unemployment Among Clothing Workers

NEW YORK—Unemployment has sharply affected the members in the clothing industry, according to reports of officials of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union. The busy season, which usually starts about November 15th in the bigger shops, has failed to absorb thousands of union members. It is estimated that 5 to 10% of the union membership is totally unemployed during the present season, which will end about May 1; that another 20% have been able to get in only two to six weeks' work; and another 30% have had only part time employment, three days out of five. Half of the New York membership has been totally or partially unemployed during the season.

The Aberle Mill Strike in Philly

by M. K. Whitten

The greatest labor demonstration in this city since the Battle of Broad Street in 1910 between the police and thousands of striking street car men, took place on March 9th, when a crowd estimated by the capitalist papers at 35,000, met at the open air funeral of Carl Mackley, 23 year old textile worker of Kensington. In McPherson Square, in the heart of that great working class district, this vast crowd gathered to pay its last respects to the murdered strike picket. His death occurred on March 6th when he was shot by a strikebreaker employed in the Aberle Mill, where a strike involving more than a thousand workers has been stubbornly fought for over a month. Despite the vicious injunction issued by Judge McDevitt, which prohibited more than 4 pickets, despite the utmost brutality of the police who arrested persons living in the neighborhood, merely for being on their own steps when ordered to go indoors, and who have even stopped school children from passing the mill, the strike has been fought with all the vigor and courage that the workers of Kensington are noted for.

Since the demonstration before the bier of Carl Mackley, the striking workers have maintained their militant fighting spirit. Within a week another shooting has taken place. A strikebreaker, Peter Marpone, fired three times into a crowd about his home to protest his scabbing. Fourteen persons were wounded.

Militancy of Strikers Outstanding

Fighting took place also at the Rogers Hosiery Mill in Germantown where nearly a hundred strikers, half of them girls, were arrested. The Rogers strike is called in sympathy with the Aberle strike. The Aberle Mill textile strike is led by the A. F. of L. The militancy of the strikers has had the A. F. of L. officials worried. The bureaucrats are cooperating with the politicians in every way to get the strike

The Springfield and Indianapolis Miners Conventions

The deep crisis in the Miners Union, for years the backbone of the organized labor movement in America, was dramatized during the past week by the simultaneous holding of two conventions. One convention met in Indianapolis under the chairmanship of John L. Lewis and put the stamp of approval on his reactionary policy. The other convention met in Springfield, Ill., with Alex Howat of Kansas presiding. The Springfield convention which represented a bloc between the Illinois organization, controlled by Fishwick, the Howat-Brophy Progressive group and the long-dormant Socialist elements, proclaimed the formal split with the Lewis organization on a national scale and announced itself as the "reorganized" U. M. W. of A.

About one thousand delegates attended the Lewis convention at Indianapolis. Of these the only solid bloc came from the anthracite, the great majority of the bituminous "delegates" being payroll agents representing defunct local unions in the disrupted districts. The bulk of the soft coal miners who retain organization in the U. M. W. of A. were represented at Springfield. 475 delegates attended this convention. Of these, Illinois, the largest remaining district organization of the U. M. W. of A. sent 313 delegates. The Kansas district, which broke from the Lewis organization in a body, sent 45, Ohio 28, Arkansas 19, Oklahoma 15, Iowa 13, Pennsylvania 7, Indiana 6, Missouri 5, Wyoming 3, and Kentucky 1.

The Springfield convention concluded its sessions Saturday, March 15, with the election of National Officers for the "reorganized" U. M. W. of A. Alex Howat, famous leader of the Kansas miners, was elected President by acclamation. Adolph Germer, former national secretary of the Socialist party and prior to that a National Executive Board member of the U. M. W. of A., was elected vice-president, defeating Powers Haggood. John H. Walker, president of the Illinois Federation of Labor, was elected secretary-treasurer. The Indianapolis convention adjourned its sessions over the week-end awaiting the address of President Green of the A. F. of L. scheduled for Monday. The appearance of Green at this convention indicates the decision of the A. F. of L. Executive Council to support the Lewis faction against the Springfield insurgent body.

Split in Miners Deepens

The holding of the rival conventions and the actions taken by them have the effect of deepening and confirming the split which has been long brewing in the miners' organization and reduce the prospects of an early re-unification to the minimum. The action of the Springfield convention in appealing to Green to call a "unity" convention under A. F. of L. auspices is construed as a diplomatic gesture to aid the fight of the new union for A. F. of L. support. The Lewis convention declared war on the Springfield gathering and demanded action of the A. F. of L. against its participants. The events of the week are the undoubted prelude to a long-drawn-out struggle between the two organizations for supremacy in which court action, appeals to the A. F. of L. and open battle in the coal fields will all be resorted to. A duplication of the historic United Garment Workers-Amalgamated Clothing Workers contest is to be anticipated in its many aspects.

The depth of the rank and file revolt against corruption and reactionary leadership in the United Mine Workers, despite the absence of the Communistic Left wing which is split off in the National Miners Union, was graphically revealed at Springfield. This revolt is directed against the Fishwick-Farrington machine as well as against Lewis. It rose like a tornado on the very first day of the Springfield convention, sweeping Fishwick out of the chair and installing Howat in his place and sending the credentials of Farrington back to the credentials committee after a savage attack on him from the floor led by Brophy and the Progressive bloc. It was further shown in the bitter and angry assault on the Illinois officials, whose policies and actions have been in no way different from those of Lewis, as "crooks and cheaters", which accompanied the demand for their removal; in the inability to hold the entire Illinois delegation in line for the seating of Farrington; in a number of progressive amendments to the constitution, and in various other proposals which got the support of a majority or of a strong minority of the convention.

Monarchist Spain Refuses Entry to Trotsky

Monarchist Spain has added itself to the list of capitalist states that refuses admission to L. D. Trotsky for necessary medical attention. So Trotsky, exiled by the bureaucrat Stalin, remains at Constantinople, where thousands of Russian White Guards infest the city and are a constant menace to the life of Trotsky.

The imperialist powers and the Stalinist bureaucracy alike reject Trotsky, the organizer and leader of the Red Army, the leader of the victorious Petrograd Soviet and Lenin's comrade and co-worker. The workers of the world will yet seal their condemnation of Stalin and his bureaucracy that persecute, imprison and even shoot the Opposition, the Bolshevik-Leninists, the standard bearers of the international proletarian revolution

Business Men Jeer COLD COMFORT FOR WORKERS IN Parade of Jobless

LOAN SOCIETY REPORT

SAN FRANCISCO—(FP)—About 250 jobless workers, augmented at the City Hall by a crowd of several thousand, have marched again to demand "work or wages" from the city authorities of San Francisco. Once more they were fobbed off by vague promises of municipal work when $5,000,000 city bonds are sold.

It was a pitiful procession, nearly all men in overalls and worn working clothes, one man on crutches, a handful of women, one with a baby in her arms. As they trudged down Market St., preceded and followed by a row of mounted police, well dressed people on the sidewalk jeered and booed at them.

The workless, headed by Harold Harvey, demanded unemployment insurance, emergency relief, a 7-hour day and 5-day week, no overtime so that jobless men could have a chance, no eviction for non-payment of rent, abolition of the vagrancy law. The supervisors met them on the city hall steps, and the mayor made another ingratiating speech which did not sit well with the workers. "We didn't expect anything when we came here," said Harvey, "and we are not disappointed. When we come again it will be to take what rightfully belongs to us. We don't want sympathy; we want relief."

Saidichi Kenmotsu, arrested Dec. 14, has been ordered deported to Japan as a Communist. He is out on $3,000 bond and will appeal to the federal court. Four other radicals are held in San Francisco for deportation, three Russians and a Greek.

As an indication of the unemployment situation in San Francisco, a recent statement made in a private conversation by an official of the Industrial Assn. is significant. The association, father of the "American plan" in central California, conducts an employment agency for skilled workers, particularly in the building trades—non-union men, but still workers. Normally about 500 apply every month, and are placed anywhere in the west where jobs are open. Last month 1,500 applied, and just 18 men were given jobs.

DESTITUTION FALL OVER NORTHEAST PHILADELPHIA

PHILADELPHIA—Destitution is wide spread in northeast Philadelphia, seat of the city's textile industry. More than 2,500 are on strike against wage reductions in hosiery and carpet mills. Welfare associations are unable to cope with demands for relief and appeals are being made for private charity, but the big dailies refuse to notice the situation.

CHESTER, Pa.—Two workers, Ray Peltz and Charles Holmes, have been charged with sedition as the result of speeches they made to the unemployed before the Ford plant gates in Chester. George Carter, a Gastonia defendant, was given 10 days in jail for speaking to the Ford job-hunters.

Cold comfort is held out to the nation's millions of underpaid and unemployed workers by the yearly report just issued of the Provident Loan Society. After announcing 498,537 loans made last year, the amount of which, $44,032,832, "was greater than in any previous year," the report predicts "another year of increased activity and usefulness". Apparently the society, which makes its money out of the want of the workers, does not look forward to any improvement in employment or wage rates.

Incidentally the report throws light on the enormous profits made in the money-lending game, even when on a "respectable" and "legitimate" basis. Nicknamed the "Philanthropic Pawnshop", the Provident Loan Society was organized in 1894 to lend money to needy persons at no "greater rate than 1% per month or fraction thereof", or 12% a year. The supposed legal rate of interest in New York state is 6% annually, but this does not apply to pawnbrokers.

Big Profits for Loan Sharks

The 12% per year which the society charges the unfortunates who come to it for loans resulted last year in net "earnings" of nearly $2,275,000. Of this amount, nearly $1,000,000 went to pay 6% interest to the holders of nearly $20,000,000 worth of gilt-edged "certificates of contribution", which are practically bonds on the misery of the borrowers. "It is also interesting to note," states the society, "that over $6,000,000 of the outstanding certificates of contribution are held by 120 educational, religious, charitable and philanthropic institutions".

In its 35 years of business the "Philanthropic Pawnshop" has grown from one rent-free room on the ground floor of the United Charities Building, to 15 offices, 13 of them in buildings owned by itself. From 20,804 loans in its first full year of operation, it has increased to 498,537 in 1929. In the whole 35 years it has made 11,253,932 loans, totaling $599,271,213. "Earnings" on these loans amounted to $26,988,036. In addition to paying regular interest to certificate holders, a handsome surplus of $10,626,071 has been accumulated, of which nearly $2,000,000 is invested in real estate.

Reveals Workers Extreme Poverty

As in any pawnshop, would-be borrowers are compelled to leave "pledges" in the form of clothing, furniture, watches, or other goods that can be sold if the loan is not repaid. Increasing hard times are shown in the rise in number of cases where the pledges are sold at auction, from less than 1% in 1927 to slightly over 1% in 1928 and 1929. The same trend is shown by the drop in surplus realized for borrowers in these sales from $85,000 three years ago to only $70,000 last year, while losses from sales falling on the society went up from $20,000 to $35,000 in the same time.

One appalling feature of the society's report is the smallness of the sums, lack of which drives workers into the arms of the pawnshop fraternity. Of the nearly 500,000 loans made last year, almost 18,000 were for $1 to $4; 38,000 were for $5 to $9; 46,000 were for $10 to $14; about 35,000 were for $15 to $19; and nearly as many were for $20 to $24. Fifty-three per cent of all loans were for $49 and under.

A final touch of grim humor is added to the society's report by the announcement that among its "ex-officio members" are Mayor Walker and Police Commissioner Whalen of New York, who sent police armed with tear-gas and machine guns to break up demonstrations of the city's unemployed.

PITTSBURG PAPERS INCOMPLETE ON WESTINGHOUSE RECORDS

PITTSBURG—Westinghouse broke all records in sales billed, orders booked and earnings in 1929, was the glad news in the financial columns of the Pittsburgh papers. Profits were $27,062,611, equivalent to a dividend of $10.15 a share.

Other Westinghouse records broken during the year, which the Pittsburgh press did not see fit to print, include: Record uncertainty of employment; record wage cuts, and record speed-up.

N. Y. STATE JOB FIGURES CONTINUE DECLINE

NEW YORK—Despite every effort of Pres. Hoover and Sec. Davis to pump life into the Hoover prosperity corpse, the figures continue to give them the lie. Employment is still on the downgrade in New York state, according to the state labor department. The index number of employment in Empire State factories—a reliable barometer of industrial activity—slumped 5%, contrary to the usual seasonal gain of 1% between January and February. In only two other years since 1914 have factories cut forces in this period—in 1919 and 1920.

The decline since November has pulled employment down 9% from the fall peak, announces Comm. Frances Perkins so that February was lower than any other February since 1914. The index of employment now stands at 92.1 compared with 100 for 1925-27.

SAYS MUSIC WASTED ON FUTURE WAGE SLAVES

MONESSEN, Pa.—(FP)—This suburb of Pittsburgh and fief of the steel trust through its subsidiary, the American Steel Wire Co. will no longer waste its taxes on providing an acquaintance with art and music for children designed to be mere wage slaves.

Presumably under pressure of the American Steel Wire, the school board has installed an efficiency expert who has promptly fired 26 teachers as an economy measure and eliminated the art and music training meagerly granted in the public school system. These subjects have no "practical" value, he explained.

In protest the school superintendent has resigned. This school district has a rule that no teacher is allowed pay during sickness unless she reports to a physician.

WORKERS HELP JOBLESS

LOS ANGELES—Two hundred jobless union printers were given work when members of Typographical Local 174 voted to give up one day's work every two weeks. The 200 will get in four days each week, according to Pres. John Dalton.

ALBANY, N. Y.—A new threat to the already crippled 48-hour law for women is offered by the Miller Bill providing for the 5-day, 10-hour shift. Under various exemptions, women can now be worked 49 1-2 hours a week in New York state on the 9-hour basis.

RAIL CLERKS ASK SIX HOUR DAY IN NEW PACT

CHICAGO—Workers on the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, represented by the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, are demanding a 6-hour day in the new agreement to follow the one that expired March 14. They also demand eight hours pay for six hours work and in addition want an increase of 8 cents an hour on the 8-hour basis. The largest classification of workers now get $7 for eight hours, according to system chairman J. J. Hallihan of the Brotherhood.

SEATTLE—One unemployed demonstrator was given 60 days in jail, 32 were fined and three released when cases arising from the March demonstration were heard in court.

by the employers is well known; now it is openly acknowledged and permitted that this be done "legally".

The Drive Against the Foreign Born

4. The revival by the reactionaries of the campaign to compel the registration of aliens and for the deportations of aliens who are not satisfactory to the Bourbons of Wall St. Bills have been again introduced into the United States Congress for the registration of aliens. In effect it will establish a vast espionage system over the millions of foreign born workers; by means of persecuting them, driving them out of their jobs if need be, jailing and deporting them. The bills are aimed at the alien radicals, and typically enough, are supported by that arch labor faker, now an open tool of Wall St., namely, Secretary of Labor Davis. The foreign-born workers, who are in the basic industries are the ones most sharply affected by the mass unemployment. These alien registration bills have in mind to stifle their protest against capitalist exploitation and oppression, and to take whatever measures are needed to do so, including deportation.

Workers and Civil Liberties

5. A drive to deprive aliens and American radicals of so-called civil and constitutional rights. The campaign is going on all the time, but now the 100 per centers, the Pay-Triots of every description are coming out of their holes and beginning to bark for greater suppression of radical labor and for withdrawal of so-called liberties and rights from them. Where successful, it will be labeled "Americanization work" (that is, good results in breaking up union organizations, lowering wages, increasing hours of labor, speed-up, etc.); where unsuccessful in "Americanization", then there will be the policy of revocation of citizenship of alien radicals, refusal to grant citizenship, to permit radical gatherings, indoor and outdoor meetings, attempts to persecute Red students and school-children, etc. In New York a college youth has been suspended from City College by the Dean for so-called "violation of a city ordinance". He had the audacity to distribute handbills for the New York demonstration of the unemployed! Others in public schools are to be dealt with by the educational authorities who will work hand in hand with the employers and the police.

Revival of Criminal Syndicalism Laws

6. The attempted revival of Criminal Syndicalism laws in an effort to drive the Communists and other labor organizations into illegality. The reaction of 1919-20, the period of the vicious Attorney-General Palmer, is raising its head. Nothing serious of course is done with the gunmen, racketeers and murderers who infest society, products of the capitalist system. Indeed, these gangsters and racketeers are regularly brought into service by the officially recognized thugs—the police—against workers on strike, against unions, against the radical workers, etc. The Mathew Wolls and William Greens, the labor agents of Wall Street, chime in to endorse any movements aiming to check the progress of the workers and to smash the "Reds".

The Bosses Organize

7. The organization of the capitalist groups themselves to give organized direction and policy to all campaigns against labor, organized and unorganized. The New York Chamber of Commerce has formed a special committee to launch a "militant fight" against the Communist movement. They hope thus to hide or obscure the burning problem of unemployment. New York wealth and plutocracy have given the lead and expect the other Chambers of Commerce and business groups to take the cue. It has a Committee on Deportation; Committee on Communism in Business and Industry; Committee on Publicity, etc. Every agency, governmental, business, religious, etc. is to be enlisted to raise the "Red Scare" so that the misery of the workers under capitalism and particularly severe because of mass unemployment, shall be passed by.

Mass Unemployment Remains

What needs to be done to stem the rising tide of reaction and to bring again to the forefront the problems that affect sharply the daily lives of the working men and women of this country? It is largely up to the Communists and Left wing, and in particular the official Communist party, to answer this question and to make possible effective work, agitation and organization among the masses. The tactics to pursue have been proposed before by The Militant. The basic problem and issues remain as before.

1. Mass unemployment, estimated at over 6,000,000 at the present time, remains the outstanding phenomenon and cancer of American capitalism. There has been much bally-hoo otherwise, but mass unemployment remains and mounts higher. Cleverness, advertising and now a "Red Scare" have not gone over; Hoover and capitalism are seeking other means to cover up the acute situation. The figures of the Hoover administration, of the U. S. Labor Dept. on unemployment and an alleged rise in industry and business have been challenged from various sources, and have been shown up as valueless, unreliable and untrustworthy.

In New York State, where figures by the State Dept. of Labor have been issued monthly, F. Perkins, State Industrial Commissioner, reports a further increase in unemployment and at the same time challenges the accuracy of the Hoover figures. Reports from other regions are similar, varying in totality of numbers, but revealing essentially the same situation throughout the United States. The need to defend the interests of the unemployed, to unite the organized and unorganized, to get the unions to enter the fight on behalf of the unemployed, to bring together the employed and unemployed, white and colored workers, in common action for demands upon the employers and the government for work or compensation, less hours of labor and speed-up is yet paramount. The Communists remain the main instruments that can give such a movement vitality, purpose and direction, and develop the consciousness of the worker regarding his social position in capitalist society. The basic tasks of the Communists and class-conscious workers remain to explain the causes of unemployment; the failure and inability of capitalism to solve the problem and the Communist solution thereof.

Create United Front Defense Movement

2. Organize a broad UNITED FRONT DEFENSE MOVEMENT to defend the leaders and workers arrested in the unemployment demonstrations and meetings, and in order to make an effective campaign to smash the anti-Communist and anti-labor offensive of the Bosses, the A. F. of L. labor fakers, Woll, Green & Co., and the Government. A sectarian defense movement, limited largely to the Communist party and the I. L. D. with its present narrow line, will defeat its own purpose. Large sections of the labor and liberal movement can be mobilized in such a campaign, if only the official Communist party will permit and not cut such a movement to pieces, as it did, for instance, in the Gastonia textile case. Already liberal elements—professors, scientists, etc.—have protested the Black List and red-baiting campaign of Whalen, et al. The Socialist party has been compelled to declare against the forms of the drive against the Communist movement. The Socialists find it necessary to present a liberal front against reaction, while they at the same time wish to stave off oppressive measures against themselves. Wide circles of labor can be brought into action for a broad UNITED FRONT DEFENSE MOVEMENT, can be made to see that a blow against the Communists by the capitalist reactionaries is a blow against the whole labor movement and the working class. We demand that the Communist party shall discontinue its sectarian policy and make possible the creation of such a movement.

United Front for the Unemployed

3. The unemployed movement under the direction of the Communist must likewise be given room to breathe, must be developed into a United Front movement. In such a movement, the Communists can easily hold their own and make gains among the workers at the expense of the reformists and labor elements that come into it, provided the Communists use intelligent tactics.

In New York, the Socialists and A. F. of L. unions have organized an Emergency Conference for the Unemployed. We have recommended that the Communists propose a United Front movement to them. It is conceivable that the social-reformist movement will attract the unemployed, albeit they have only reluctantly and under pressure begun such a movement. The Communists will have to find ways and means to penetrate the masses wherever they are. The United Front remains yet in this period the best tactic to achieve contact with the masses and to influence their thought and direction. For the Communist party to continue its ostrich policy, to reject the tactic of the United Front, will result in a number of defeats for itself and the Communist movement in the future; moreover, it will directly affect the adequate defense of the arrested Communists, the attempted frame-ups and the progress of the unemployment movement.

In any case, if the unemployment movement is not to be diverted into channels of reformist illusions, or even directly into capitalist grooves; if there is to be a genuine defense movement; if there is to be an energetic campaign against the efforts of the employers and government to smash the Communist movement, to drive it into illegality, the rank and file of the Communist party must make possible the unity of the Communists in these common needs, and demand at the same time a broad united front movement on the issue of unemployment. —M. A.

Salvation Army Bread Line Long

NEW YORK—(FP)—Unemployment is from 30 to 35% greater now in New York than it was a year ago, according to a survey conducted by the Salvation Army. Every department maintained by the army for the relief of jobless men is taxed to capacity, its Bowery Hotel has a daily breadline of 1,800 men and all its employment bureaus are swamped with appeals for work.

"Our capacity of 611 beds in the Bowery hotel," said Capt. Paul Brown, "has long been overtaxed and to accommodate homeless men we permit them to sleep on the floor. About 400 of them crowd each night into one large room where they 'flop' on the floor with their clothes on and so close together they can scarcely turn over. Hundreds of others who can find no shelter wander the streets all night."

"From 1,800 to 2,000 men daily stand in the noon breadline. Each man is given a ticket for a free meal, consisting of bread and soup or stew. Each meal costs from 5 to 10 cents."

Fight Registration of the Foreign-Born

Attempts are again being made by reactionary forces to compel the registration of all non-citizen foreign-born living in the United States. Bills are again before Congress, supported by the Department of Labor, which, if their passage is not prevented by the united efforts of all labor, will establish a vast espionage system primarily aimed to harass and persecute all radical workers and especially the Communists. Advocates of compulsory alien registration who appeared on March 12 before the Senate Immigration Committee were the red-baiter, Capt. Trevor, spokesman for the New York Chamber of Commerce, and Assistant Secretary of Labor Husband, speaking for Secretary of Labor Davis.

The registration of the alien worker, which would be a forerunner for registration of all people in the United States, makes it easy for the employers to persecute and oppress the foreign-born worker particularly. The threat of discrimination, arrest and deportation would always be held as a whip by the employer over the alien worker who fought for betterment of his conditions, wage increases, decrease of hours, for unionization, etc. The employing class and government forces endeavor to sow further division between the native or citizen-workers and the aliens whose interests as exploited workingmen and women are identical and whose actual enemies are the bosses and the government that persecute them on any and every opportunity.

Capitalists Aim to Establish Spy System

Government snoopers, private detective agencies, employers' dicks would be used to intimidate, spy upon and blackmail the alien worker. The Pay-Triots would be given an additional weapon in their hands to fight any progress of labor and would intensify their ranting and violent activities particularly against the revolutionary minded workers. There would develop a vast espionage system over the entire country whose primary task would be the persecution of radically minded workers.

Among the most vicious of the Bills before Congress is the Aswell Bill, H. R. 9101, introduced by Congressman Aswell of Louisiana. It is approved by the Department of Labor, and among its proposals are:

1. Every alien 21 years of age and over must register annually. Failure to register is a crime. Failure to register for 2 years subjects an alien to deportation. The fees are $2.00 for the first year and $1.00 for each year thereafter.

2. The certificate must bear the alien's photograph and signature. It must be shown any time on demand to any public officer. All changes in name or physical appearance, together with the record of all arrests and convictions, must be reported to the Commissioner of Naturalization, who is charged with enforcing the law. Violations of the law are made serious crimes.

The movement of the capitalists to put over such measures against labor has been defeated in the past through the strenuous efforts of liberal and labor forces. The reactionaries look to every opportunity to revive and put over registration laws, and all labor must be continually on guard to prevent such attempts. Protests, meetings, resolutions, etc. at union meetings and gatherings, fraternal organizations, to Congress, etc. are among the methods of publicity to be used to protest against any kind of registration bills.

Dear Comrades!

I have just become acquainted with the contents of the document, "Platform of the Left" which, though issued in 1926, has just come into my hands. I have also read your letter addressed to me in No. 20 of Prometeo, as well as several leading articles in this paper, this having given me the opportunity, after a very long interruption, to refresh my meager knowledge of the Italian language. This document, as well as the articles and speeches of comrade Bordiga, aside from my personal acquaintance with him, permit me, to a certain extent, to pass judgement upon your basic idea as well as on the degree of your solidarity with us. Although, in order to reply to this last question, not only are the principle theses of importance, but your political orientation towards the events of the day as well. (The Sino-Russian conflict has brought this home clearly to us once again.) Yet I believe that our solidarity at least, goes quite far. If I do not express myself categorically at the present time, it is solely because I wish to permit time and the course of events to substantiate our ideological closeness and our mutual understanding. I hope that they will be completely and lastingly confirmed.

"The Platform of the Left" (1926) made a great impression on me. I believe that it is one of the best documents of the International Opposition, and which, in many points, retains its importance yet.

Particularly important, especially for France, is that the platform lays the most stress, in respect to the revolutionary politics of the proletariat, on the question of the nature of the party and the basic principles of its strategy and tactics. During the past few years we have seen how, in France, the Opposition has served, for a number of well-known revolutionaries, merely as a stage in the evolution from Marxism to Syndicalism, to Trade Unionism, or simply to scepticism. Almost all of them stumbled on the question of the party.

The Nature of the Party

You are evidently familiar with the brochure of Loriot wherein he demonstrates his complete lack of understanding of the nature of the Party and its historic function in relation to the class and falls into the theory of passive trade unionism, which has nothing in common with the ideas of the proletarian revolution. Unfortunately, this brochure, which represents a distinctly backward step in the working class movement is today still being propagated by the Revolutions Proletarienne group.

The decline in the ideological level of the revolutionary movement during the past five or six years has left its mark on the Monatte group. This group, which, between 1917 and 1923, approached close to Marxism and Bolshevism, has since taken a series of backward steps towards syndicalism. All this is no longer the aggressive syndicalism of the beginning of this century which constituted a step forward in the French working class movement. No, this is a relatively waiting syndicalism, negatively passive, which almost always degenerates into pure trade unionism. And this is not surprising. Whatever progressivism was present in pre-war syndicalism has now been absorbed into Communism. Monatte's chief shortcoming is his false attitude towards the Party, and connected with that, his fetishism of the "trade union organization", which he takes as an end in itself, independent of its directing concepts. Nevertheless, if the two French "General Trade Unions" would unite today, and even if tomorrow they would draw into their ranks the entire French working class, that would not for one instant do away with the question of the directing ideas of the syndicalist struggles, its methods, the linking up of the immediate tasks with those of a general character, i. e., the question of the Party.

(To the Adherents of Comrade Bordiga)

The Syndicalist League, led by Monatte is in itself an embryo party; it recruits its members, not on a trade union basis, but on an ideological basis, on the basis of a particular platform, and seeks to influence the trade unions from without or, when possible, to subordinate them to its ideological influence. These are the indices of a party. But the Syndicalist League is a party without a finished constitution, having no definite form, which is clear in neither theory nor program, which has not become conscious of itself, which hides its true nature, and so deprives itself of all possibility for development.

Souvarine, in the course of the struggle against the bureaucracy and disloyalty of the apparatus of the C. I., has likewise come to a denial of the political action of the Party itself, though by a different route. While proclaiming the death of the International and its French section, he at the same time considers the existence of the Opposition to be useless since, according to him, the political conditions are unsuitable. In other words, he denies the necessity for the existence of the Party—which always, and under all circumstances, represents the revolutionary interests of the proletariat.

These are the reasons why I attach such importance to our solidarity on the questions of the Party, its historic role, its unceasing activity, its duty to struggle in order to insure its influence in all phases of the working class movement. On this question a Bolshevik, i. e., a revolutionary Marxist trained in the school of Lenin, can make no concessions.

Theoretical Perversions of Stalinism

On several points, the Platform, of 1926 gives some excellent formulations which still hold true today. It states with absolute clearness that the so-called "autonomous peasant parties inevitably fall under the influence of the counter-revolution" (p. 36). One can fearlessly say, that in the present epoch, there have been and can be no exceptions to this rule. Where the peasantry does not follow the proletariat, they follow the bourgeoisie against the proletariat. Despite the experiences of Russia and China, Radek, Smilga and Preobrazhensky have not yet realized that it is on just this point that they tripped up. Your platform reproaches Radek for "open concessions to the German nationalists". To that must be added the indefensible concessions to the Chinese nationalists, the idealization of Sun-Yat-Senism, and the justification of the subordination of the Communist party to a bourgeois party. Your platform correctly stresses, in connection with the struggle of colonial peoples, the necessity for the absolute independence of the Communist party. Failure to keep sight of this essential rule leads to the most disastrous consequences as was demonstrated in the criminal subordination of the Chinese Communist party to the Kuomintang.

The disastrous tactics of the Anglo-Russian Committee, which, it goes without saying, has received the complete support of the present leadership of the Italian Communist party, resulted from the desire to rapidly pass from the insignificant Communist party into the large trade unions. Zinoviev openly expressed this idea at the Fifth Congress of the International. Stalin, Bucharin, Tomsky have sustained these same illusions. With what results? The British reformists were strengthened, and the British Communist party was extremely weakened. That is what results from playing with the concept of the Party. Such a game does not remain forever unpunished.

Within the Soviet Republic we note another form of weakening and destruction of the Communist party: in order to divest it of its proper individuality and independence, it is artificially diluted into the large spiritless mass who are terrorized by the governmental apparatus. This explains why the Opposition which has gathered and educated new revolutionary cadres numbered only in the thousands is in actuality the Bolshevik party, while the Stalin faction which carries on formally in the name of a Party of 1,500,000 members, and of a Communist youth of 2,000,000 strong, in reality undermines and destroys the Party.

The Class Character of the U. S. S. R.

I note with satisfaction, on the basis of your letter published in Prometeo that you are in complete accord with the Opposition on the question of the definition of the social nature of the Soviet State. On this question, the ultra-Leftists (see L'Ouvrier Communiste, No. 1) reveal with absolute clearness their complete break with the fundamentals of Marxism.

The question of the class character of a social regime rests on the question of its political structure which in turn falls back on the degree of bureaucracy and administration. As far as they are concerned, the question of the ownership of the means of production does not exist. In democratic America, as well as in Fascist Italy, those who are accused of preparing the expropriation of the factories, the shops and mines of the capitalists—are shot or fastened to the electric chair. In the Soviet Republic even today—under the Stalinist bureaucracy—the engineers who attempt to prepare the restitution of the shops, the factories and the mines to their former owners are shot. How can one fail to distinguish this fundamental difference which actually defines the class character of the social regime? Nevertheless, I shall not expound too lengthily upon this question, to which I devoted my recent brochure (The Defense of the U. S. S. R. and the Opposition) (Published serially in the Militant, Vol. II, No. 21, Vol. III, No. 4, Incl.—Eds.) directed against certain French and German ultra-Leftists who, it is true, do not go as far as your Italian sectarians, but who, for just this reason, can be more dangerous.

The Analogy of Thermidor

On the question of Thermidor, you make certain reservations as regards the correctness of the analogy between the Russian Revolution and the French Revolution. I believe that this observation rests on a misunderstanding. In order to judge of the correctness of historic analogy, we must clearly determine its content and limits. Not to have recourse to analogies with revolutions of the past, would be to completely abandon the historical experience of mankind. The experiences of today are always different from those of yesterday. Nevertheless, one cannot learn from yesterday's experiences except through analogies.

The remarkable brochure of Engels on the Peasant War is based completely upon an analogy between the Reformation of the Sixteenth century and the Revolution of 1848. In order to temper the concept of the dictatorship of the proletariat, Marx heated his iron in the fire of 1793. In 1903 Lenin defined the Social-democratic revolutionary as a Jacobin loosely tied with the mass movements. At that time I objected to him in an academic manner that Jacobinism and scientific socialism rest on different classes and make use of different methods. Considered in itself this is evidently correct. But Lenin did not identify the plebeians of Paris with the modern proletariat and Rousseau's theory with that of Marx.

He laid down as conclusive only the general features of the two revolutions: the most oppressed masses who had nothing to lose but their chains; the most revolutionary organizations which supported themselves on the masses and which, in the struggle against the forces of the former society, set up a revolutionary dictatorship. Was this analogy correct? Completely. Historically, it has proven very fruitful. Within the same limits, the analogy with Thermidor is fruitful and justifiable. What was the distinctive feature of the French Thermidor? It was the first stage of the victorious counter-revolution. After the Thermidor, the Jacobins could no longer have (if they could have in a general manner) regained power except by means of their own uprising. Thus, the stage of Thermidor has, in a certain sense, a distinctive character. But the counter-revolution was not yet completed that is, the real masters of the situation were not yet in power; for that the next stage was necessary.

What is Thermidor?

Finally, the complete victory of the counter-revolution, bringing with it the restoration of the monarchy, the indemnification of feudal landlords, etc., was assured by the foreign intervention and the victory over Napoleon. In Hungary, after a short period of Soviet power, the counter-revolution was established completely after a single armed blow. Are we to expect a similar danger in the U. S. S. R.? Certainly not. But anyone can recognize open counter-revolution; it does not require any commentaries.

When we speak of Thermidor, we have in mind an underhand counter-revolution, clandestinely prepared, and which is accomplished in several stages. The first stage, which we call conditionally Thermidor, would signify the transfer of power to the hands of new "soviet" rulers—disguised factions within the leading party, as was the case with the Jacobins. The reign of these rulers, especially if they be weak, could not long prevail. Either, under favorable international conditions the revolution would return to the dictatorship of the proletariat, which would inevitably necessitate the use of revolutionary force; or, the victory of the big bourgeoisie, of finance capital, or even of monarchy would be achieved, the latter necessitating a supplementary revolution, or perhaps even two.

This is the substance of the analogy with Thermidor. Naturally, if we go beyond the permissible limitations of the analogy, if we orientate ourselves purely on the mechanical externals of events, on dramatic episodes, we can easily become lost and mislead others. But if we consider the class relationships, the analogy is no less profitable than, for example, the analogy which Engels drew between the Reformation and the Revolution of 1848.

The Stalinist Leadership of Italy

I have read recently the first issue of the publication which I have already mentioned—the Communist Worker (L'Ouvrier Communiste), obviously published by a group of Italian ultra-Leftists who have separated from your organization. Without other indications, this issue by itself would be sufficient proof that we are in a period of decadence and ideological confusion—the result that always follows major revolutionary defeats. The group publishing this paper seems to have undertaken to unite in one whole all the faults of out-of-date syndicalism, adventurism, left phrases, sectarianism and theoretical confusionism, while stamping it all with the mark of student carelessness and trouble-breeding quarrels. Two columns from this publication suffice to make it clear why this group broke with your organization, a Marxist organization; although it is rather amusing to see how they exert themselves to cover themselves with Marx and Engels.

As far as the official leadership of the Italian party is concerned, I had no opportunity to observe them except at the E. C. C. I. in the person of Ercoli. Of a relatively yielding temper and with a well-oiled tongue, Ercoli is fitted, above all others, to prepare an attorney's speech made to order on any subject, and is of

Letters from the Soviet Union

The Five Year Plan And the Kulaks

At double pace the voids caused by the unfitness of the 5 year plan are being filled in haphazard and uncertainly. Suddenly half a million rubles are withdrawn from the food cooperatives; now, a figure of such magnitude has never been so easily conjured with in any plan. Wholesale prices are being increased. (You recall this was "a Trotskyist fraud", according to the Stalinist theory). What is more, this increase is retroactive. For all selling organizations, a revision of accounts is being made. Speed was ordered for those two measures and at the same time the press was kept quiet. How much ink was poured out against the rise in wholesale prices when it had been proposed by the Opposition not as a panic measure but in the name of economic foresight. All the symptoms of instability are clearly present...

Here is an extract of the leading article of a country newspaper of a hundred percent collectivized district: "The Kulaks and the middle peasants fraudulently kill their cattle..."

"The Kulak spirit has penetrated all departments of the local government (all this in hundred percent collectivized districts). They kill the horses of their own volition, cattle are chased into the forests and the valleys where they die of cold. In the forest of ... there are two hundred abandoned horses". And yet Pravda, full of authority, shows that if the middle peasant strangles his cattle, it is because he is firmly decided to enter the cooperative and this is why, before leaving, he liquidates his cattle! The base for the new adventurist bond of centrism is a break with the middle peasantry. Instead of squarely facing this difficulty, the Centrists think that a theory, scholastically elaborated and administratively applied, that is, collectivization, can strike from the order of the day the fundamental question of irregular relations of the classes in the country. With this new formula they expect to exorcise the truth.

As I already said, the class relations in the country are disturbed. I believe that the offensive of classes hostile to the dictatorship of the proletariat is inevitable, under the guise of civil war supported by external intervention. Actually great confusion reigns in the circles of the Party base. This brings in a new stage in our work. It is necessary to leave home for free air. Some prefer to remain in waiting—because it is more dignified and more peaceful. We must break with them because passivity becomes a chronic disease. It is a serious danger. To enter the new activity a very precise and pointed appeal must be written. The country is being led towards catastrophe with bandaged eyes. The working class must take the fate of the U. S. S. R. in its own hands. The appeal must be made not only to Russia but to the international proletariat. The dictatorship is in danger. It can be saved only by bringing it to the Leninist path. Now, many signs show that interest in Leninism and the proposals of the Opposition are rapidly growing. Our appeal can and must play an enormous role.

As in one of Andersen's fairy tales (The Emperor's New Clothes), at the most solemn moment of the imperial procession our appeal must shout: "But Centrism is completely naked!" In Stalin's speeches it is stated that a completely new course is being instituted, that is, the liquidation of the NEP. That which interests me, above all, is to know whether this course is the product of an unavoidable necessity, of a blind alley which does not permit of maneuvering with respect to the peasant class, or whether it is a product of the theory of socialism in one country.

If one holds to the official ideas, to the phraseology of the leaders, it appears to originate from a "voluntary desire". Thus it is an adventure which allows of the catastrophes being foreseen. But many signs indicate that it is the result of the precedent "no snail". (Allusion to "We shall construct socialism, even at a snail's pace" of Bucharin—N. D. L. R.) The verification of the theory of socialism in one country, whose hour is close, will show its complete failure.

Stalin Endangers the Proletarian Dictatorship

January 25

I am sending you some bits of news. First, the oldest: at the October celebrations about a thousand of our comrades were "withdrawn from circulation" throughout the Union. This is very gladdening, isn't it? This shows the good feeling that still prevails. You certainly know that a short while ago the two musketeers (Zinoviev and Kamenev) issued a declaration whereby they once again (how many times already?) rejoined the Party. This is what took place. When Zinoviev had to present his statement at the purging of his nucleus, a great number of members showed up; he was given 20 minutes. He started out in this manner. "To narrate my autobiography would be to give the entire history of the Party." This introduction was greeted with applause. After 20 minutes he had not yet reached the Third Party Congress. His time for speaking was extended. He harangued for three hours. His speech was often interrupted by applause. At the end of his speech, he made it clear, with carefully chosen phrases, that the Opposition, although it had made some mistakes, had in general been correct. "Thus," he concluded, "we were fighting not against the Party but against the Right wing." The next day he was called before the powers above who washed his head, black soap being necessary. Then he entered his declaration. The secretary of his nucleus was designated as conciliator.

With Kamenev, matters were entirely different. During the purging, he was given six minutes to state his position and not a second longer. But a private paper was stolen from his house in some unknown manner (he has certainly no luck with private papers). In this paper, among other things appeared this phrase: "L. D. (Trotsky) was right in saying 'In the Party nothing can really be achieved.'" The matter of this paper was brought up in the Political Bureau. They even wished to expel Kamenev. But he had opportunely written his statement, and the tempest subsided. This is how the "sages" of the Party conduct themselves. Their life is droll indeed. It is enough to drive one to drink.

Morale of Opposition Excellent

As for ourselves, our morale is excellent. We are following the advice of old Spinoza which you suggested to us: "Not to weep; not to laugh; but to understand." As for weeping, we don't weep. As for laughing, at times we do laugh. One cannot help laughing, however much it may be mixed with bitterness, when one reads in Pravda that the middle peasant is killing his cattle and liquidating his possessions because he firmly intends to join the Collective. He sacrifices his cattle because of enthusiasm. Seized with the sacred fervor of "socialist construction" and the "general line" he sells everything in order to prepare himself for complete collectivization. One cannot help laughing at the "Marxist explanation" given to these disturbing phenomena. As for what concerns the "to understand" of Spinoza, we understand the situation thus:

The plan to appeal to the Party and to the working class must be realized in the quickest possible time. This appeal must be in as brief form as possible in order that it may affect the entire working class, the entire Party. We must tell the "Chief" (the Central Committee) not only the objective causes but also those who are directly responsible, denouncing them by name.

In this appeal light must be thrown upon the following: the Party regime, the situation of the working class, the industrialization, the complete collectivization, the situation in the country, the command to wipe out the Kulak and the Nepman as a class at a time when, thanks to the Centrist policies, the middle and poor peasants are lined up against us and when, still thanks to these same policies, the ties with the working class are beginning to weaken. We must shout at the top of our voices that Centrism is on the road to cutting down the branch on which rests the entire Soviet regime.

The Slogans of the Opposition

In a word we must say that Stalin is destroying the dictatorship of the proletariat. It seems to me that in this appeal, we must also point out in what manner it will be possible to get out of the impasse into which Centrism has led the Party and the country. The issues will concern the betterment of the position of the working class in the political and economic field, workers democracy, secret ballot in the Party and possibly in the trade unions, and a Leninist course in the country. As for the administrative introduction of socialism into the country on a very weak technical base, a sharp end must be put to this stupidity. The order for the complete collectivization must be abandoned. We could break our heads on this course. The order for the liquidation of the Kulak through orders from above, when the

with the poor and middle peasantry is being weakened and when the working class is undergoing increased pressure from the apparatus, must be condemned as adventurist. The slogans "Long live the 5-day week; down with uninterrupted work; long live the collective rest of the workers;" must be put forward. We must warn the working class that after the present ultra-Leftist course, Centrism can, with the same facility, introduce a new NEP.

It is certainly necessary to stress the fact that events are confirming our Plat form.

The putchist tactics of Molotov result in the decomposition of the Eastern Parties. A great deal of attention must be given to the questions concerning the Communist International, as they deserve. The Opposition must be reintegrated. The Party must be left to its own course. We must appeal to all the workers to drive out the stranglers of proletarian democracy. We must appeal to the workers to purge, without waiting for authorization from above, the Party, the trade unions and the Soviets, of the Thermidorian bureaucratic scum. We must state openly that the present leadership is leading the country and the dictatorship of the proletariat towards destruction, and that their policies are paving the way for counter-revolution in the country.

Yours,

S.

Employment Sharks Exposed

Ry Federated Press

Admissions in the United States Senate that "known unemployment is now 3,100,000," while "the actual unemployment is twice that amount," give tragic emphasis to a report on fraudulent practices of private employment agencies just issued by the American Assn. for Labor Legislation, in New York.

The report, prepared by George H. Trafton, summarizes hundreds of pages of information buried in the unpublished proceedings of the New York State Industrial Survey Commission. "Witness after witness testifying under oath," says Trafton "described flagrant abuses practiced by some of these commercial enterprises, conclusively demonstrating that the fee-charging employment agency business is still infested with unscrupulous characters who do not hesitate to mulct the helpless, and who find the jobless worker an easy victim."

One of the most common complaints before the commission was misrepresentation of jobs. "Witnesses testified," says Trafton, "that after paying fees they had been sent to jobs which obviously they could not fill and for which they had not applied." Others swore that they had been sent off to temporary positions which had been represented to them as "permanent." Some told of going to distant cities for jobs which did not even exist. Still others testified that "the wages paid on the job were much lower than the agency had represented."

Theft of fees, collected in advance for jobs, but not returned as the law requires when no job was found, was also charged against the private agencies. Sometimes the employment sharks flatly refused to return the fees. At other times they would send the disappointed workers off on other wild goose chases. In this way, one witness stated "they would keep the men going back and forth until they got tired so that they would not come any more and they would not go back for their fee." Another witness reported having "seen fellows thrown down the stairs," when seeking return of their money.

Employers in on Gypping Game

Charges of fee-splitting with employers or foremen, repeatedly made against the private employment sharks in the past, are confirmed by this latest report. Under the fee-splitting system, the boss fires the worker after a few days, and asks the labor-agent for another man. From each man who is sent to the job the agent collects a fee, which he divides with the employer who obligingly makes the vacancy for him. Thus, as one expert has put it, the employment shark "has three men for each job—one on the way to the job, one on the job and one on the way home from the job". An investigator in Buffalo testified before the commission that in one case he had "affidavits of the man who saw the actual payment of money by the fee-charging agent to the employer".

During the investigation, the United States Supreme Court handed down the typically capitalist-minded decision that the fees charged by private employment agents are not subject to regulation by law. Hence the agencies can charge the workers their very eye-teeth for a short-lived chance to be exploited. One instance is cited of a "woman who paid $18 for a job which lasted only two weeks; so that her job cost her half of the total wages received. She returned to the agency, but received neither another position nor a refund."

Sending of girls or women to immoral resorts is also a standing grievance against the private agents investigated in the report.

HALF MILLION STRIKERS IN INDIA IN 1929

WASHINGTON—Half a million workers in India went on strike in 1929, in some 140 industrial disputes, according to a report cabled to the Department of Commerce from its agent at Calcutta.

"The unsettled labor situation is not expected to improve materially in the near future," this agent reported, "as the growing demand of labor for higher wages to improve living conditions will no doubt continue to make for protracted strikes."

Φ

JOBLESS COSTS ON CHARITY MOUNT

ST. LOUIS—(FP)—Unemployment is responsible for 60 cents of every dollar the Provident Assn., local family case work society, is spending for relief nowadays. One third, or 33 cents, of each relief dollar is the average spent the two-year period 1928-29 on families whose need was caused by the wage earner's lack of a job. Each winter the proportion chargeable to joblessness rises sharply, but this winter it has climbed to unprecedented heights.

PITTSBURGH CABMEN FIGHT TRAITORS

PITTSBURGH—(FP)—Unable to smash the solidarity of the striking taxi drivers' ranks by a frontal offensive, the Parmelee Transportation Co. is resorting to innuendoes aimed at the strike leaders. Letters have been mailed to all the cabmen with photostats of correspondence between organizers and officials of the Teamsters and Chauffeurs union.

One letter, signed by Pres. Daniel J. Tobin of the Teamsters Intl. criticizes the Pittsburgh teamsters' secretary for admitting the taxi men into a teamsters' local. "I advise you now that you had no business to admit those taxicab drivers into your local union, as this is in direct violation of your charter rights," warns Tobin. "Such action on your part without the consent and approval of the international executive board is a violation of the laws of the international union. It is not the policy of the international union to admit to membership men while they are on strike as I told you in our conversation over the long distance phone."

This letter carries the Parmelee caption: Proof of How Your Are Being Misled! Another letter, intercepted by Parmelee spies, refers to the payment of $500 by the teamsters' local secretary to the strike committee. It carries the unwarranted Parmelee caption: These men Eat Whether You Do or Not!

The company's extensive undercover department, working incessantly to corrupt individual strikers, has been able to reach only five so far. These five were disciplined by the union for counterfeiting tickets for a benefit. Thereupon Parmelee took them openly on the payroll, opened office and installed the five Judases as a "Back to Work Committee."

The Hearst Sun-Telegraph, anxious to discredit the strikers at every turn, has hailed this committee as indicative of the early end of the strike. The strikers' answer was to order the arrest of the quintet on embezzlement charges. Their own solidarity against the company's insidious efforts was shown recently when a company settlement was turned down with only one dissenting vote.

ATLANTA—The Georgia Federation of Labor will hold its annual convention April 16 at Waycross.

Naval Conference Talks On

New attempts at the revival of the London Naval Conference, after its sudden collapse in recent weeks, continue to make little or no headway. Almost two months of sessions find the conference today no further than when it began. The dispatch of Balderston, in the New York World (3-14-36) makes the following characterization: "The London Naval Conference still lives tonight, although it is fighting for its life."

Realizing this condition, the capitalist powers are trying in every conceivable manner to adjust things so that the failures of the conference shall not be too glaring. The attitude prevails that "at least something ought to be done."

The various powers distrust one another. This was evident in refusals to entertain political pacts among themselves. The French proposals for a political pact between her and England on the one hand, and with the United States on the other, netted nothing. Neither the United States nor Great Britain are ready to accept such political alignments at this stage, and declare by their actions that at this juncture of the war preparations, such steps are premature. The failure of political pacts, while adding to the further crisis in the conference, reopened again the "discussions" on limitations.

In the meantime the conference sessions have been postponed in favor of preliminary discussions between the individual powers with the hope of arriving at some minimum agreements with which to continue with the conference proper. These too, have made no progress.

The main handicap continues to be the failure of the Italians to put their cards on the table, giving figures as to what the Mussolini government considers essential to the security of Italy, it is said. So far, the Italians continue to insist on parity with France as the first essential to an agreement on the Mediterranean. In this manner the N. Y. Times pictures the present situation. The French refuse to budge from their original proposal calling for a 725,000 naval tonnage. Neither will Italy accept any reduction from parity with France. A condition for France's reduction would be a similar decrease on the part of England and the United States, which is a very unlikely change.

With the apparent impossibility to attain a 5-power treaty, steps have already been taken to arrive at a three party agreement between the United States, Great Britain and Japan. At this writing negotiations on this basis have proceeded and brought with it a renewed attempt to bring about agreement between France and Italy. A three-power treaty would result in an increase of antagonisms. This would mean that France and Italy, without feeling the atmosphere of the conference, would enter into a heated rave in construction which would in turn be counteracted by increased building on the part of the members of the three-power treaty.

It is becoming more and more evident that the outcome of the conference will fail to hit its intended mark. Neither of the powers will budge from their demands of sufficient "security". Edwin James in the New York Times (3-14-36) says, "Looking at the conference broadly, there still exists a possibility of making a limitation treaty here, but there seems no chance at all of registering any reduction in the sum total of the world's war craft."

The conference has thus far failed to make any progress; on the contrary it sustains the contentions of the Communists that such conferences of the capitalist powers, are held to bring confusion in the ranks of the working class and to cover the war plans of the imperialists. The unmasking of these attempts at deluding the masses is the task of the Communists.

MILWAUKEE COPS ABUSE CHILDREN IN JAIL

MILWAUKEE—(FP)—Police beat and abused eight children, arrested with 60 adults in the unemployment demonstration March 6, it was revealed when the demonstrators were released from the Milwaukee jail. Twenty five of the adults were charged with rioting and 35 with vagrancy, presumably because of their unemployment. Six were given six months in jail as one way out of solving their individual unemployment problems and 18 got three months each.

THE ABERLE MILL STRIKE IN PHILLY

dustrial Philadelphia, but the Communist party here has never discovered this.

Lovestone and Foster yesmen, who as District Organizers, have so gallantly paraded through this city—Bentall, Tallentire, Weisbord, Jakira, Bail, Benjamin and now Gardos, never penetrated into this vast unknown hinterland. Yet, every nationally known Philadelphia product, except Baldwin Locomotives, Kirschbaum Clothes and Scott's Sanitissue, is manufactured in Kensington. Miles of streets are lined with textile mills and the homes of textile workers. Here Stetson Hats are made which are carried around the world by ships built in Cramps Shipyard. The vast coal and grain piers of the Reading R. R. and the world-known Disston Saw works are both manned by Kensington workers. There is probably no larger nor more fully proletarian unit in America.

Kensington is very largely populated by the descendants of Scotch, Irish and English textile emigrants, for, before the Southward movement, it was the greatest textile center in the country. There is a scattering of other nationalities, but it is typically American in its entirety. It is the proper base for the working class movement in the Philadelphia industrial area.

Philadelphia's Labor Record

It is generally believed outside of Philadelphia that it is a city of scabs. Whatever truth there may be in this, certainly does not apply to Kensington. It has always been strongly union. When the textile industry was in its prime there were probably 75,000 organized workers in that industry most of whom lived and worked in Kensington. This had its natural reflex in helping other workers, such as barbers, bartenders, store clerks to unite. During the great car strike, Kensington was an armed camp. Police, state constabulary, National Guard, occupied the streets of the section, and riots were continuous. Ashwagons drivers dumped their loads upon the tracks while women from nearby houses brought oil and gasoline out to burn the stalled cars to the ground. The Cumberland Street carbarn was only comparable to a Belgian fortress on the German frontier. IF THE A. F. OF L. HAD HAD A CLASS VIEW INSTEAD OF A CRAFT OUTLOOK, Kensington could have been organized 100%. Hundreds of lesser struggles attest the fighting qualities of these workers. The outlaw railway strike closed the Reading shops in Kensington, while the last strike at Cramps is a labor classic.

The pitifully inadequate leadership and the wrong policies of the Communist party are here most clearly shown. After ten years of existence in Philadelphia they have absolutely no connection with its most militant workers. Hand picked D. O.s sent here to keep in order political fences have never troubled themselves with little things like this. The handful who did realize the importance of Kensington were given no aid or encouragement. In fact some who were too insistent in demanding that real work be done were driven from the Party.

Where is the National Textile Union in a situation of such magnitude? If it has any existence, except on paper, in this great textile city, the writer is unaware of it. It has not appeared in the Aberle

It has doubtless been a great relief to the A. F. of L. fatboys, McMahon and Co, that the Communists have so kindly withdrawn from the field. It's tough enough to try to keep in hand a bunch like these Kensington workers, who, despite all the advice of their officials, have insisted on making this strike real, who, in defiance of injunctions have made mass demonstrations around the mill, 60 of them being arrested recently at one time. It's worth a $10,000 yearly salary to work that hard, without having a lot of Communists in the union counteracting every effort toward peaceful class collaboration. One can almost hear them breathe, "Thank thee, oh God, for the blessed third period."

Of course, if one reads the Daily Worker, another impression might be gotten. At first the Party press virtually ignored the strike. Now, to cover up the inactivity of the Party and the N. T. W., stupid and lying stories are carried. This gets nobody anywhere. For instance, the Daily Worker captioned, "Thousands led by N. T. W. U. fight Aberle scabs." An untruth out of the whole cloth, concocted presumably by the Party to cover up the failure of the N. T. W. textile organizer, Murdock. On a few occasions, Party members, not textile workers, have made futile gestures by distributing denunciatory leaflets. The capitalist press has not even mentioned them, and the capitalist is not likely to overlook any bet to scare up a RED issue in the strike. Of the 92 strikers arrested, none are reported as being members of the Party or N. T. W. U. The funeral demonstration, sadly enough, was an A. F. of L. affair entirely. The Mayor, the police and the A. F. of L. fatboys realize the volcano underlying the situation and cooperate in every way to provide a safety valve that would harmlessly—for them—let off steam. The rest

Marion Workers Discuss New Strike

MARION, N. C.—(FP)—This mill town is seething with excitement, both among the blacklisted strikers of last summer and the workers employed in the Marion and Clinchfield mills. Announcement by the mill managements that the stretchout system is to be put back into effect has caused threats of a strike. Before and after work the workers are seen knotted in small groups discussing the new order.

One hundred and thirty families numbering 735 men, women and children are facing starvation here. They are the victims of strikes at the two scab mills. Evicted from company owned shacks, they are now living in dugouts, barns and abandoned shacks, as many as 14 adults and children in two rooms.

the type to carry out orders. The sterile quibbling of his speeches, always definitively directed to the defense of opportunism, is the exact opposite of the vigorous, strongly-marked and fruitful revolutionary thought of Amedeo Bordiga. By the way, is it not Ercoli who tried to adapt to Italy the idea of the "democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and the peasantry" under the slogan of the Italian Constituent Assembly supported by a "worker-peasant body"?

On the questions of the U. S. S. R., the Chinese revolution, the British general strike, the revolution in Poland, or the struggle against Italian fascism, Ercoli, as well as the other leaders in the bureaucratic machine, invariably began by adopting an opportunist line and eventually rectified it by means of ultra-Left adventure. It appears that at present, that variety is again in season.

Having thus on the one side Centrists of the Ercoli type, and on the other side ultra-Left confusionists, you are called upon, comrades, under the difficult conditions of the fascist dictatorship, to defend the historic interests of the Italian proletariat and of the international proletariat. With all my heart I wish you good luck and success.

Yours,

of the Daily Worker reports are in line with the above quotation. As for an occasional leaflet distribution, this is not the equivalent or substitute for persistent, solid, systematic work among the workers.

Establish Roots among the Workers

What's to be done? There is but one possible course. The Party must be re-orientated. Its roots must be firmly planted in Kensington. The work that should have been done years ago, must be begun at this time. The policy of working also within the A. F. of L. must be revived.

If the Party in Philadelphia had adopted a correct attitude years ago, it would have established bases in Kensington and picked up the broken threads of the S. P. It would have built an influence, that, by the time of the Passaic textile strike would have enabled it to have reached masses of Philadelphia textile workers, and have secured their hearty cooperation, both organizationally and financially. The Party today would be in a position to have occupied a leading position in the recent great demonstration. When Weisbord finally came to Philly, he spent his time in factional politics, as did all the other apparatus men who followed him.

If such preparatory work had been properly carried out during the past years, so-called unemployment demonstrations staged here lately at the City Hall, could have been real. There are tens of thousands of unemployed in Kensington. Whole families are unemployed and starving. Thousands of them have lost the equities they had in homes sold out at sheriff's sales.

Will the value of this lesson be lost? It is for the Communist and the Left wing to turn seriously to the task of obtaining a base among the most exploited sections of the Philadelphia working class, especially in the Kensington area.

WITH LENIN AGAINST STALIN WOMEN SUFFER IN PRESENT ERA

By L. D. TROTSKY

(The following is a chapter from a large work, "THE REVOLUTION DISFIGURED" by L. D. Trotsky. This book will shortly be published by The MILITANT in an inexpensive edition, and will include documents from the archives of the Comintern, speeches of L. D. Trotsky, Lenin and other valuable material never as yet published by the ruling Stalinist bureaucracy. The book will shed a penetrating light on the falsification of the history of the Russian Revolution perpetrated by Stalin and his scribblers, Yaroslavsky, et al. The section here printed is addressed by comrade Trotsky to the Bureau of Party History of the Central Committee of the Russian Communist party: Concerning the Falsification of the History of the October Insurrection, the History of the Revolution and the History of the Party"—Ed.)

I will not quote here Lenin's principal letter against Stalin on the national question. It is printed in the stenographic reports of the plenum of July 26, and moreover, it is being passed around in separate leaflets. They will fail to conceal that letter. But there are other documents on the same theme, completely unknown to the Party. Arkhivarius and the historians of the Stalin school are taking every measure to prevent those documents from appearing. They will continue to do so. They are quite capable, in fact, of simply destroying them.

For that reason I think it is necessary to quote here the most important excerpts from the early letter of Lenin, and the answer of Stalin, on the question of the structure of the Soviet Union. Lenin's letter, dated September 27, 1922, was addressed to comrade Kamenev, a copy being sent to all the members of the Politburo. Here is the beginning of the letter:

"You probably have received already from Stalin the resolution of his commission on the admission of the independent republics into the Soviet Union.

"If you have not received it, get it from the secretary and please read it immediately. I spoke about it yesterday with Sokolnikov, today with Stalin, tomorrow I will see Mdivani (a Georgian Communist suspected of advocating 'independence').

"In my opinion the question is supremely important. Stalin has a slight aspiration toward hurry. You must think it over well. Zinoviev too. (You once had the intention to take this matter up and did so to some extent.)

"Stalin has already agreed to one concession, in Section I, instead of saying 'entry' into the R. S. F. S. R. to say 'formal unification' with the R. S. F. S. R. in a union of Soviet Republics of Europe and Asia. I trust the spirit of this concession is obvious. We acknowledge ourselves on an equal basis with the Ukrainian Republic and other Republics, and together with them on the basis of equality we enter into a new union, a new federation, the Union of Soviet Republics of Europe and Asia."

There follows a whole series of Lenin's corrections made in the same spirit. In the concluding part of his letter Lenin says:

"Stalin agrees to postpone introducing the resolution in the Politburo until my arrival. I arrive Monday, October 2. I should like to have an interview with you and Rykov for a couple of hours—in the morning, say from one to two, and, if necessary in the evening, say five to seven, or six to eight.

"Here is my preliminary project. On the basis of a conversation with Mdivani and other comrades I will fight for it and change it. I urge you to do the same and answer me.

"Yours,
"Lenin

"P. S. Send copies to ALL members of the Politburo."

Stalin sent his answer to Lenin to the members of the Politburo on the same day, September 27, 1922. I quote from his answer two important passages:

"Lenin's corrections to paragraph 2, proposing to create along with the Central Executive Committee of the Russian Republic, a Central Executive Committee of the Federation, should not, in my opinion, be adopted. The existence of two Central Executive Committees in Moscow, one of which will obviously represent a 'lower house' and the other an 'upper house' will give us nothing but conflict and debate."

And further:

"4. On the subject of paragraph 4, in my opinion, comrade Lenin himself 'hurried' a little, demanding a fusion of the commissariats of finance, food supply, labor and people's economy with the commissariats of the Federation. There is hardly a doubt that this 'hurriedness' will supply fuel to the advocates of 'independence' to the detriment of the national liberalism of Lenin.

5. Lenin's correction to paragraph 5, is in my opinion superfluous.

"J. Stalin"

This extraordinarily illuminating correspondence, concealed from the Party, like many other documents, preceded the famous letter of Lenin on the national question. In his remarks upon Stalin's draft, Lenin is exceptionally reserved and gentle in his expression. Lenin still hoped, in that period, to adjust the matter without a big conflict. He gently accuses Stalin of "hurrying". Stalin's accusation against Mdivani of "independence" Lenin places in quotation marks, obviously disassociating himself from that accusation. Moreover, Lenin especially emphasizes the fact that he will introduce his accusation on the basis of conversations with Mdivani and other comrades.

Stalin's answer, on the contrary, is marked by rudeness; the concluding phrases of the fourth point, is especially worthy of attention:

"There is hardly a doubt that this 'hurriedness' will supply fuel to the advocates of 'independence' to the detriment of the national liberalism (!) of Lenin."

Thus Lenin had arrived to the point of being accused of national liberalism.

The further course of the struggle about the national question showed Lenin that he could not straighten things out by means of inside and, so to speak, family methods of influencing Stalin, that it was necessary to appeal to the congress and to the Party. With this purpose, Lenin wrote in several installments, his letters on the national question.

Vladimir Illych attributed enormous importance to the "Georgian" question, not only because he feared the consequences of a false national policy in Georgia—a fear which has been wholly confirmed—but also because upon that question was revealed to him the falseness of Stalin's whole course on the national question, and not only the national question. The big fundamental letter of Lenin on the national question is concealed from the Party to this day. The pretence that Lenin did not intend his letter to be read to the Party is false to the bottom. Did Lenin intend his remarks in notebooks and on the borders of the books he read to be published? The fact is that you publish everything whatever which directly or indirectly strikes at the Opposition, but you hide the letter of Lenin giving his fundamental program on the national question.

Here are two quotations from this letter:

"I think that here the hastiness and administrative impulsiveness of Stalin played a fatal role, and also his spite against the notorious 'social chauvinism'. Spitefulness in general plays the worst possible role in politics." (From Lenin's note of December 30, 1922.)

And here in more exact terms:

"It is of course necessary to hold Stalin and Dzerzhinsky responsible for all this really Great Russian nationalistic campaign" (from Lenin's letter of December 31, 1922).

Vladimir Illych sent me this letter at the moment when he felt that he would hardly be able to appear at the Twelfth Congress. Here is the note which I received from him in the two last days of his participation in political life:

"Strictly secret. Personal.

"Esteemed comrade Trotsky:

"I earnestly ask you to undertake the defense of the Georgian affair at the Central Committee of the Party. That affair is now under 'prosecution' at the hands of Stalin and Dzerzhinsky, and I cannot rely on their impartiality. Indeed, quite the contrary. If you would agree to undertake its defense, I could be at rest. If for some reason you do not agree, send me back all the papers. I will consider that a sign of your disagreement.

"With the very best comradely greetings,

"Lenin

Leon Borisovich:

"Supplementing our telephone conversation, I communicate to you as acting president of the Politburo, the following:

"As I have already told you Dec. 31, 1922, Vladimir Illych has dictated an article on the national question.

"This question has worried him extremely and he was preparing to speak on it at the Party conference. Not long before his last illness, he told me that he would publish the article, but later. After that he got sick, without giving final directions.

"Vladimir Illych considered this article to be a guiding one and extremely important. At his direction it was communicated to comrade Trotsky, whom Vladimir Illych authorized to defend his point of view upon the given question at the Party conference, in view of their solidarity upon it.

The only copy of the article in my possession is preserved at the direction of Vladimir Illych in his secret archive.

WASHINGTON—Half a million worker women falls the heaviest burden of the struggle for existence as wage earners. A study made for the Women's Bureau of the U. S. Department of Labor by Agnes L. Peterson shows that women, formerly held responsible for keeping the home, are now compelled in a large proportion of cases to share the family bread-winning while keeping the home and bringing up children. When disaster meets the man of the family, they step forth as sole wage-earner for the family, besides being home-keeper and nurse. And this burden is carried despite the wage discrimination against women.

Information was secured from almost 60,000 women as to their share in family support. More than half of them turned over all their wages to their families. Of 455 working mothers, among immigrant workers in Pennsylvania, only 108 reported that their husbands made as much as $30 a week. "Sickness and unemployment as possible causes of reduction of the meager income hung over the women like an awful dread."

One woman, a cigar maker, has been supporting her husband and two children for more than six months because the man was unable to get work for more than a few days at a time. In another family the mother was compelled to work for wages to support herself and three children because her husband, disabled by an injury for five months, received only $12.50 a week as compensation.

Marriage Increases Burden

Among 17,000 unmarried women, 1 out of every 5 was taking care of a family without the help of male relatives. Another phase of the inquiry showed that sons do not forego marriage in order to give needed support to their parents, in any such proportion as daughters sacrifice themselves to this duty.

"In many cases," says the report, "marriage fails to bring to women the economic security considered formerly to be one of its chief advantages. Nowadays marriage may mean new financial responsibilities for wife as well as for husband."

Of 74,000 Rochester women reported by the 1920 census as married, widowed or divorced, 28 percent were gainfully employed. Even in the 59,000 cases where the husband lived with the family, almost 9 percent of the wives were employed away from home; and of 2,300 cases where the husband was absent, 48 percent of the wives had outside employment. In about 4,300 families the wife or widow was the only bread winner.

greetings". Whoever knows Lenin's parsimony with words and his manner of conversation and correspondence, will realize that Lenin did not sign these words to his letter, accidentally. It was not accidental either, that Stalin, when he was compelled to read this correspondence at the plenum of July, 1926, substituted for the words "with the very best comradely greetings" the official phrase "with Communist greetings". Here again Stalin was true to

A Seaman on Conditions

The Militant
Dear Comrades:

Shipping today isn't what it was. It never is. The man who comes before the board in the Seamen's Institute with his discharge in his hand and his heart in his mouth, every time the high priest comes out to chalk up a job, vowing that if he gets a ship that's half decent, he will never be on the beach again, had better get wise to himself. There isn't any such animal today as a half decent ship and the average seaman knows that.

To meet competition in this industry and to carve himself a good hunk of profit the ship owner in American, as elsewhere, builds his ships so that they can be loaded and discharged faster and cheaper, builds them with Diesel Engines and oil burners instead of coal burners. Iron mike and pneumatic chippers and spray painting outfits are installed. But he cuts his crew down to a skeleton (and some of them look like skeletons after a month or two on some wagons I know). They are cutting below the level demanded by ordinary safety. In a word, he overloads his ships and overworks his crew. Hence we have Vestris disasters, which will become more common in the future. Ramsay MacDonald who is chief spokesman and lord high juggler for the British capitalists now has demanded a raising of the load line and what the British ship owners says, goes in the marine industry.

What does it matter to this high-souled blatherskite, if thousands of seamen are condemned to certain death, so long as it means an extra margin of profit to the class he supports?

America, as a great imperialist nation, feels the need of a merchant marine, not only for peaceful trade, but as an useful auxiliary to the fleet in case of war. The Jones-White Pact passed last year grants subsidies to American shipowners to build ships in accordance with the plans of the Naval Board, and shows which way the wind blows. Already shipowners are getting into action with the full support of the U. S. government and are preparing to fight a stiff battle for mercantile supremacy with Great Britain.

Seamen Disorganized

If the events in the marine industry since the war are any criterion, one can see the ship owners have driven seamen back all over the world. The I. S. U. and I. W. W., once proud and powerful organizations, now exist as a mere shadow of their former selves, pale ghosts who haunt the waterfront. The N. S. U. of Great Britain with its PC 5 is in reality under the control of the shipowners. Everywhere, with one or two exceptions, seamen are demoralized, conditions aboard the ships are utterly barbarous. Bulldozing and hazing with blackjacks by the officers take place. The 2 watch system is practically universal, with all kinds of dodges to get unpaid overtime work.

As for improvement in these conditions, look at what is happening. The new ships Europa and Bremen of the Nord Deutscher Lloyd symbolize the increasing tempo of competition for trade, fanning to a white heat the already intense struggle. The freight market has continually been dropping for years.

American finance capital intends to build a merchant fleet, and the cost-price, with a profit attached, will be paid for by the blood and sweat and suffering of American seamen. For $50 per month meantime and later for less. The ship owners stand well organized, well prepared for the battle.

What leadership does the Party offer the seamen?

The policy of the Communist party in the Seamen's League, has been a duplicate of that followed in the coal miners' union and elsewhere. All non-Party elements of any standing among the seamen are ousted or kept submerged. Anyone, even Party members who oppose or differ from secretary Mink are likewise ousted and attempts made to discredit them. While in paper the outfit struggles to build a union which the rank and file will control through ship committees, the reality of the situation was expressed by Hines, the New York secretary. He told at a membership meeting, which was in revolt against the bureaucratic methods and lack of initiative of the League officers, that "the T. U. U. L. would run the League and not the seamen". Mind you, I had to ask several who were present at the meeting before I could believe it. That seamen are willing to organize and fight the hellish ship conditions afloat is obvious.

A Narrow Policy

The Longshoremen are likewise disgusted with the grafting and sellout tactics of Joe Ryan and company. The Marine Workers League has made a little progress, in spite of its leadership rather than because of it. Right here are workers prepared to struggle. Drop the monkey business, and backstairs "third period" diplomacy. Encourage the rank and file to look after their welfare in the organization.

A broadening of the leadership is necessary. Seamen will certainly fight for better conditions. More attention to the everyday struggles of the seamen and less prominence to the latest contortions of the third period.

It is not enough to line up a member and then let him drift away. A man becomes a member in a haphazard and lackadaisical manner and then he is of no further interest or else he is informed that so and so are a bunch of saboteurs. This causes him to quit. Why not try to put some of the paper resolutions into practice?

Two years have passed and still no union, and unless the Party's throttling grip is relaxed, then the new union will die. The situation demands action. Either the Party means business, in which event the bureaucratic methods now adopted will have to be dropped or else the Party and League will get nowhere. Seamen demand a showdown, as they say on the waterfront.

—JAMES RUSSELL

Miners' Conventions

Farrington was finally seated, after a stormy debate which consumed the greater part of two days, by a vote of 225 to 145. The fight over the credentials of this reactionary crook and grafter became the dominating issue of the convention. It symbolized the elements of corruption and reaction in the new union and the determination of the rank and file to uproot them. The vote was, to a certain extent, a measure of comparative strength of the two forces on a show-down issue, a measure that was weighted in favor of the reactionaries by the Left wing boycott of the convention.

Farrington, formerly president of the Illinois district and long a bitter enemy of all progressive tendencies in the union, was exposed in 1926 as the paid employee of the Peabody Coal Company under contract at $25,000 per year. He was expelled in 1926 and re-admitted recently into the union after the break of the Illinois District with the Lewis organization. The case against Farrington is clear and undisputable. At the time of his expulsion a letter written to him by Peabody was made public by Lewis in which Farrington, protesting against Peabody's instructions not to run again for the office of district president, said: "I feel that I can serve you better as an official of the Miners' union". Despite this clear proof of his perfidy, Fishwick, who had been Farrington's henchman and an accomplice in his evil deeds, backed his credentials and jammed them through with the weight of the Illinois district machine.

What effect this action and the battle which centered around it will have on the fortunes of the new union remains to be seen. Farrington hailed the result as a "vindication of his honor", but he followed it with the announcement that he would take his seat and participate no further in the convention. Nevertheless, he remains a power behind the scenes in the Illinois district organization, the strongest body in the union, and the issue remains. The progressive rank and file forces consolidated themselves in the struggle to unseat Farrington and an expansion of the new union in the coal fields will create the conditions to broaden these forces and increase their strength.

Progressives Measures Brought Forward

The power developed in the fight over this question forced a number of progressive measures through the convention. Among them were the following: the amendment of the preamble to replace the demand for "an equitable share of the fruits of their labor" with the demand for "the full social value of their product"; the five-day week and six-hour day from bank to bank; the advocacy of unemployment insurance; the reduction of officers salaries by 50 per cent and restrictions of their powers.

One measure, pushed through on the wave of sentiment for union democracy—the provision for greater autonomy of the district organizations—which was promoted as a safeguard against the autocracy of national officials made so odious by Lewis, opens the door for trouble from another quarter. Such decentralization is, at bottom, a step backward. In practice it will weaken the national battle-front of the union and provide justification for strike-breaking separate agreements by treacherous District officials of the Fishwick type. Moreover, while it will tend to protect a progressive district against the disruptive interference of a Lewis, it will also shield a reactionary and corrupt district machine from the corrective influence of the national organization. The Fishwick-Farrington elements undoubtedly supported district autonomy with such considerations in mind.

Already at the Springfield convention the principle of autonomy—on its face a step forward—was invoked in defense of Fishwick and Nesbit against the proposal from the floor for their removal. John Hindmarsh, speaking on these proposals, said that "for the convention to meddle in the internal affairs of a district would mean giving the new union's officers the power we are seeking to wrest from Lewis". It was this argument that shielded them from the demand for an accounting of their administration of the district organization. It also helped to squeeze through the credentials of Farrington. It will have similar implications in the future if Howat, as president of the national organization, disappoints their calculations to use him as a harmless decoration of progress and militancy for their reactionary designs.

Communists Adopt Isolation Policy

An interesting feature of the Springfield convention was the re-emergence of the socialist elements and the assertion of socialist influence in the new union. The Socialist party, once a power in the United Mine Workers, has had no influence whatever in recent years. Its place was taken by the rising Communist party which, fighting aggressively and employing skillful tactics, gained influence over a big progressive movement of the rank and file. The Communists have lately maneuvered themselves onto a side track by ill-advised tactics ("boycott the Springfield convention!") and made no effort to assert themselves in this new movement. The Socialists, who are no doubt grateful to the "third period" for this opportunity, made the most of it to edge into a strong position at Springfield. The election of Germer as vice president of the new union is the symbol of a formidable socialist advance in one of the most important sectors of the American labor movement.

Next week's Militant will contain further detailed reports of the Springfield convention and the first of a series of analytical articles on the miners' union and the tasks of the Left wing.

The MILITANT

we believe, has fulfilled a vital role in the best interests of the working class and Communist movement in the United States. It gives a true picture of the situation in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Communist International.

The MILITANT

prints the original and incomparable writings of Leon Trotsky, the leader of the Left Bolshevik Opposition, now exiled in Turkey by the Stalin bureaucracy. In so doing, it makes clear to all intelligent and honest revolutionary workers, the revisionist policies of the present leadership of the International Communist movement as directed, since Lenin's death, by Stalin and Bucharin and their Centrist and Right wing supporters in the various countries.

The MILITANT

presents the views and policies of the Left Opposition in the United States, the Communist League of America (Opposition), on the labor and political problems before the American working class.

The MILITANT

has printed and will continue to print material on the events and issues in the Soviet Union, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Communist International, the writings of L. D. Trotsky, Christian Rakovsky and other leaders of the Russian Revolution, that are found in no other English publication.

The MILITANT

fights for the rebuilding of the revolutionary movement on the foundations laid by Marx and Lenin and against the Stalin-Bucharin revisionists, and thereby best serves the cause of international Communism.

We call upon our readers to help maintain the Militant by giving financial support to ensure its continued existence as a fighting weekly for the cause of Bolshevism.

SIX MONTHS FOR REFUSAL TO SALUTE FLAG

SAN FRANCISCO—It will cost Henry Keister six months of his life because he refused to salute the American flag at a Washington's birthday parade. He was jailed under the open charge of vagrancy later turned to contempt of court when Keister maintained his refusal to salute the flag in Police Judge Steiger's court and denounced labor conditions. He is held in jail under $250 bail pending appeal.

CUBANS STRIKE

Defy Machado Rule - Demand Unemployment Relief

Growing out of the acute unemployment situation prevalent throughout Cuba and which has thrown 200,000 out of jobs, Cuban workers struck on March 20 in protest against unemployment and against the suppression of the labor unions and other organizations of the workers by the Machado government. The strike, called by the National Federation of Labor of Cuba, was widely supported, despite the intimidation and terror of Machado's spies, police and troops. It indicates the readiness of the masses to struggle against their severe exploitation by native and American capitalists. The strike, among others, brought out the workers of the streetcars, omnibuses, breweries, cigar factories, cafe employees, bakeries printshops, longshoremen, etc.

Delegates representing the Workers' Association called upon President Machado, the Dictator of Cuba, and among other demands called for: Recognition of the right to organize and strike; an end to police intervention in the unions and labor struggles; free speech and press; a seven hour day; payment of wages to the unemployed by the employers and the State; no eviction of unemployed from their homes for non-payment of rent; free transportation for the unemployed and their families while seeking work and free night restaurants and shelter for the unemployed.

The Bloody Rule of Machado

Under President Machado, the willing hickspittle of Wall street, the labor and revolutionary movement in Cuba has been viciously suppressed. The bloody Machado has been responsible for the murder, imprisonment and deportation of thousands of Cuban labor leaders and revolutionaries, among them, Julio Mella, the Cuban Communist, who was murdered in Mexico after his exile by Machado from his native country.

Now the acute conditions of misery and starvation of the Cuban masses is bringing forth their resistance despite every terror of the Wall Street-controlled government.

American capital has invaded entire Cuba and has particularly gained control of the sugar plantations and refineries and has subjugated the workers to long hours of toil at low wages. The acute economic conditions give the background to the strike. Sugar forms the main base for the prosperity of the American investors and the starvation and degradation of the Cuban masses. The price of raw sugar is now 1.59 cents a pound, compared with 2.40 cents in 1928 and 2.82 in 1927.

Mass Unemployment Continues

Reports from throughout the country give the lie to the propaganda of the bosses and the government that unemployment is on the decrease. The employment service of the U. S. Department of Labor itself is forced to acknowledge, in its report for the month of February, that "industry made no substantial gains" during the month, while "in some industries a slight recession was noted." Yet but a few days prior President Hoover had declared that the "recovery" from industrial depression had been the most rapid in American history!

Before the Senate Committee, Senator Wagner of New York declared that the unemployment situation is the worst that has ever existed in the United States. Investigations and statistical reports from all sections of the country confirm the fact of mass unemployment. For the millions of working men and women it has brought the most dire need and acute misery. There is nothing to indicate any substantial improvement in the economic situation in the near future. Every city and hamlet in the country counts its toll of unemployed and misery. To mention any is to describe all. Distress from unemployment in Chicago, states Professor B. M. Squires of the University of Chicago and who is also director of the Illinois State employment agency, "has been the most acute in ten years."

Iron and Steel Production Slow

The steel industry, the barometer of industry in general, remains low, according to iron and steel publications which report that no definite upturn is yet apparent, and that this situation prevails also in the foreign markets. The Iron Trade Review comments that "Continental and British iron and steel markets generally are dull, some British plants having gone on short time as a result. World trade in iron and steel is low, and restricted inquiry forecasts continuation of this condition." In virtually all trades, manufactures, industry and agriculture fields there is described a condition of wide-spread unemployment. Hoover and the employing class continue to hand out hokum for consumption by the jobless, but they themselves know the reality and find no capitalist remedy for the situation. Any other kind of solution is of course to them unthinkable.

As never before, public and charitable institutions have been utilized as a sop, but the breadlines grow longer and increase in number. The U. S. government has declined to do anything directly to provide work or compensation for the unemployed, but instead continues to talk of industrial revival, while jobs become scarcer each day. All sorts of proposals have been forthcoming from capitalist politicians for public works, etc., but all remain on paper.

Bosses Cutting Wages

The bosses have naturally ignored Hoovers "request" at the conference consisting of Hoover, the employers and the A. F. of L. bureaucrats, not to reduce wages. Henry Ford, the "high wage" boss and "philanthropist" has been outstanding in speeding men out of work and then cutting wages still further on one pretext or another. On the other hand, Wm. Green, the labor faker and agent of the bosses in the ranks of labor, continues to advise the workers not to resist the attacks of the bosses through strikes, etc.—all in the name of the "national welfare", that is, for the bosses. Not all workers who still have jobs take this "advice". By a vote of four to one, to the surprise of the reactionary officials of the United Textile Workers Union, the company-union workers employed in the notorious Amoskeag Manufacturing firm of Manchester, N. H. in the manufacture of printcloth refused to accept a 10 per cent reduction in wages. Here and there (Pitts- (Continued on Page 3)

TROTSKY SERIOUSLY ILL

The Militant is informed of the serious illness of comrade L. D. Trotsky, the leader of the International Opposition of the Left Bolsheviks. Exiled to Constantinople by Stalin, Trotsky has suffered from many maladies, engendered during his years of service to the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia and the international revolutionary movement. Now his condition is exceptionally aggravated by heart trouble, following recent illnesses. Trotsky has made efforts to be permitted to go to one of the West European countries for medical attention and treatment. But the imperialist nations have apparently accepted wholeheartedly the desire of Stalin that Trotsky shall remain isolated in Constantinople where lack of proper medical attention can easily result in his death. Stalin and the imperialists are as one in their enmity of Trotsky, the organizer and leader of the Red Army and the co-worker and comrade of Lenin.

We have spoken before of the illness of comrade Trotsky. In the past months, an unfavorable change has set in. He and his wife and son are located on Prinkipo Island in the Sea of Marmora. The climate there is unsatisfactory for one of his condition and a different climate is needed in addition to special treatment that is not available there nor in the country at large.

The arch-bureaucrat Stalin is to be held fully responsible for the exile of comrade Trotsky from the Soviet Union and for his connivance with the bourgeois government to prevent Trotsky from obtaining access to a West European country. The proletariat of the Soviet Union and the whole world will yet deal with Stalin, who persecutes, imprisons, exiles and even shoots Bolsheviks and undermines the cause of Communism.

KANSAS CITY BUILDING TRADES WIN FIVE-DAY WEEK

KANSAS CITY, Mo.—(FP)—Building trades of Kansas City have won the 5-day week and an increase as a result of a 3-week strike which tied up construction activity. The struggle was a bitter one for a time, but the backbone of the Builders' Assn. opposition was broken when several independent employers signed the new agreement and resumed work.

According to the peace pact, the 44-hour week will continue until July 1, when the 5-day week becomes effective, supplemented by wage increases ranging from 22 1-2 to 50 cents a day. On Jan. 1, 1931, another wage boost, a flat 50 cents a day, is ordered. The agreement expires March 1, 1932.

HAITI STRUGGLES

Demands Independence From Wall Street Rule

The killing of five Haitians on December 7 by a detachment of United States marines, forced into the open the serious nature of the protest of the Haitian masses against United States occupation, and also against its puppet president, Borno. Since then the movement for Haitian independence, although curtailed and misguided by a bourgeois and liberal leadership, showed the increased temper of the mass of Haitian peasants, whose protests were set forth under such slogans as, "Long live Independent Haiti!", "Down with the Council of State". They culminated during the past number of weeks in a demand for an end to the occupation of Haiti by the United States marines and the National City Bank of New York.

The past history of the occupation of Haiti by the United States, is a record of bloody extermination of the peasant masses. From a period of the occupation in July, 1915, the "peaceful guardianship" by the marines has resulted in the slaughter of over 3,000 Haitians, who dared to protest against the military dictatorship and exploitation of United States capitalism. The state of affairs brought about by American occupation finds the Haitian masses in a virtual state of peonage. The old Haitian laws against the ownership of land by foreigners resulted, since 1915, in the dispossession of the peasantry and allowed for large holdings by the United States and other foreign imperialists. Dr. Dalencour, head of the Haitian Medical Journal, characterizes the situation in the following manner: The Haitian peasant sees his future endangered by the entry of American capitalism. This necessarily results from the creation of large estates which would cause the subjugation of the peasants into a servile peon class." The peasantry of Haiti are actually in such a state today, which accounts for the vigorous struggle they are making for an "independent republic of Haiti".

St. Louis Bus Drivers on Strike For Union

ST. LOUIS—(FP)—Five days after their first meeting to unionize and 48 hours after their demand for union recognition had been tossed in the wastebasket by the traction monopoly, organized bus drivers and conductors of St. Louis walked out in a spontaneous unexpected strike. Bus operation has been completely tied up.

The company, with an ugly anti-union background, was taken completely unawares. The meeting, held at 2 a. m., authorized the strike by unanimous vote and the next morning not a bus rolled out of the big barns.

These raw recruits to unionism are picketing the garages like seasoned veterans and intended strikebreakers have been enrolled in the union about as rapidly as the company has been able to hire them. Not even the skeleton of a crew has been recruited. The strikers belong to the street carmen's union and the fight bears the endorsement of the St. Louis central body and the Missouri Federation of Labor. A sympathetic strike by 5,000 union street car men is not considered unlikely.

The National Textile Union

Sectarian Policy Hindering Organization

At the present time with the exception of New Bedford, where several thousand workers are members, the National Textile Workers Union is almost completely isolated from the textile workers. In the South the N. T. W. has continued to lose ground since the end of the Gastonia strike so that now it has practically no organized base to speak of. The N. T. W. leadership and the official Communist Party are responsible for this situation. After the end of the strike almost all of the union organizers were withdrawn from the South and no serious attempt made to bring the workers into the union. To cover its lack of real organizational activities the Party is now preparing to publish a weekly paper in the South. By itself, unless part of a campaign to unionize the workers, it is only a gesture for the records. Bombastic action and statements can never be substituted for the daily struggle and as soon as the Stalinists realize it, the better it will be for the future of the N. T. W.

Several weeks ago the Daily Worker was full of proclamations asserting that a strike of the Paterson silk workers would be called within several weeks. In fact, the International Labor Defense in its appeals for funds at that time included the coming Paterson strike as among the situations for which funds would be needed.

In the March 8 issue of the Militant we pointed out that to call a strike in Paterson at the present time without adequate preparations, would result in the strike being still-born. We urged that careful plans be made so that when the strike is called it can have a chance of being successful.

As typical centrists without any set policy, the Stalinist leadership of the Party and union have not only suddenly stopped all talk about the strike but have decided to end all organizational activities indefinitely. Thus we see a good example of what kind of "leadership" the union is giving the workers in the industries under the direction of such apparatus men as Clarence Miller, who is now the national secretary of the N. T. W.

Role of the Reactionaries

At first they were ready to call a strike without any preparations whatsoever; practically no mass meetings and almost no distribution of leaflets or other preparations. Suddenly a change is made: all "preparations" cease and the idea of a strike is entirely forgotten. It is this kind of misleadership that plays into the hands of such organizations as the Associated Silk Workers and the United Textile Workers Union.

In fact, while the N. T. W. union is standing still and not participating in the struggle to organize the workers, the United Textile Workers Union is making progress in its campaign of organization which, of course, in the long run will mean the betrayal of the workers. In the South, U. T. W. and American Federation of Labor organizers are touring the textile centers and making contacts with the workers who are ready to fight against the low wages, long hours and speed-up conditions. In almost every textile district of the South the U. T. W. and A. F. of L. have now a clear ground for their policy of betrayal due to the abandonment of the field by the N. T. W.

In New Bedford where the N. T. W. has its only organized base, it is slowly losing influence due to the sectarian policy of the Party and its selection of incompetent Stalinist apparatus men as union leaders. Although about 18,000 out of the 30,000 textile workers of the city are jobless, less than 3,000 workers attended the March 6 unemployment demonstration in that city. When one considers that more than 3,000 workers are members of the union in New Bedford, it is easy to see what a failure the demonstration was.

Need of Systematic Work in the Mills

At a time like this, when the workers should be flocking to the banner of the N. T. W., they are conspicuous by their absence. The reason is not difficult to find. Few parts of the country have been more plagued with Stalinist politics in the Union than New Bedford. Four union organizers within several months has resulted in many of the workers becoming disgusted. Then again, since the Party decided to completely forget about the united front tactics, the U. T. W. has succeeded in winning many workers through the Labor Party they organized in that city. After the 1928 sell-out by the U. T. W., the mass of the workers turned to the N. T. W. for leadership, but the actions of the Left wing union since then, (that is, in the "third period") has resulted in the influence of the union becoming weakened to such an extent that it is in danger to lose its last organized base to the Right wing organization.

Another example of lack of activity on the part of the N. T. W. is the present textile strike in Philadelphia, which is under U. T. W. leadership. While the Left wing organization is doing virtually nothing, the U. T. W. poses as the leaders of the workers, and undoubtedly will sell them out as the U. T. W. has done scores of times in the past.

The N. T. W. nationally is in a critical period of its existence. The next period will decide whether it will exist as a fighting, living force in the American labor movement or will become a rubber stamp for Stalinist politics, without any influence in the class struggle. The policy of choosing union organizers on their loyalty to Stalinism must end. (Russak, New Bedford; Kushinsky in Paterson; Miller as national secretary, etc.) Militant workers who accept the program of the N. T. W. and sincerely want to participate in the struggle must be given work in the organization. Less talk and more day by day work in the mills is necessary. Only on such a basis can the union be saved and become a factor in the labor movement.

Dynamite in «Dynamic» Detroit

DETROIT—(FM)—While city and county officials are trying to still the protests of the hungry jobless information indicates that in actual fact the number of unemployed is increasing.

The Briggs Mfg. Co., for example, advertised but a few weeks ago for 8,000 workers. The local press immediately seized the advantage to blazon to a hungry world "the return of prosperity". Prosperity returned—for three weeks. 5,000 men were hired. Three weeks later, 9,000 workers were laid off!

The office staff of the Cadillac Motor Car Co. has been severely reduced and further layoffs there are expected. Layoffs in the Packard office force are imminent. A salary slash has already gone into effect. Of the working force 30% were laid off several months ago. It is significant that when the layoff instructions were issued it was ordered that women be retained insofar as possible. They can do the work ever so much cheaper.

A local plant fired its whole force several weeks ago. Recently it opened up—and rehired its workers at 15 cents less per hour. In another concern the wages of the electricians have been cut three times within the last 60 days. "Were it only the unemployment problem we had to face it would not be so bad—but employers use the unemployed as a club wherewith to beat down the wages of the employed", commented our informant.

Hoover's Prosperity Racket Fades in Middle West

CHICAGO—(FP)—Politicians from Herbert Hoover—now dubbed the Great Stationary Engineer—down to the smallest me-too country editor may shout prosperity and recovery all they like but each section of the country has its impressive array of facts and seasoned judgements that give the shouting the lie. In the middle west a few symptoms may be set down to match those marshalled in other regions.

1. Bankruptcies of established banks, trust companies, real estate organizations and staple industries no longer excite attention. They are too common. Decision by corporations not to pay the regular dividends the next quarter scarcely rank as financial news.

2. On the labor side unions report unexampled unemployment. Chicago Typographical Local 16, one of the most steady-going in the country, states that there are at least 1,500 printers out of work in town.

3. In the farm belt similar conditions prevail. Speaking not to the public at large but to his own trade following the expert of the Produce Review, leading butter and egg trade weekly takes an undisguised rap at the Hoover prosperity patter, writing: "speculation as to future industrial conditions gives us nothing definite to tie to, but we do know that present conditions are not favorable AND WE SHOULD NOT BE MISLED BY POSITIVE STATEMENTS EMANATING FROM HIGH PLACES IN WASHINGTON that the near future will see unemployment passing. In many larger cities today there is much unemployment and our agricultural population is in many important states not prospering. We face such uncertainty that we feel sure conservatism will increase as reserves of storage eggs accumulate."

4. Railroads are laying off shop and maintenance men at a time when they should be taking on extras. Where layoffs are considered bad for public consumption they are disguised by 5-day week device that mean reduced weekly earnings per worker or by transfer of work from contract to railroad shops as has happened respectively with the Northwestern and the Baltimore & Ohio in this region.

5. Help Wanted ads are greatly reduced in number while the rush of applicants for positions open is unexampled since 1922. An ad for a $15 a week stenographer, hours 9 to 5 in a new downtown office building, brought 200 girls to the spot, stampeding the overwhelmed office manager.

ANTHRACITE MINERS HIT BY UNEMPLOYMENT

ASHLAND, Pa.—Reports to the United Mine Workers convention in Indianapolis by Sec. Thomas Kennedy that the anthracite is in a "healthy" condition is causing wide discussion in local unions of hard coal diggers. In Schuylkill valley, 35,000 miners have been rendered idle by the Reading Coal Co., in Lansford the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Co. has thrown 5,000 out of jobs; in the Lehigh valley a steadily mounting number are joining the army of the jobless.

Prospects indicate an extraordinarily slack summer.

The occupation of Haiti by the United States took place with its rapid expansion into the arena of the leading world imperialists. Haiti's favorable geographical location in the Caribbean Sea, as a naval base, and its strategic importance as an aid to the defense of the Panama Canal, along with its offensive possibilities against Great Britain, led to America's military and financial invasion and resultant control. This condition came about through the intense exploitation and persecution of the Haitian masses.

The present movement for Haitian independence is undoubtedly an expression of the current feelings of the masses. At present it is still weak in its outlook. With a bourgeois and liberal leadership the movement is so far led into channels of subservience to American dictates. The open revolt against the puppet president, Borno, and the intensity of the struggle of the masses, caused Hoover to form a commission with the object of "studying" the conditions. Realizing the revolutionary temper of the Haitians, the commission made a proposal for election of a temporary president to replace Borno, as if the removal of Borno would solve the problem of Haitian independence.

The newly elected president, Eugene Roy, a broker by profession, was elected under the supervision of both the leadership of the opposition and the United States in collaboration with Borno. However, Roy does not take office until May 15, when Borno's term expires. When Roy takes office, he is to continue as temporary president until next fall. Then legislative elections are held, and a new president seated by the deputies and senators. The further proposals of the commission for "gradual" removal of marines as a basis of permitting a slow solution to independence testify to the fact that Haitian independence, under the "good will" of the American capitalists, is just a guise with which to nullify the movement of the Haitian masses.

Election of Roy—A Sham

The election of Roy, as the temporary president, is the biggest farce in the commission's program. Roy, just as all his predecessors, will continue to serve the interests of the National City Bank of New York. Being a broker himself, this will not be a difficult task. The "eventual independence" of Haiti, given freely by the United States, is an illusion, handed down in order to quiet the discontent. It is easy to understand, in view of this, why the removal of the marines will be only a "gradual" process. The marines will be kept in Haiti in order to act as the sword of American capitalism. They will be there to protect the continued exploitation of the Haitian masses.

The present "solution" can only be a temporary one. American capitalism has only removed one puppet and replaced him by another. But this temporary "solution" while it may for the moment soften the discontent of the masses, can in the end only add fuel to the existing state of revolt in Haiti. The leadership of the masses have succeeded in misdirecting the movement into accepting the further dominance of "dollar diplomacy". Roy's election, and the maintenance of the marines, along with continued domination of U. S. capitalism will only bring further persecution and exploitation. The military dictatorship of the United States will lend fuel to the further growth of the revolutionary movement of the Haitian masses.

The struggle for independence must be accompanied with a decisive fight against American imperialism. It must be accompanied with a struggle against the military dictatorship by United States marines. This end however is not alone the struggle of the Haitian masses, but is likewise a task of the American working class who must join in the fight for Haitian independence, against the domination of Wall Street and the military occupation. —A.G.

The Shooting of Blumkin

STALIN'S STORY IN PROCESS OF PREPARATION

The protests and indignation of Communists and the masses of workers over the murder of Blumkin at the behest of Stalin will not down, despite evasions, lies and slanders by the Stalinist apparatus-men everywhere. Finally, after a period of silence, as we foresaw, the official Communist press found itself compelled to speak. The Daily Worker and the Communist in the United States became literally hysterical in their attempts to evade the issue of the murder of Bolsheviks by the Stalinist regime. Now the official Communist press in other countries also finds it necessary to "answer" to the questions and demands of the Communist Opposition. The conspiracy of silence is being broken.

Among those who have entered the lists in an endeavor to cover or lie about Stalin's dastardly act is the Rote Fahne of Vienna, which engages in controversy with the social-democratic press concerning Blumkin. It goes without saying that the social democracy could not let slip so exceptional an opportunity for refurbishing somewhat its tarnished reputation. The international party of Noske which is responsible for the death of Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg eagerly seizes hold of the assassination of an irreproachable revolutionist by the Stalinists. It is not this side of the affair which interests us at this moment.

Independently of the threats, the intrigues and the slander of the social democracy the question poses itself in this fashion to each revolutionary: Is it true that Stalin had comrade Blumkin shot because he visited Trotsky at Constantinople and attempted to turn over a letter to some fighting comrades in Moscow? If this is true, what must we call him who debauches Communism by such acts? This is the question of importance. One cannot help seeing, for a single instance what a blow such a bloody crime can strike at the revolutionary prestige of the Soviet power—not among the thousands of bourgeois, "or sympathetic intellectuals", or lawyers, or newspaper men, or writers who so nobly visit the fringes of the Soviets for the celebrations and take in its harbors—but among the genuine revolutionary workers. This is why the question of Blumkin must be completely cleared up.

Running Away from the Facts

What has the Rote Fahne to say about the actuality of the facts? It brands the information concerning the murder of Blumkin as "an absolute fabrication which any fool could shatter". This looks like a categorical denial and we would be entirely ready to congratulate ourselves on the firm and categorical tone of the Rote Fahne; indeed, the fact in itself appears so horrifying that the first reaction of every revolutionary is to refuse to believe it, to deny it and brand it as slander.

Unfortunately the denial, like the hysteria, slander and evasions of the Daily Worker becomes far less categorical further on. And this is not accidental. The Rote Fahne has reacted only on the 19th of February, that is, about six weeks after the news had penetrated not only the bourgeois and social democratic press but had been posed as a direct question in the press of the Communist Opposition. Nevertheless, after so categorical an introduction, the Rote Fahne imperceptibly replaces this in the following lines with a statement that the falsehood would consist in that Blumkin had been shot "only for having been a Trotskyist, that mythical Blumkin". This stealthy shift of emphasis would look like a journalistic precaution which divests its denial of its whole moral value. The Vienna Stalinist newspaper leaves two doors open: for the categorical denial of the fact itself concerning the murder of Blumkin by Stalin, or for an admission of the fact itself concerning the murder of Blumkin by Stalin, or for an admission of the fact but literally on a day that has not yet been decided upon.

Why has the Rote Fahne referred to Blumkin as "mythical", like the Daily Worker's "Who is Blumkin?" and what is the meaning of this shamefully cynical shift? Is it because the Rote

Fahne raises doubts concerning the existence of Blumkin (that is, concerning his past existence)? Is it because the Rote Fahne raises doubts about Blumkin having been an irreproachable revolutionist who on many occasions showed an exceptional courage and heroic devotion to the proletariat? Or do its doubts concern only the execution because of Trotsky's letter? This does not follow clearly from the article. This lack of clearness is entirely deliberate. The Rote Fahne is simply waiting for the version which Stalin will choose to give as the final one.

Stalin Prepares His Story

Between times, the latter has long since prepared his version. The rumor has been circulated in several Soviet papers that "Trotskyites" in Siberia have sabotaged the transport of troops against Chiang Kai-Shek, and have derailed locomotives, etc. This is now Stalin's third attempt to connect the Opposition with counter-revolutionists. The first two were knocked to pieces, to their shame; the third will also be knocked to pieces. And if Stalin is still determined to renew his invisible miserable effort, it is only because he needs some story to cover up the assassination of comrade Blumkin.

The Rote Fahne ends its article with a panegyric on Stalin as the chosen disciple of Lenin. We know that similar panegyrics in all Parties are now the sine qua non conditions for maintaining one's position: of editor, secretary, people's commissar, or of president of the Comintern. But even so we find that the editor of the Rote Fahne links up quite imprudently the question of Blumkin with Stalin's character and his relations with Lenin.

It is a fact that Lenin was hostile to the nomination of Stalin as secretary. He expressed his fear that "this cook will serve us a peppery dish". Naturally, in 1921 Lenin could not yet foresee such well-seasoned dishes as the murder of Blumkin. It is also a fact that in Lenin's Testament to the Party, Lenin pointed out Stalin's disloyalty, his tendency to abuse power, and recommended that Stalin be retired from his important post. Another fact is that immediately after the Testament—March 6th, 1923—Lenin in a letter broke all personal relations with Stalin for his disloyalty and crimes.

The Dictatorship of Stalin and its Consequences

This was the state of affairs seven years ago, when the position of secretary of the Communist Party had a strictly subordinate importance and when all power rested in the Political Bureau directed by Lenin. Now the situation is radically changed. The domination of the apparatus has become a personal dictatorship of Stalin. The role of the public opinion of the Party is one hundred-times less. Stalin's disloyalty has revealed itself armed with unheard of practices and directed against its own Party. The Blumkin affair uncovers this new position with frightful force.

Yes, the assassination of Blumkin will be utilized by the class enemies and above all by the Socialists. But who is to blame? Those who have engendered this odious affair, that is, the murder of Blumkin. The Stalinists could not have failed to understand what are the consequences of such a crime. They could not have failed to understand that the Opposition would not keep silent. Because to keep silent would mean to unchain the Stalinist bureaucracy and to prepare tens and hundreds of affairs similar to the Blumkin case.

That is why we declare to the official editors, to the secretaries and functionaries—the Posters, Minors, Bedachts and even the small Browners: "We shall not permit you to evade a reply by covering yourselves with a polemic on the bourgeois journalists and social democrats and popes. We shall compel you to render an accounting before the workers of what has happened. We shall compel you to answer the question: 'Do you take the responsibility for the murder of the Bolshevik Blumkin? Yes or No?'" burg Cabmen's strike, Aberle Mill strike in Philadelphia, etc) are to be noted the defensive but militant struggles by the rank and file of the workers against the bosses.

In view of the acuteness of the industrial situation generally and mass unemployment particularly and the rising distress and discontent among the masses, bourgeois politicians, and now also the socialists and the A. F. of L. fakers, in New York, have been forced to take note of the situation and to propose "remedies". Theirs is the role of lightning rods to divert the discontent of the masses into harmless (to the bosses and to the reformist and labor fakers) channels. These socialists and fakers have access to and contact with the bosses and governmental agencies, which permit them to gain publicity for their proposals. Without direct pressure from the Left wing and the Communists, they feel free to betray the interests of the workers. The Emergency Conference on Unemployment, representing the Socialists and the A. F. of L. unions in New York has proposed, as one of its "solutions" to unemployment, that the Police Department (!) shall conduct a census as to the number of persons out of work. This is indeed touching, if it were not tragic and disgusting.

Socialists Propose Unemployment Census by Police

The reformists and labor fakers are willing to turn over the unemployed into the gentle hands of the soft-spoken Whalen. This same Police Department, under Whalen's direction and O. K'd by Mayor James Walker, beats the unemployed, provokes riots at unemployed demonstrations, acknowledges the use of spies among labor organizations and use of the blacklist to deprive workers of their livelihood, is to be "the census-taker of the unemployed!" In brief, by the approval of the socialists and labor fakers, the Police Department is to be permitted to bully and spy and lie about the unemployed situation and then to report to the bosses what they are told to say.

To divert attention from the situation of mass unemployment, the repressive measures against the Left wing and Communists are continued and intensified. In New York parents of children who attended the March 6th unemployment demonstration were sentenced to a day in jail for permitting their children to solidarize with the unemployed. A Young Pioneer has been given the vicious sentence of five years in the reformatory. Communist leaders of the unemployed in New York appear for trial on April 11th on charges of felonious assault and provoking an unlawful assembly on March 6th. A jury trial, which the defendants requested, was not granted. The United States Department of Labor has approved the method of spying, blacklisting and brutality against the workers.

Repressives Acts Against Workers Don't Solve Unemployment Crisis

But these repressive measures cannot do away with the fact that American capitalism is unable to solve the unemployment problem, and that more and more numbers of workers are beginning to question the "benefits" of capitalist society. The only possible solution of unemployment and capitalism's other ills lies in the struggle for the abolition of capitalism and its replacement by a government of the workers. This is the important lesson that is being taught by the Communists in the unemployed situation. At the same time, the Communists propose as the only workable immediate measures to relieve the acute condition of unemployment: Work or Compensation to be provided for by the bosses and the government; a decrease in working hours to allow for more men to be employed; elimination of the speed-up system that breeds unemployment, etc.

The official Communist Party, unfortunately, still continues a policy that iso-

SUFFERING AMONG JOBLESS GROWS

WASHINGTON—(FP)—Suffering from unemployment among factory workers in New York state has grown rapidly worse, so that in the past six weeks there has been a 200% increase in the number of families who have been given outdoor relief by organized charities, Miss Frances Perkins, state industrial commissioner, told the Senate committee on commerce, March 21.

The families thus driven to ask aid from organized charity, the commissioner explained, were those normally supported by the wages of their own members. A survey of one-third of the factory workers in the state she said, showed that 9% reduction in jobs had taken place since Oct. 4 last. This would make a total of 135,000 factory workers in this one state join the army of the unemployed since the beginning of October. In the building trades the suffering was even worse, while the "white collar" workers, including the clerical and sales people were likewise suffering acutely. Employment conditions are worse today, she declared, than at any time since 1914.

What makes the general economic situation for the workers more serious, Miss Perkins told the committee, is that those who are employed are by no means all working full time. Hence the totals for the unemployed do not tell the whole story of suffering.

Couzens and Hiram Johnson asked her view of unemployment insurance. The commissioner replied that her staff was engaged in a study of the matter. Government insurance against unemployment, compulsory on the employers, she said, is strongly opposed by many employers "and taxpayers."

John B. Andrews of the American Association for Labor Legislation recited the history of Congress' failure to act on planned unemployment relief since 1914. He testified that unemployment conditions in the region of New York City are the worst since 1914.

lates it more and more from genuine mass contact. It has failed to date to make proposals for a united front of all labor organizations on the issue of unemployment, and thereby plays into the hands of the socialists and labor fakers who are now stepping into the situation with their false and betraying proposals.

The Communist party has substituted a policy of mass meetings and demonstrations, coupled with gross exaggeration and self-praise of its achievements, very much like in the days of Lovestone, for a policy of systematic education and organization of the unemployed, linked with the employed and the organized and unorganized. It is this policy which makes of the March 29th National Unemployment conference in New York only a caricature of what it should and could be. Preparations are indeed "rushed" as the Daily Worker reports; but preparations which could have made the gathering a really representative one of delegates from various labor organizations and all sections of labor have not been made. Thereby the March 29th conference dooms itself to a talkfest.

It is still necessary that the Communist Party shall change its course if there is to be a mobilization of the widest possible number of workers and organizations for the relief of the unemployed. We have stated this before and shall continue to do so until the sectarianism of the present party leadership is rooted out and done away with. The opportunity is yet here for a broad united front movement for the unemployed.

The Communist Party is letting golden opportunities slip by to reach and hold large numbers of workers with the Communist message on unemployment and for the cause of Communism, the only true salvation for the working masses. We urge again: for the interests of the unemployed; for the adequate defense of the arrested workers; for the struggle against capitalism; for Communism—the Party must change its course and unite, first of all, all Communist forces as a preliminary basis for a broad struggle against unemployment and capitalism. —M. An Open Letter to All Members of the Leninbund

Esteemed Comrades:

by L. D. TROTSKY

It is perfectly clear from the circular dated January 29, 1930 published by the Leninbund, that the conference of the Leninbund scheduled for February 23 has for its task the formal sanctioning of the conflict, by the exclusion of the Marxist Opposition. The bureau of the Leninbund itself defined the task in this manner.

I leave aside completely all personalities and all disputes and recriminations relative to the organization itself. These, naturally, are of certain significance in the life of the organization. Nevertheless, they cannot decide the question of unity or splitting of the party; this question must be solved by the interaction of differences in principle, theoretical and political. It is not always, nor under all circumstances, that unity within the organization must remain inviolate. In cases where the differences assume a fundamental character, a split at times appears to be the only solution possible. But care must be taken that this be a genuine split, i. e., that it should not depart from the line of differences in principle and that this line is brought clean-cut before the eyes of all the members of the organization.

Leaving this angle, it is necessary to say that the circular letter of the bureau of the Leninbund of the 20th and 29th of January cannot but better prepare the ground for a split through proceeding in the most dangerous and pernicious manner to place in the foreground the question of disagreement, while distorting the sense of the differences in principle by means of false information. This I shall attempt to prove.

Has the Urbahns Faction Any Adherents?

The point of departure in the present differences is that of the class character of the Soviet Union. This question is not national but international. No revolutionary organization exists or can exist which has not reached a conclusion for itself on this question, and which has not drawn the necessary "internal" conclusions therefrom. It is impossible to have a correct national policy without a solution of this international question.

The bureau of the Leninbund claims in its circular that Urbahns' point of view on "the class character of the Soviet Union" is adhered to by the following organizations: "the majority of the Belgian opposition, the Treint group and 'Contre le Courant' in France, the Czech group, and to a large extent by the American opposition."

This false allegation, counting on the lack of information among the membership of the Leninbund, is made with the intention of leading them into a serious error. Any local organization of the Leninbund can easily obtain the proper information by merely writing to the above-named groups.

The bureau of the Belgian opposition has published several erroneous articles on the subject of the Chinese-Eastern Railway. It has, nevertheless, determinedly broken with the bureau of the Leninbund on everything relating to the class character of the Soviet Union. This makes it quite proper for us to look upon the error of the Brussels comrades as of an individual and episodic character. Similar errors are inevitable in the course of carrying on work. To break because of these individual errors would be absolutely criminal. But a break becomes inevitable when the deviations give rise to an orientation false in principle. An irreconcilable difference exists between the bureau of the Leninbund and that of the Belgian opposition on the question of the class character of the Soviet Union. Communicate with Brussels, comrades, and be convinced.

As far as fundamental questions are concerned, two French groups—Treint and "Centre Le Courant"—ranged themselves from the very beginning, at least formally, on the side of the Russian Opposition. I know of no document which would lead one to believe that they were ever at one with Urbahns on the question of the class character of the Soviet Union. Is it possible that they have changed their opinions of late? I do not know. In any case, you would render a great service not only to yourselves but also to the Treint and Paz groups by asking for their attitude towards the class character of the Soviet Union at the present time, February, 1930.

By the term "Czech group", the circular plainly refers to a small group of Prague students having, as I understand, no connection with the working-class movement. This group does not maintain a publication. Judging from its physiognomy, I would say that this group does, in truth, share Urbahns' point of view.

But what is unquestionably pure invention, is the assertion in the circular concerning the American Opposition. From the evidence of the Militant, the group's weekly paper and one of the best among the organs of the Communist press, the Communist League of America has nothing in common with Urbahns' point of view.

Hence, as far as the question of basic differences is concerned—aside from the small group of Prague students—the bureau of the Leninbund is completely isolated. And why be surprised? Urbahns, in developing and aggravating his error in his recent articles, gives us a new theory of the state which, in general, has nothing in common with the Marxian theory and which is distinguished from social-democratic theory only by its phraseology.

Do Not Forget the International Opposition

The two circulars attempt to define the attitude of the Opposition in the following manner: "Whoever does not share comrade Trotsky's opinions is not opposed to Leninism." They are driven to this infamous subterfuge as a means of alleviating the isolation of the Leninbund bureau. And why does Urbahns speak of "Comrade Trotsky's opinions"? The Russian Opposition has a platform established through the direct participation of hundreds of comrades. For defending this platform, thousands of comrades have been subjected to expulsion, to arrest, to deportation, and even to being shot. So to speak here of the personal opinions of comrade Trotsky is proof of a revolting disregard and disrespect toward the Russian Opposition.

The Leninbund Bureau persistently fails to take note of the Verite group in France, which maintains a political weekly and a monthly theoretical journal, La Lutte des Classes. He is blind who does not understand that this group is today the pivot around which is united the Communist Opposition in France.

The Communist League of America represents one of the best sections of the Opposition and is growing daily. The Leninbund bureau does not seem to realize this. Regarding the Belgian Opposition, there is no doubt that despite the disputes that have arisen in its midst, it will not hesitate for an instant in choosing between the International Opposition and the Urbahns group. The Leninbund bureau shuts its eyes to facts and lulls itself, as well as others, with vain hopes.

The Czech Left Opposition (comrade Leonorovitch's group) which carries on activity among the workers, and is about to start editing its journal, shares the point of view of the International Opposition on all fundamental questions.

The Chinese Opposition is no less irreconcilable with the opinions of Urbahns.

Lastly, the Leninbund bureau has no reason to expect any support whatever from the Opposition in Italy, Spain, Hungary, etc.

Even if the Leninbund bureau could hope to derive support from any foreign groups, it is only—and then only to a certain extent—from the groups represented by Treint and Paz. And yet, have they achieved an agreement in principle on any question whatever? Let them tell us openly.

The Urbahns Bloct Treint and Paz

Urbahns is the adherent of an independent party. This is his dominant idea. Treint and Paz up till now have been against this. Have they arrived at an agreement at the present time? And on precisely what point?

Urbahns has again put up his "independent" candidates in the municipal elections against the candidates of the Communist Party. With what result?—the continued weakening of the Leninbund. With Urbahns this suicidal policy is motivated by the idea of creating a second party. Are Treint and Paz of the same mind? Let them declare themselves. Or perhaps these internationalists are not interested in German affairs.

And how does this bear on the unions? Paz is for autonomy in the unions, but—differing from Monatte—does not deny the need for a Communist Party. This is an old Jauresist attitude, diplomatic and opportunist to the core; an attitude which Marxists have never stopped attacking and which they will always continue to attack mercilessly in the future. Does Urbahns ally himself with the party of trade union autonomy, in this Jauresist sense? Or does he think that French affairs do not concern him?

Will Treint and Paz work with Urbahns and with the Brandler blocs formed in the midst of the trade unions, against the Communist Party? or perhaps Treint and Paz believe that they are not interested in affairs at Hamburg?

In what light does Urbahns look at Paz's touching romance with the national "communists" of Alsace? Or does Urbahns consider it not worth his while to be interested in Alsace since its cession to France?

Let us see, then—what is the particular point on which these three groups could manage to agree? It is only on the point of the struggle against the Russian Opposition. All three have censured Rakovsky's declaration. Indeed, they are too revolutionary for such "compromises". There are good grounds for thinking so. They recognize the policy of a united front with the social democracy, with the reformist trade unions, with the Brandlerites, with the Alsatian nationalists—but they consider inadmissible the united front tactic with the official Communist Parties. The fact is that if we examine, not from a fanciful or demagogic, but from a political point of view, Rakovsky's declaration, it is seen to represent nothing but the Opposition's policy of a united front toward the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

Urbahns' attitude in this question is again explained by his orientation on a second party. But how are we to explain the attitude of Treint and Paz? There is no explanation—except the confusion and complete absence of principles in their thinking.

In a word, their thoughts, without exception, consist only of reticences, diplomacy, ambiguities and quibbling. The new allies do not dare to approach any question seriously and in earnest, fearing that the structure of this newly-concluded amalgamation, built on sand, will start tottering. This is adventurism in ideas. It has never been successful—and never will be.

It is Indispensable to Obtain Unity of the Opposition

Several months ago, the bureau of the Leninbund expelled comrades Grylevitch and Joko—defenders of the opinions of the International Opposition. This gesture alone is enough to show that the Urbahns group has no desire to work hand in hand with the International Opposition. It is unmistakably clear that we cannot admit two sets of opinions; one of them for our own particular use, and the other—for the world. This duality is and always has been the characteristic trait of opportunists, especially of the Brandlerites. Their "internationalism" is, as everyone knows, nothing but the arithmetical sum of national oppositions added together. With this we have nothing in common. Our international orientation and our national policy are bound together by unbreakable ties.

From its first steps, the Opposition must clearly declare itself as an international fraction—as did the Communist parties in the period of the publication of the Communist Manifesto or of the First International, or of the Left Zimmerwald at the beginning of the war. In all these cases the groups were mostly small numerically, or even isolated individuals: all, nevertheless, conducted themselves as though representing an entire international organization. In the epoch of imperialism, a similar attitude imposes itself a hundred times more categorically than in the time of Marx.

Whoever imagines that the International Left will at a given time be reduced to the simple expression of the national groups added together, and that for this reason the formation of its international unity can be delayed until the national groups feel themselves "strengthened"—attributes only a secondary importance to the international factor and, by this very means, lands on the road of national opportunism.

It is undeniable that each country has its characteristic traits which may be very important in themselves; but in our epoch their true value cannot be estimated nor can they be made useful to the revolutionary cause except when looked at from an international point of view. But only international organization can represent international ideology.

Can anyone seriously believe it possible that these isolated opposition groups, abandoned and left to their own efforts, should find the right road? No. Their road will be one that will lead them direct to degeneracy, sectarianism, in short, to their doom. In order to attain its aims, the International Opposition must surmount enormous difficulties. It is only by being indissolubly bound together, by working out together the answers to the questions of the hour, by creating an international platform, by imposing on ourselves the reciprocal verification of each step; in a word, it is only by uniting in a single international entity, that the national opposition groups can carry through to the end their historic task.

This applies to all groups without exception, and above all to the Russian Opposition. The year which has just passed is a year of capitulations, large sections of the Russian Opposition have been infected by this epidemic, and this happened only because of their isolation from other opposition groups in foreign countries; because they were not present at and did not know the life of the Communist International; in general because they had not reflected well on the problems before it. It is because of this that they allowed themselves to be made ridiculous by the Stalinist left zig-zags on internal question in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

True and False Internationalism

The Left Opposition has already lost enough time. The disastrous development of the Leninbund, the errors of certain national groups, the marking time of others, have been due to the powerful, even decisive, role played by the national isolation of the groups and their simplistic methods of political activity. If the Communist Left Opposition does not wish an inglorious end, its reduction to zero, it must cast away from itself these tendencies of expectation and consolidate its international ranks.

The Brandlerites pride themselves on not having connections with any Russian groups. What does this mean? A revolutionary organization which is not in agree-

Throughout the World of Labor

Conditions of the German Workers and the Communists

Berlin

The past few weeks have evidenced new surges in the unemployment wave. Each month adds at least 40,000 new recruits to the army of the jobless. But the work is still in the stage of ascent and has not at all reached its high point as yet. No one has any illusions about this. Quite the contrary:

The statistical publication of the Institut für Konjunkturforschung reckons with an enormous growth of unemployment in the spring, due to the matriculation and introduction into industry of about half a million young workers, apprentices. This is aside from the regular conjunctural increases (seasonal, etc.). It adds: that in order to keep unemployment from becoming menacingly critical, Germany would have to increase its exports at the present rate of 100 million Reichsmarks per month. Which looks quite impossible at present.

Another issue of the same periodical reports a semi-monthly decrease of .1% in the consumption of nourishing foods among the working class population. When we keep in mind the recent fall of prices in eggs, milk, butter, meat, "colonial wares" (cocoa, etc.) and in food products in general, we can realize the importance of even such a "harmless" figure to its full extent.

Unemployment, and the reduction of maintenance for the unemployed (Hilferding only prepared the ground for a steady procedure towards the liquidation of the maintenance) in direct proportion to each other and—inversely with food consumption. Three million unemployed—with their families this means: nine million beings on starvation rations. This means the most gruesome misery for one-seventh of the population, a fate that awaits millions more in the period to come.

Bourgeoisie on the Offensive

So entrenched has the ruling class become with the aid of their reformist lackeys, that it has resolved to discard them completely from their employ in politics and to subjugate them completely in their service as trade union agents. The bourgeoisie are out for the whole booty. In a recent number of its official organ, the Arbeitsgeber, it demands of the A.D.G.B. leaders, half in threat, half in entreaty, full subordination. It demands that the reformist bureaucracy surrender the "American" theory that high wages bring prosperity; it demands of them (who have shown such concern for the "recuperation" of "German" industry, for the promotion of the "national" export trade, etc.) a promise not to ask for a wage increase when most of the wage-agreements in the metal and textile industries terminate (in the spring and fall of this year). Because, they entreat: all the benefits that you and we, in our concentrated efforts to "unburden industry" by recoiling from all mention of industrial increases, by stuffing the Young plan obligations upon the "broad" shoulders of the proletariat—because, all this noble work which we have accomplished for the "national weal"—will be spoiled by such a demand.

Social Democrats Continue to Sell Out Workers

And they hold up the shining example of sacrifice that Bill Green and the other darlings of the American bourgeoisie made for the "common good", when these A. F. of L. fakers, in the now famous conference with Hoover and the bosses, promised not to "annoy" the latter with similar demands in "the period of national crisis".

The reformists will capitulate here too—according to precedent. For the ultimate good of their economic philosophy is the accumulation of capital for the promotion of the export trade and the capitalist import. No sacrifice, no working class sacrifice, is too great for these reptiles who still have the audacity to call themselves representatives of the workers. (In their zeal for betrayal they are far to the Right of even some bourgeois liberals, like the well-known economist, Prof. Bernhard, who sees a solution to the capitalists' troubles in price sinking in the domestic market, in place of what he calls wasteful dumping on the foreign market.) The main things for them are the government posts and their salaries. For the sake of these, everything else will be surrendered. Amsterdam and the A. D. G. B. have moved so far in the direction of Mathew Woll, that it becomes really difficult to find the least distinction between them. Each delivers the goods to the national bosses. Each according to the local needs.

The Attacks on the Workers' Organizations

Naturally, the economic offensive of the bosses is only the axis of an offensive all along the line. While the unemployed are being robbed of their last support, the bourgeoisie are feverishly arming the soldiers of civil war, the police. The state budget "cannot" meet its slightest obligations to the starving, but it can and does proportion enormous sums for the equipment of churches and for every other means of strangling the working class. But the hungry masses can't and won't let themselves be intimidated by the black-jacks of the police, by lead balls, or by horses' hoofs. There is a limit to silent suffering.

The bosses and their social-democratic police sergeants think that by slandering the Soviet Union, that by jailing the editors of the militant labor press, that by dissolving the proletarian defense organizations and by driving the leader of the working class, the Communist Party, underground, they will stifle the angry protest of the hungry nine millions. They will be sadly disappointed.

The party, overpowered and made impotent by its hazardous course of empty phrases, is struggling to disentangle itself from the self-imposed shackles. It is having a very hard time. It has lost many positions in the trade unions; a rebellion has spread among its own functionaries.

The Opportunism of the Brandlerites

Now that the militant spirit of solidarity has really impregnated a broad layer of workers and unemployed, with and without the aid of the Party, the Brandlerites are very reticent with "positive proposals" for action, of which they usually have their mouths full. The 6th of March they don't consider worth noticing. Instead of making any move for a united front (desired or not) with the Party, to exploit the favorable situation for immediate action, the programists, the apostles of "mass work", are concentrating all their attention to win the trade union rebels of the Party for their factional platform. Their "emergency program" is an opportunist piece of work. It appeals for a broad proletarian defensive struggle, for immediate demands for relief and unburdening of the masses. Very good. But it does not point out a single guiding principle, by which the social democratic, Catholic workers can find their way after the experiences of the impending struggles, into the red front of the proletarian revolution, into the ranks of the Communists.

The Need For a Clear Left Communist Opposition

The Communist Party is in agony. The leaders are helpless. They have shown themselves as pitifully incompetent as theoreticians and, consequently, as organizers. A strong left opposition, clear in principles, homogeneous in its own ranks, equipped with a real bolshevik platform and an unequivocal attitude toward the role of the Party, could fill a burning need in Germany at present. The masses are ready to begin the struggle, which is to mold them into a solid phalanx against the tottering capitalist order.

The Labor Movement In South Africa

No doubt its contents will prove of interest to our readers, besides giving further evidence that the Opposition is making its way into every section of the world.—Ed.)

The Militant

I was indeed glad to get your letter of the 18th. January, and more particularly the copies of the Militant.

It will also interest you to know that I was a member of the Communist Party (South African section of the Communist International) of which I was a foundation member. The section was formed in 1921, and for many years prior to that I was an active member and official of the Industrial Socialist League which afterwards became the Cape Town branch of the Communist Party. In the Communist Party I held at various times the respective positions of Treasurer, Assistant Secretary and Acting Editor of the party organ, whilst for several years in succession I was a member of the Central Executive. In addition I was for many years secretary of a large trade union (Witwatersrand Tailors' Association) and treasurer and executive member of the South African Trade Union Congress (an exclusively European body, excluding native workers from membership) which posts I relinquished over two years ago.

The cause which led to the severance of my connection with the Communist Party was the newly-adopted policy of "An Independent Native Republic, with autonomy for national minorities" (meaning the whites mainly) was one to which I was unable to subscribe. In the circumstances it seemed to me to be a gross departure from the principles of Marxism and Leninism. Let me give you a brief outline of the position in South Africa.

The Working Class in South Africa

Our working class is divided on racial lines—Europeans and non-Europeans. The hostility of each of these sections towards the other has been born of their relative positions of superiority and inferiority in every sphere. This hostility has been aggravated by discriminatory laws and more particularly by the action of the Europeans in maintaining a rigid "color bar". Most of the natives are disenfranchised, they are made to carry "passes" (licenses to be abroad), are subjected to gross ill-treatment and brutality. The native who attains high educational standards is no less contemptuously treated on that account. Europeans refuse to work with natives on certain (skilled or semi-skilled) jobs and they debar them from entering their trade unions (the natives have now commenced organising their own trade unions).

The white population of the Union of South Africa is approximately 1 3-4 millions; the native approximately 6 millions. The majority of the native workers are agricultural laborers, whilst those whom the development of industry has driven to the towns are engaged in unskilled occupations. The key positions in industry, commerce and communications are held by white workers. On the average natives' wages are about one quarter of what the whites earn. Needless to remark, the comparatively high wages of the whites in the town are possible because of the very low wage-standards of the native workers—a parallel position with that of British and Indian workers before the war. Capitalism uses the bribe of high wages to retain the loyalty of the whites who can in the circumstances be relied upon to police the mass of discontented under-paid natives.

The artificial color-bar raised by the whites has for some time shown signs of relaxing. It has been found that measures such as these do not stem the advancing tide of the cheap native worker. Europeans' wage standards were definitely endangered when by a court decision, the color-bar in the gold-mining industry, which debarred natives from skilled occupations, was declared ultra vires the constitution and upset. The European workers then lent readier ear to the message of the Communist Party, bidding them assist, if for no higher motive than self-interest, the native to secure higher wages and thus eliminate competition based on differing wage-standards. The legal color-bar, having gone by the board it was natural that the rest should follow. The Communist slogan: "Workers of all lands, Unite!" found a more ready response among the whites. Some trade unions went the length of admitting non-Europeans to membership.

The Comintern Policy

Then came the Comintern's new slogan for South Africa: "An Independent Native Republic, with autonomy for racial minorities". The Europeans naturally asked: "Why a Native republic? Why not a Workers' and Peasants' Republic?—why is the white working class (a not insignificant part of the proletariat) contemptuously left out of the programme and relegated to a definite position of inferiority?" To these plain questions there has been no answer forthcoming. Within the C. P. these have been the effects of the new policy:

1. Racial animosity on the part of the native members towards the European members has grown and is developing to an almost incredible degree, the native members logically interpreting the slogan as implying superiority for themselves over the hated oppressor (white Communists are included here) and

2. Wholesale desertion of the white proletarian members who would not subscribe to the abandonment of the Marxian slogan "Workers of all lands, unite!" and its substitution by a black (native) chauvinism. Comrade S. P. Bunting, who attended the last world congress in Moscow was contemptuously dubbed a "Social Democrat" when he said that the white workers in South Africa must be taken into account in the framing of the programme. (These same comrades, Bunting and E. R. Roux, voted for Trotsky's expulsion from the Comintern against their own convictions on the matter.)

The above have been the effects within the Party of the new policy. Translate this to the wider field of the whole working class movement and it will be seen that the Party is now completely isolated from the white section of the proletariat—the most advanced, the most intelligent, the most class conscious, whilst the old racial antagonism has revived in active form. Many native workers have been won by the new policy, but at the price of the relinquishment of Marxism and the adoption of petty bourgeois slogans.

It seems to me that the Marxist-Leninist structure of the Comintern has been dangerously undermined, its fundamental principles thrown overboard. For freedom of discussion in the Party ranks has been substituted a so-called discipline which requires as the only virtues in a Communist ability to speak heatedly of the "errors of Trotskyism" and preparedness to sacrifice good comrades to the fetish of the "third period". Healthy inner-Party criticism is dead (Shades of Lenin!). Loyalty to Stalin and Co. is the supremem virtue.

There are adherents of the Opposition in this country. But we are all scattered. We are, nevertheless, much interested in what is going on in other countries and I welcome the receipt of your paper and will be glad to hear from you from time to time.

With comradely good wishes,

Fraternally yours,

C. FRANK GLASS

The Labor Party and the Tasks of the Communists

By ARNE SWABECK

With ever increasing signs of deep-going changes facing the American workers, which are partly already beginning, it is of the utmost importance to recognize the present actual level of development to be able to prepare correctly for the next steps. Proceeding from that point it becomes clear that the movement toward a conscious class position will of necessity first pass some stages of rather elementary expression. Will the reformist labor party stage be one, and if so what should be the attitude of revolutionists?

The practically complete allegiance of the workers, in so far as they give any political expression, to the capitalist parties has almost become proverbial in the United States. There is no reason further to elaborate on this, except to add that particularly here parliamentary elections can only be a partial indication of working class sentiments. But in the field of economic organization there is no less backwardness shown by the vast number of workers in the manufacturing and basic industries. They are almost entirely unorganized. The Handbook of American Trade Unions claims a total membership today in all unions of 4, 331, 251. It was never higher at the peak figures in 1920 than 5, 110, 800, thus clearly informing us that the great majority of the working class have not had experience in any kind of unionism. Here we must also record the fact that within these unions there is today practically no organized left wing in existence.

Status of the New Unions

Would it be correct to say that these unorganized workers are ready for organization but have been denied the opportunity because of the reactionary and craft ideology of the present unions? Undoubtedly that is so in the case of a good many thousands; but one must not lose sight of realities. Nowhere have the workers as yet begun in the unorganized industries to move toward elementary forms of shop organizations.

How does the case then stand with the new industrial unions sponsored by the Trade Union Unity League? Healthy growth here would naturally be a very strong indication of rapid ideological advancement of the working class. Unfortunately that is not so. These unions have remained at a very small membership and although the future holds good possibilities if correct policies are formulated for their function, the fact remains that a swing toward mass support for the new unions cannot yet be recorded.

There are other means of gauging working class development, for instance, through its press. However, compared to the capitalist dailies mounting into many millions of issues per day throughout the country the press representing labor is limited indeed. Its revolutionary section reaches only some thousands of readers. Many former labor papers of a somewhat progressive tinge have disappeared, sold out or exist as a shadow of their former strength.

The Labor Struggles in Recent Years

Perhaps, despite all these facts, the field of actual working class struggle by way of strikes, organized or unorganized, gives a different impression of the level of development. As yet, that cannot be said to be the case. While latest figures are not available it remains a well known fact that since 1922 the number of actual strikes and workers participating in them has shown a steady decline. Only, and that is important as a trend of recent events, there has been a healthy sign of militancy displayed in such strikes, as among the textile workers in Passaic, New Bedford, Gastonia and Marion; in the ill-fated Illinois miner's strike; in the New Orleans street carmen's strike and at present in the Pittsburgh taxicab strike and the Philadelphia Aberle mill strike.

This is how matters stand just now with the working class, the actual level from which changes will proceed; and they are not the conditions of pre-war America, but of today, under a highly developed capitalist imperialism. On the other hand, we note the extremely important beginnings of militancy—indicative for the future.

Nevertheless, all factors considered, the most elementary steps toward a class movement of the American workers are yet to be taken. The response given in several instances to the unemployment demonstrations on March 6th, led by Communists, although not yet signifying a conscious class basis, is however, one of the definite indications of the accelerating speed of developments in this present epoch.

But proceeding from the actual level of the working class organizationally, politically and ideologically, it is hardly possible that the political reformist stage can be avoided as a definite part of future developments. In the main European industrial countries this stage has assumed its definite place, embracing almost the entire working class and is in most instances yet at its height. The forces which will initiate and furnish leadership to it in this country can already be discerned.

Perspectives in the A. F. of L.

From the upper hierarchy of the A.F. of L. the mildest labor reformist movement has met decided opposition in the past. Its political policy is a natural reflex of its own position as part of the employers' industrial staff. This is important because of the strategic role of the organized section, even if relatively small in numbers, in the course of labor developments. But with a continued radicalization of the workers in general, the very pressure will be furnished from below which may easily strike a response among certain strata of the lower union officialdom and impel them forward to give leadership to a breakaway from the traditional two party system toward a labor party. More surely is this so since it will simultaneously afford the opportunity to ward off the masses, at least for a period, from any inclination toward the revolutionary movement, and to steer it into the safer channels of political reformism. Thus, such breakaways may become closely associated with a revolt against the policies and class collaboration practices of the A. F. of L. hierarchy. The miners' insurgent convention in Springfield, Ill., held March 10th, may be come one classical illustration of just such revolts. Although not yet a breakaway, still through the working class forces it sets into motion, it can become rich in potentialities. The radicalization already manifest, the beginning of a stir within the trade unions, all speeded on by the general critical conditions, present a seeming paradox:—defensive struggles, containing explosive material, with mass demonstrations and possibly open violent outbursts, yet politically only the reformist stage of a labor party approaches. Upon closer investigation, however, it will be seen that this seeming paradox is but an exact reflex of the dialectical process.

Some Labor Party History

It would hardly be an exaggeration to state that no issue has manifested so much confusion within the revolutionary movement during the last few years as has the labor party issue. In 1922, after a sharp struggle within the Workers Party, the correct conception of the possible growth of a labor party as an elementary expression of political development of the American workers and the duty of the Communists to function as a revolutionary factor in these developments, was adopted. But soon, digressions into adventurism and opportunism took the upper hand, making a caricature of a correct conception. The Communists, regardless of forces available and of the tempo of development, embarked upon the building of a labor party. It had its beginning in the August thesis, whose author was John Pepper. This thesis visualized each group within the labor movement—the Socialist party, the trade union group and the Communists with its own labor party. Two classes in one party, the farmer-labor party, became the accepted thing and from there it was just a short step to the formation of the Federated Farmer Labor party. As it never became a party in reality, the tide rapidly turned toward the fiction of the La Follette alliance. This fallacy became decisively exposed only after the direct intervention of comrade Trotsky, then not yet exiled from the Comintern.

But with the intensified Centrist struggle against the Russian Communist Opposition, headed by Trotsky, the rapidly Stalinized Comintern became intoxicated with these entirely false farmer-labor practices of the American Communists. This was best expressed in the report of the Comintern political secretary, comrade Kolaroff, to the Fifth Congress, running in part as follows:

"The small farmers in the United States have organized a farmer-labor party, which becomes constantly more and more radicalized, comes closer to the Communists and is saturated with the idea of the establishment of a farmer-labor government in the United States." (!!) (Pravda, July 6, 1924).

Nothing more and nothing less.

The Sectarian Party Policy

With the American party leadership the zig-zag still continued at dizzying speed. At the Cleveland T. U. U. L. convention last summer a most ridiculous resolution was adopted providing for the establishment of a labor party which would be against the left social democrats, the Muskettes, etc., where "no reformist elements could sneak into its ranks" (!!!). Finally the party leadership has adopted a standpoint rejecting any labor party perspective, while the Sixth Comintern Congress still adheres to one organized from below. But then, changes to the exact opposite are simple matters today under the Stalin leadership.

Of late, the labor party question has been discussed in the party press. Joseph Zack in articles in the December and January Communist, takes the position that reformism has already run its course in the United States through the period of the labor aristocracy organized in the A.F. of L., although not appearing here in the European clothes of a social-democratic or a labor party. He seems further to contend that while labor parties were possible in this country in the pre-monopolistic era, now, under monopoly capitalism, they are out of the question because of the sharpened class struggle. Of course, Zack has always shown aptitude in building up a series of arguments based upon seemingly perfect logic but entirely forgetting the dialectical process from which working class developments are not immune or separated.

It is somewhat different with the article of Max Bedacht in the December issue. He appears to recognize the correctness of the Party position arrived at in 1922 and subsequently approved at the Fourth Comintern congress. Remembering his sinful past as an important cog in the Lovestone-Pepper Right wing faction, and not underestimating the weakness of the flesh, he rushes in ahead of Zack and proclaims: "Me for the 'left' too". He discovers that now in the "third period" matters stand differently than way back in 1922. The "social fascist" Socialist party, the petty bourgeois liberals and the sections of the labor aristocracy bribed by imperialism, will be in the labor party too and hence he concludes:

"Under the present conditions, when the reality of the labor party does no longer represent independent political action of the working class (so!) but represents open imperialist policies under cover of an anti-imperialist firm, propaganda for a labor party can no longer represent propaganda for independent political action but becomes propaganda for an under cover instrument of imperialism.... My conclusion therefore is that it is impossible at this moment to use the labor party slogan and the labor party movement unqualifiedly in the campaign for the development of independent political action of the workers."

Role of Labor Fakery and Socialists

But was not already in 1922 the role of the Socialist party, petty bourgeois liberals, etc., not only indicated but appearing in all its maturity; if not here, then at least elsewhere? Was it not then clearly recognized that, although Socialist party leaders, labor fakery and labor party leaders will cunningly and violently betray the workers when the latter can no longer be fooled by reformist illusions, nevertheless the separation from the bondage of the capitalist parties would mean an important step forward for the workers? Was it not recognized that in that process the Communists must move with the masses and always endeavor to extend its revolutionary influence? Of course it was, although the "third period" had not yet been invented. But despite all this well-known history, Bedacht, by theoretical magic, constructs a jumping-off board designed to make the leap over the political reformist stage in one easy jump. That is to be the "political united front". An elegant expression, whatever it may mean. He solves it very simply by basing it upon the Communist nuclei in the factories. Unfortunately, this leap will most likely never get beyond the stage of their theoretical dreams and the penalty for such false conclusions spells further party isolation from the masses.

The conclusions and formulations of the Stalin bureaucracy would be more nearly correct if we were in an immediately revolutionary period. That is just the little thing which is yet missing.

The Labor Party—A Perspective

The correct way to put the question is that all indications and historical experiences indicate that the labor political reformist stage is quite unavoidable also in the United States, with possibilities of some form of a labor party; and that such must be our perspective. It will surely produce leaders as reactionary as those produced in any other country who will betray, and help imperialism butcher the workers, as well as endeavor to use the labor party for that very purpose. But despite these leaders, it will also help to set the masses into motion against their class enemy. The worker will suffer bitter disappointments and experience severe struggles both of a political and industrial character in the process. But with the present rapid developments, the reformist illusions will possibly be of a very short duration. Hence our conclusion is: The Communists must remain in the most intimate contact possible with the working masses in all their experiences and struggles in order to help draw the proper lessons and lead the fight against the reactionaries; to proudly unfurl the revolutionary banner of Communism through the labor reformist stage and through the labor party, from within and without; utilize all means most speedily to help elevate the American working class to its final revolutionary position.

MILWAUKEE COMMUNISTS APPEAL WORKHOUSE SENTENCES

MILWAUKEE—(FP)—Appealing from prison sentences for alleged rioting, 37 unemployed and their Communist leaders are demanding jury trials. The riot occurred March 6th when a Hearst reporter started a counter demonstration for the sake of a sensational story. Mounted Milwaukee police rode into the crowd in the best manner of veteran Pennsylvania Cossacks.

Unifying the Left Opposition

The Militant, in the issue of February 15th raised the question of the unification of the Left Opposition. In an article by Martin Abern entitled, "For an International Conference of the Left—the Need for Organizing the World Opposition", a number of concrete proposals were set forth to make possible such an international conference and unification. Simultaneously, La Verite, organ of the French Opposition, brought forward a number of proposals with a similar objective. The Russian Bulletin of the Opposition, official organ of the Russian Opposition (Bolshevik-Leninists) responded to the initiative of La Verite. The Militant is in accord with these propositions which sets the Left Opposition on the path of international organization and unification on a common principle basis. We reprint below the reply of the Russian Bulletin of the Opposition to La Verite.

* * *

The French Left Opposition which is grouped around La Verite has at the insistence of a number of organizations in other countries, taken the first step towards the international unification of the Left Communist Opposition.

The proposals stated in issue 24 can be summarized as follows:

1. It is necessary seriously to begin to prepare an international conference of the Left Opposition.

2. With that end in view, it is primarily necessary to create an international information bulletin.

3. The editorship of this bulletin must rest in a secretariat, especially created for this purpose.

Such a program may appear as too modest and prudent. We can certainly start by the creation of an international liaison bureau, to which would be joined the secretariat which edits the bulletin. We do not believe this question to be decisive. Of primary importance is—to start.

An International Organ

We can start with the secretariat and the bulletin for the purpose of creating, in conformity with the reactions of the different national organizations, a regular bureau for preparing for the conference. For this reason we support the proposal of La Verite, inasmuch as there can be no difference of opinion on the first step.

The editorial board of the Russian Bulletin, which is in permanent connection with the comrades in struggle in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, do not doubt for an instant that the more energetic and decisive is the initiative of the French comrades in this question, the warmer will be the support of the Russian Opposition.

The preparation of the conference is not purely an organizational step: it is primarily a political and theoretical task which may require several months.

It is not a question of a mechanical gathering of groups, even of small divergent groups, but of the unification of the international fraction whose inner homogeneity is verified in theory as well as in practice.

La Verite is right in stating that the pages of the Bulletin must be, within the frame of material and technical possibilities, open to all groups who adhere to the Left Communist Opposition. The Bulletin is an instrument (one of the instruments) in preparing for the conference. For its unification, the Opposition must proceed on a democratic course. This means that every Oppositionist must have the opportunity to be informed and to learn, with the aid of the Bulletin, about the ideas and actions of the other Left Opposition groups in order conscientiously and firmly to decide to whom he can rally. In other words, the Bulletin must serve as an instrument for unification on a clearcut principal basis.

Unity upon Principle Agreement

The German experiences of the last year are of exceptional importance to us in determining the course and perspective for the international unification of the Opposition. The policies of the Urbahns fractions have led to a split with the comrades who solidarize with the views of the Russian Opposition, La Verite, The Militant etc. This split took place before the eyes of the international Opposition as an outgrowth of a close ideological struggle which assumed, to a certain extent, an international character. The magnitude of the differences was confirmed by experience, and the two parties have drawn the necessary consequences for themselves. It is clear that an international conference which wishes to slight similar matters in the name of "unity" will be still-born.

The political Marxist "in one country" is as impossible as the construction of a socialist society "in one country". Any group which attempts to develop a political line confined to national questions is inevitably doomed to sectarian degeneracy. That is why we do not doubt that none of the truly revolutionary groups will remain aloof, but will adopt a clearcut position on all the controversial questions and will sustain the initiative of La Verite in the preparations of an International Conference.

It is extremely desirable that the first number of the Bulletin, whose publication can perhaps be assigned to La Verite, until the secretariat is formed, appear as soon as possible and that it contain the opinions of all the European Opposition groups, at least on the question of the conference. The replies from America, Asia, etc., can be published in the following number of the international Bulletin. That would be an important beginning.

CUBANS STRIKE

vail among the sugar plantation workers. Formerly assured six months' work, they are now lucky to get in three or four months. During the busy season, however, there is plenty of hard work—12 hours a day worked six hours on and six hours off. For this Cuban sugar plantation workers now get 40 cents a day, contrasted with 60 cents in 1928 and a figure of $4.00 in 1919. Sixty percent of the American capital of $1,250,000,000 invested in sugar. American sugar companies intensify the chronic unemployment on the island by importing Negro laborers—under slave terms—from Haiti and San Domingo. These are kept in semi-slavery compounds, guarded by troops and denied every civil liberty. The sugar workers' union was broken by Machado through force of arms in 1925. The president of the union, Enrique Varona was assassinated, as well as other union officials. The union has since functioned underground, and there have been several spontaneous strikes.

Wall Street Continues Cuban Penetration

In addition to the National City Bank of New York which has dominated Machado, the Chase National Bank of New York and the Cuban government has been negotiating for a loan of $30,000,000 to the latter at interest for a term of years. $40,000,000 of the amount would be used by the bank to liquidate bonds which it already has on hand from contractors, Warren Brothers of Boston and the Cuban Construction company for work already completed on the central highway. The other $40,000,000 was expected to be used to increase activities in a program of public works. It is not yet reported whether this contract which gives American capitalism another stranglehold on Cuba, has been signed, though it was expected to be done sometime in February.

The Government at Washington has not yet directly entered into the situation arising out of the severe economic depression in Cuba and now culminating in the one day general strike. Naturally, it is satisfied with Machado who carries out their policy of economic and political enslavement of the Cuban masses. The workers and peasants of Cuba, however, evidence that they are ready to struggle militantly against the oppression of Wall Street and their Cuban puppets.

INJUNCTION JUDGE HALTS UNION TAXI SERVICE

PITTSBURG—(FP)—Union taxi service has been halted on Pittsburgh streets by Judge Josiah Cohn, defender of judicial tyranny during the 1919 steel strike. Although the service, initiated by the striking cab drivers, was on a voluntary contribution basis, the judge ruled it contravened state public service commission rules and granted a temporary injunction.

Back of the court order is Parmalee Transportation Co., which according to the state public service commission, has monopoly privileges for operating Pittsburgh taxi service. The firm is making another effort to operate a small fleet of cabs on downtown streets. Loud prophecies by the scab firm that its old drivers would return in flocks to operate the scab cabs have been given the lie. Not a single unionist has been discovered operating Parmalee taxis.

The report continues: "One of the principal causes for unemployment of both skilled and unskilled workers, is due to the increased use of machinery in place of hand labor."

"In 1927, in 28 cities of the United States representing a population of 22,000,000, 100,000 families or approximately 500,000 people applied to private charitable organizations for relief, i. e., food, payment of rent, clothing, etc. And conditions are much worse in Buffalo now than in 1927."

The MILITANT

prints the original and incomparable writings of Leon Trotsky, the leader of the Left Bolshevik Opposition, now exiled in Turkey by the Stalin bureaucracy. In so doing, it makes clear to all intelligent and honest revolutionary workers, the revisionist policies of the present leadership of the International Communist movement as directed, since Lenin's death, by Stalin and Bucharin and their Centrist and Right wing supporters in the various countries.

The MILITANT

presents the views and policies of the Left Opposition in the United States, the Communist League of America (Opposition), on the labor and political problems before the American working class.

SPORTWEAR WORKERS WIN STRIKE

NEW YORK—(FP)—Workers of the Vanity Sportwear knitting mill in New York have won a strike against the discharge of three leading unionists, members of the Natl. Textile Workers Union. After one day's picketing, the strikers won the reinstatement of their fellow workers and a wage increase for two crafts. Previously a Negro porter had his hours reduced from 54 to 44 a week, due to N.T.W. efforts.

Independent Workmen's Circle Confronted by a Split

About 23 years ago the Independent Workmen's Circle was organized as a fraternal organization in opposition to the Workmen's Circle. The Forward and the W. C. are controlled by the same machine. Naturally the Forward all the time bitterly attacked or ignored the I. W. C. Their action made the rank and file of the I.W.C. condemn the Forward and the W. C.

When the Left wing split away from the Socialist party in 1919, the branches of the Independent Workmen's Circle began to sympathize with the Left wing. The branches supported the Communist party morally and financially.

Practically at every convention of the I. W. C., Left wing resolutions were accepted. At the Philadelphia convention held in 1927 the Left wing resolutions were accepted. At that convention a resolution was also accepted to raise $18,000 to colonize 50 Jewish families in Soviet Russia. The membership of the I. W. C. is not at all as Zaltsman and Olgin describe them in the Freiheit.

From the Philadelphia convention till the Chicago convention which was held at the end of May, 1929, $23,000 was raised for the Left wing movement. This money went through the general office, except that branches sent their donations directly to the Left wing movement.

At the Chicago Convention

With the above mentioned facts you can see that it was not necessary for the Party to come to the Chicago convention and make a pogrom there. What happened in Chicago? The Party forced the delegates to accept resolutions which would be suitable only to a Party convention. The leaders forgot that the I. W. C. is not the Communist Party.

This impractical action brought an absolute defeat for the Party. The resolution that the industrial unions organized by the Party were the only bona-fide unions could surely not be accepted. The Party should know that members of the I. W. C. also belong to the A. F. of L. and declined therefore to be stamped as scabs, etc. Also the resolution to recognize the Freiheit and Daily Worker as the only revolutionary press is likewise incorrect.

After the Party's defeat they started with their old method of slander and discrimination against every one who does not agree with them. Zaltsman is trying to tell us that this a Right wingers' fight against the Left wingers, but there is as much truth in it as their yellow slander that comrade Trotsky is for a Tsar (!) in the Soviet Union. The Freiheit daily attacks the leaders of the I. W. C. and tries to discredit them where only yesterday they were praised by the Freiheit. The membership has learned better than to believe the Freiheit. After the Freiheit mobilized all its champions, they went all over the country and brought chaos in the I. W. C.

The "Left Wing" Branches

With slanders every day in the Freiheit, the Party could not succeed to bring more than 45 delegates to the Boston convention and the most of these were fake delegates. The "impartial" delegates or "loyal" branches were represented with fifty two delegates. Zaltsman tries to call his delegates "class conscious". Let us look over his "class conscious" delegates. Branch 50 as a Communist branch (?) passed a resolution that was printed in October, 1929 in Das Naye Wort (official organ of the I. W. C.). Here is the resolution: "At our meeting which was held September 12, 1929, it has been decided to condemn the Freiheit for her anti-semitic acts that it used toward the Palestine pogrom; it was also unanimously decided to tax every member a dollar for the Jews in Palestine." And this is a Communist branch according to Zaltsman's interpretation.

Branch 3 of Brockton is also a real Bolshevik branch. Branch 3 bought a building for an I. W. C. lyceum. A banquet was arranged and among the honorable guests there were the capitalist city mayor, the police marshal, and the alderman of that ward. Also the delegate of Branch 29, Berg, elected as a Right winger and who had instructions to vote with the "impartial" delegates voted with the Left, to Zaltsman's jubilation. Berg apologizes now for his action and also condemns the Left wing.

At the Chicago convention the resolution on the industrial unions was the main one. Looking over the referendum results which were printed in the January issue of Das Naye Wort, one can see Zaltsman's artificial "45 delegates". Here is the result of the referendum vote in a few of Zaltsman's branches:

No. of Branch	For industrial union resolution	Against ment with any of the existing Russian groups, is by this very fact obligated to create a new Russian group which will lay down a correct political line in the Soviet Union. Otherwise, there would remain nothing for this group except to declare its neutrality towards the October Revolution. The same can be said in connection with any country. Communism must be international or it is not Communism.

But the bureau of the Leninbund? What is its stand on this question? Is it in agreement with any Russian group? Of course it is not a question here of mechanical homogeneity but of agreement on fundamental questions. Of this we know nothing. Obviously, as far as Urbahns is concerned, this is a secondary question, as are all questions relating to the international movement.

The Urbahns faction, in expelling from its ranks the adherents of the International Opposition, is prepared at the same time to ally itself on the international arena with any "left" group on condition that it is not prevented from pursuing its national policy.

Foreseeing their "national" bankruptcy in their struggle against La Verite, the allies of Urbahns—Treint and Paz—dream of creating a united international which will be open to everybody:—those who are for Chiang Kai-Shek; those who are for the Soviet Republic; those who are endeavoring to save the autonomy of the industrial unions; those who struggle for the influence of Communism in the trade unions; those who are for a united front with the Right against the official party, and those who call for a united front with the official party against the Right wing groups. The program of this motley crew is put forward under the slogan of "party democracy". Of all things, can one imagine a more bitter irony directed against party democracy?

We must say openly that, under the guise of struggling against the bureaucracy of the Third International, strenuous efforts are made to slip in tendencies and actions suited to the Second International. And yet, the bureau of the Communist International did not fall from the sky: it arose from certain definite class causes. It is the fact that the Communist International finds itself completely dependent on a state power which in turn depends on the international class struggle. Theoretically, this finds expression in the contradiction which exists between the theory of socialism in one country and the elementary bases for the existence of the Communist International.

There are some national Communists who believe themselves to be Left Communists, who attribute to the Russian Opposition the characteristic traits of governmental centrism, at the same time appearing to say, "We want nothing from these, or those".

But the Party could not get control of the I. W. C., so something had to be done. Suddenly a new order was given to the Stalinist supporters to take the new executive committee into court. So Zaltsman & Co., believe in the injunction! The order was obeyed and the Freiheit started a new publicity, attacking the I. W. C. from one side, and from the other side it called for a conference for March 30, with the aim to split and organize a new fraternal organization.

It seems that the united front is a mere phrase of the Party.

It is comical that the Freiheit is trying to make one believe that the conference is called to discuss the methods of the I.W.C. At the same time they have already decided to split the I. W. C. Let it be known that the Party gave an order to the few small branches which are under their control, not to pay dues to the national office of the I. W. C. So some of the branches are suspended.

Did the Party tell the members the consequences of such a policy? It seems that the new order will not work, because the membership of the I. W. C. and also the new members will not follow any more their splitting policy. The Party's action breaks again the Left wing movement in the I. W. C. and it also reacts badly on the movement in general.

—L. SCHLOSBERG

NAVAL PARLEY SINKING

"The life of the Naval conference has not yet been pronounced officially extinct, but it is already beyond the power of human aid. Only a miracle can save it. All that optimists confidently predicted for it has come to nothing, and even more reasonable hopes of those who had weighed carefully the difficulties against the opportunities are vanishing into thin air." In this manner the London Times bemoans the collapse of the conference. It is only a question of time now, when the closing chapters on this peace farce will be written.

The delegates spend the week-ends in jaunts to the countryside, playing golf, attending tea parties, and making merry of their trip. All of them await officially the announcement of the close. Attempts at a five-power treaty are already abandoned. Now the direction is toward the signing of a three-power agreement between the United States, Great Britain and Japan. The impossibility to arrive at an agreement between France and Italy, the refusal of Britain, Japan and the United States to agree to the French demand of a 725,000 tonnage ration, and their insistence upon a reduction of the proposals of Italy and France, spelled the death of the negotiations some weeks ago.

Possibilities for Continuation Slim

As matters stand now France will neither agree to reduction nor parity with Italy. Italy insists on parity with France. The other three continue to demand a decrease in the ratios of France and Italy. The official French delegates have returned to France, and only representatives remain so that it cannot be said that "France remained absent from the conference."

A three-power arrangement, too, will meet the same difficulties as the conference proper. This is already indicated in the position of Japan, who states that in the event of a three-power treaty the question of parity ratios would have to be reopened, since their temporary discussions with England and the United States were on the basis of a five-power treaty. Such a reconsideration means that Japan will stand by her original position of a 70 percent ration of the United States and England. But a three-power treaty will result in only increasing the unsolvable contradictions of the imperialists. It will only intensify the differences.

McDonald finds himself in a sorry mess. It must be recalled that one of the main planks of his administration was precisely on the question of disarmament. With his cabinet already in a bad way over their complete failure to solve any of the problems of the British working class, and his further difficulties with the opposition parties, the failure of the conference will have a disastrous effect on him politically. He is making desperate gestures to save the conference and all of them have fallen to the ground.

Pre-Conference Situation Remains

The conference has brought into the open the tremendous contradictions of the powers. The complete failure of the negotiations while disappointing the pacifists, is illuminating in that it gives an excellent picture to the mass of workers as to the real intent of such conferences. Behind the mask of "peaceful intentions" the wolves howl and snarl at one another. They threaten and demand. The situation however remains as before. The burden of armaments continues on the shoulder of the working masses of the entire world. It is increasing every day. Its solution is in the hands of the proletariat.

Each member of the Leninbund should understand that as soon as the split of the Leninbund becomes a fact, the Leninbund will immediately be transformed into an Urbahnsbund, i. e., will immediately be transformed into a small national sect, of no importance, without a future, without any prospects.

This means: a choice must be made. But for a true revolutionary, it is not difficult to choose.

With Communist Greetings,

Pittsburg Taxi Men Solid on 12th Week

PITTSBURG—Taxi drivers after 11 weeks of a bitter strike against Parmalee Transportation Co. continue to present a united front and a determination to win. When automobiles appeared on the streets carrying passengers and donating fares to strikers' relief, Parmalee obtained an injunction against their operation. At the hearing an attempt was made to bar all strikers from the courtroom.

At mass meetings speakers from the pile drivers and wharf workers and the building trades unions urged the workers to continue their fight. At each meeting so far a group of rowdies from the offices of the taxi company have attempted to disorganize the program by shouting "Back to work." They are dubbed the "back to work boys" by the strikers.

Chief demands of the strikers are recognition of the union and 40% commission. Not one desertion from the ranks has occurred.

BUILDING WORKERS ASK MOONEY-BILLING'S RELEASE

SACRAMENTO, Cal.—The California Building Trades Council in convention at Sacramento has demanded immediate pardons for Mooney and Billings. The unemployment situation was the chief subject of discussion. The five day week in the building trades is about to go into effect in Sacramento.

Polishing The Guns For The Next War

Since January 11, the five chief empires have had representatives in London, where they are polishing their guns in preparation for the next world slaughter. Incidentally, these five nations have about four-fifths of all the fighting-ships. When they go to war, it means that the world is at war, at least so far as navies are concerned.

This London Conference met to consider navies. At the outset it was to be a conference for the reduction of navies. It was therefore referred to as a "disarmament" conference.

For several weeks, however, it has been getting clearer that instead of reducing navies, the conference would probably lead to more navy building. Italy, Japan and the United States are all clamoring for "parity", for "70% ratios" or for something else that spells navy building when it is put into practice.

Nearly 10 years ago—in 1921—a conference was held in Washington at which these same five leading empires were represented. Like the London conference of

Sharp Decline in Illinois Construction

CHICAGO—Contracts let for building construction the week ending March 21 were less than one third the value in the same week a year ago, according to the F. W. Dodge corporation. The value was $3,271,000 for Illinois and a year ago $10,000,000 in round numbers. In Chicago contracts since the first of the year total $23,000,000. The same period last year they totaled $84,000,000. For Illinois outside of Chicago the figures were $19,000,000 this year and $50,000,000 last year.

Φ

CHICAGO—A jury found nine participants in the Chicago unemployed demonstration of Feb. 21 guilty of disorderly conduct and fines of $1 to $60 were imposed. They will be worked out in jail at 50 cents a day.

Only Soviet Union for Peace

There was a conference at Geneva, in 1927. Britain, Japan and the United States sent delegates. France and Italy declined. The word "disarmament" was used when the conference was called. Before it was well under way, it was described as an arms conference. Before it adjourned, the British and American delegates were in one another's hair.

Year after year capitalist empires call disarmament meetings. They have good cause to do it, because the costs of modern armaments are high and the protests of the workers against militarism is persistent and aggressive. Nations like France and Japan cannot stand the pace. Neither can Great Britain for that matter. It would "pay" to disarm. But in one conference after another, called to consider disarmament, the result is further military preparation. Among the great nations only the Soviet Union has come out flat footed for disarmament, and the Soviet Union was not invited to send delegates to the London Conference.

Question: Why does every disarmament conference called by the capitalist empires become an arms parley before it is over?

Answer: Because every imperial statesman knows that the capitalist world is preparing for war, and he dares not let his country lag behind the procession.

So they are polishing the guns in London—preparatory for the next world-slaughter.

Relieve Unemployment Demand Large-Scale Credits to Soviet Union

By MARTIN ABERN

No appreciable change is to be noted in the employment situation throughout the United States. Mass unemployment remains, and will remain a permanent phenomenon of capitalism. No matter what remedies the ruling class proposes or applies, no matter how production is again reestablished,—rationalization, the replacement of man-power by new machinery and methods of equipment, (the belt-line, speed-up, stretch-out, etc.) has vastly increased the army of the permanently unemployed.

Efforts, as never before, are being made to explain away the vast unemployment and the misery it has brought in its wake for the toiling masses. The apologists and crystal-gazers of capitalism try to make one vision a quartz of diamond richness, but the masses who feel the pinch of poverty are beginning to note that the bauble of capitalism, is truly but cheap glass. It becomes increasingly difficult to make out a case for capitalism, or to point to possibilities of any adequate improvement in the immediate or future situation for the masses.

Wm. Green's Report on Unemployment

President William Green of the American Federation of Labor who is always looking for a chance to put in a good word, as well as deed, for his masters, the employers, in his report on unemployment among the organized workers, is unable to cover up the appalling facts of unemployment among them. What can be the case, then, among the unorganized masses in the basic industries, the Steel Mills, Packing Industries, etc., who are affected to an even greater degree by unemployment than the unionized workers, who make up but a few million of the American working masses?

President Green's report for the first half of March on the subject of unemployment among union men, as based on reports from 24 leading cities, has to acknowledge that "improvement is not yet general...In ten cities unemployment was still increasing in March, and in four there was no change...In the different trades, conditions varied also...In the Printing and Metal trades there were more out of work than in February, and in both these trades, unemployment in March reached the highest figure for any month since 1927 when we began keeping records."

Nor is it possible for this labor faker, who regards capitalism as the best of all possible worlds, to hold out hopes of any genuine improvement of conditions in the near future, though he endeavors to hide the truth in a cloud of dusty words. Green goes on to say that "In service industries, transportation, food, clothing, and other manufactures there was no great change...Owing to the unusually large number out of work this year it will undoubtedly be a long time before employment reaches normal proportions. In eleven cities unemployment is still at a very high figure of 20 percent or more out of work—in Jersey City, Cleveland, Denver, Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, Buffalo, Los Angeles, New York, Paterson and Boston."

Bosses and Government Ignore Needs of Workers

But there will be no "normal" again, notwithstanding Mr. Green, Hoover, and others who try to conceal the facts. But indeed it will be "a very long time" before the mass of unemployed workers or even a good part of them will have even the consolation of drawing a pittance of wages from a boss.

The Socialists and the American Federation of Labor fakers in New York were compelled, under the pressure of the rank and file workers and the militant propaganda of the Communists and the Left wing, to give consideration to the unemployment question. These elements, speaking through their Emergency Unemployment Conference have to acknowledge the extremity of the unemployed situation in New York. They estimate that five hundred thousand men and women are out of work in New York City, and similar horrifying figures can be brought forward from every city and town in the country.

Where the bosses and their governmental and labor lackeys cannot hide or lie about the true situation, they try to ignore or laugh away those forces who are trying to present a partial remedy for the acute conditions. All that the Mayor, James Walker of New York, can answer to the delegations of workers who made an effort to present the facts and the causes of unemployment to the city government was, "We

YELLOW-DOG JUDGE Hoover Nominee for Supreme Court

WASHINGTON—Judge John Johnston Parker, of the Fourth Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, nominated by President Hoover to the vacant place on the Supreme Court left by the death of Justice Sanford, has been identified as an endorser of the yellow-dog contract. It is wholly improbable that the Senate will fail to confirm this injunction judge to a lifetime job. The wage workers know that Parker will be an extreme Tory on all industrial issues that come before the court.

It was in 1920 that the 50,000 organized coal miners in West Virginia began their strike to make the remaining coal fields in that state union territory. Half a score of years had shown that coal miners in West Virginia had no civil rights that a coal company or a local official would recognize. Logan county, then as now, was a feudal stronghold into which a union organizer ventured at the risk of his life. Finally a campaign was begun to organize the miners in all the fields, and to carry the union message to Logan. In 1922 occurred the "union crusade" which sent thousands of miners, with members of their families, marching across the hills toward anti-union mines at Logan. State troops and constabulary were rushed to stop the movement. Leaders of the march were arrested, and later were tried for murder. In the midst of this excitement an injunction was issued by Judge McClintic of the Federal District Court at Charleston, forbidding the union men to suggest either striking or joining a union, to miners who had signed yellow-dog contracts with mining companies.

McClintic's impeachment was sought, but he held his seat by reason of the support given him by organized capital in West Virginia and throughout the industrial East. The Mine Workers appealed from his injunction. After many delays, lasting until April 18, 1927, Judge Parker, in the Circuit Court of Appeals, rendered a decision upholding McClintic.

Now Hoover rewards this willing tool of the coal operators and capitalists.

The A.F. of L. in the South

For two months the American Federation of Labor has been "campaigning to organize" the South. About 100 special organizers are claimed to be in the field covering the five states of Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia and the two Carolinas, to concentrate mainly on the textile industry.

Results to date have borne out all the serious indictments made by the revolutionary movement against the A.F. of L. policy and methods. They have shown also that the Southern bourgeois have not in the least relented in their hostility to union organization, even of the reactionary brand, but have rather intensified the offensive against the workers. The latter are giving ample proof of militancy and in the now less spectacular but still continuing sharp conflicts are making a mockery of the deceptive practices of the A. F. of L. with its spineless appeals to the bosses for friendly cooperation. Certainly there is a fertile field for union organization.

Green Meets the Bosses

President Green is again touring the South to try further to put the Federation in the "right" light, to renew his pledges and, if possible, fully to win the favor of business (!). On his last visit he did not forget to advise the employers to organize in order to make an end to cut-throat competition and particularly to emphasize common struggle against the Communists: "Accept us, or the alternative will be the Communists," said Green. No wonder that certain of the more far-sighted capitalist dailies give him a rather favorable reception, comparing him to a successful banker or head of a large business institution. The mayor of Memphis, Tenn., in welcoming Green to the city could therefore, think "hopefully" of the future, remind his audience that he (Green) had "saved the Federation from the Bolshevik tide in 1922."

Meanwhile even children under 16 years of age work the twelve hour shift in North Carolina. Just as the "organization campaign" started, the Piedmont mill in Gastonia administered a 20 per cent wage cut, reducing spinners from $14.30 to $11.78 per week and card hands from $14.40 to $12.00. This is at a twelve hour night shift and eleven hour day shift.

The Wage-Cutting Campaign and the Strikers

At the Riverside and Dan River mills at Danville, Va. a 10 per cent wage cut took effect on February 1st, bringing the average wage down from $18.69 to $16.75. Many, however, receive much less. The company claims, of course, that the workers, through the company union, voted the cut. In these mills Negroes are barred from the company union but not from the wage cuts. The president of the company, H. R. Fitzgerald, appears still able to draw his yearly salary of $85,000; and the dividends paid on its $7,500,000 common stock have kept the level of 10 per cent.

In general profits coming, out of the sweat and blood of the Southern textile workers, have piled into the coffers of the absentee owners. Senator Wheeler, quoting from a report in the Senate, stated that the American Viscose Co., producing two-thirds of all rayons, averaged a net profit of 48 per cent on $184,166,000 gross sales for the three year period 1926-29. Net profit, after all expenses, taxes and depreciation, amounted to $88,306,000, although the capital investment in 1922 was only $10,000,000.

The Marion Clinchfield mills, N. C., have announced that the stretchout system is to be put back into effect and, according to reports, there is strike talk among the workers. 135 families are still evicted from the company houses since the last strike. At Swannanoa the weavers in the Beacon Blanket Co.'s mill have struck against the stretchout system and predict that their ranks will grow.

At the American Bemberg Glanzstock

Co. mills at Elizabethton, Tenn., the workers succeeded in obtaining control of the company union. Immediately wholesale discharges followed, against which the workers struck on March 3rd. Over 2,000 workers responded to the call and are now carrying on active picketing.

Southern Workers Show Militancy

Such are the reports from the South. The present Elizabethton strike is the third within less than a year. Without any financial backing and without any strike relief whatever, nevertheless these Southern workers show splendid examples of class solidarity, worthy of becoming object lessons for the worker north of the Mason-Dixon line. McMahon and other leaders in charge of the "drive" have been the most emphatic in stating that they did everything in their power to avert strikes. Unquestionably so; that is the particular mission of the A. F. of L. in the South. Vice-President Gorman of the U. T. W., one of the committee of three in charge, offers the mill barons "cooperation of the U. T. W. in stabilizing labor costs and removing inefficiency in accordance with the labor-management cooperation plan worked out on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad". The Southern workers, however, have already had lessons aplenty in company unionism, for which the B. and O. plan is but another name. By their own initiative they show the way, even forcing these reactionary leaders to move a step ahead.

Left Wing Must Adopt United Front Policy

Meanwhile the National Textile Workers union under Left wing leadership has apparently left the southern field uncontested to the A. F. of L. Not because the field for organization and militant struggle is less fertile now than before, to which the reports cited above bear witness. No, it is the penalty of false policies which now leaves the reactionaries in complete command. Undoubtedly the Left wing could yet have been an important factor. With correct united front policies, particularly at the height of the bourgeois lynching campaign, at the time of the assaults at Gastonia and the killings at Marion, the whole crew of A. F. of L. organizers could not have separated the Left wing from the working masses of the South. Such a policy would have become a mighty lever to extend, to unify and strengthen these many scattered strikes, and thus become a mighty weapon against the bosses. There were conferences held at the time, at which delegates of both unions participated, which could have become splendid opportunities for the practical organization of the united front. Naturally, the A. F. of L. leaders would have opposed this most strenuously; that was to be expected. But, with this policy, whom would the workers follow? The Left wing, of course.

Lessons of the past should be taken advantage of to help guide the present and the future; and it is time that the Left wing learns this lesson.—A. S.

Auto Bosses in Struggle for World Markets

Early in January Col. L.P. Ayres, economist of the Cleveland Trust Co., wrote: "If conditions in the automobile industry can improve vigorously in the early months of the year there will be little cause for concern about the course of general business."

But this does not seem to have taken place. Instead the Annalist reports that auto production the first week of March was only one half of last year, while the production schedules of Ford and Chevrolet are both lower than they were a month ago. And for the first two months of the year total production of autos and trucks was just one third lower than it was for the first two months of 1929. Clearly, this industry does not "improve vigorously."

With a falling domestic demand for cars what is happening to exports—the hope of auto manufacturers? Last year they sent abroad only $234 million worth of passenger cars as compared with $263 million in 1928. However, though their value declined, the number of cars increased as did the value of trucks exported and the value of auto parts and accessories. There was a gain of 8% in the value of all auto exports in 1929 as compared with 1928. But this gain was much less than that of 1928 over 1927 which was 27%.

European Capitalists, Resist American Penetration

European motor capitalists have been putting up a militant resistance to the exports of American auto makers. The French manufacturers raised a storm of protest from American exporters, when they introduced bills into the French Chamber setting a prohibitive duty on U. S. cars. The Americans immediately formed a "Committee of Defense" to protect their interests, brought pressure to bear on the French government, including threats of reprisals against French goods and, through the American embassy, compelled the French to recede from their position. The French tariff will probably raise the duties on cars only 10%, making a 55% duty which will still permit the Americans to do business at a profit. But the French car makers want an 80 to 90% duty and will put up a strenuous fight for it. Even if the 10% compromise bill should go through this year there is nothing—but still more American pressure—to prevent increased duties being levied later on.

At the same time the Germans have limited the number of American cars to be imported, through an agreement with Belgian, Italian, French, Czechoslovakian and Austrian manufacturers. This action foreshadows further joint effort to block the growing imports of American cars, and a cartel of all European auto makers.

All signs thus point to increased opposition by the motor capitalists of Europe to being "conquered commercially" by the United States.

British Labor Fakers Aid Bankers

And Britain, under the aggressive lead of the labor government, is not at the tail of this procession. It aims to get its own foot further into the world's auto markets and to fight the advances of the American magnates. Early in the year London reported that J. H. Thomas, chief foreign sales promoter of the labor government, had been in secret meeting with the leaders of the British auto industry urging them to evolve plans to increase their export trade, and to combine and rationalize their factories further in order to compete with American high-speed production.

These foreign developments indicate what is in store for American auto workers, as well as for their brothers working in native or American-owned factories in Europe. The fierce competition for markets is reflected in mass unemployment, more wage cuts and speed up, for those left with precarious jobs in the plants of Detroit, Pontiac, Lansing and Flint—as well as those of Paris, Frankfurt, Berlin and Milan.

NO COMPENSATION FOR FINGERLESS BOYS

RALEIGH, N. C.—Two boys, one 16, the other 15, have been denied compensation for the loss of fingers in mill machines. They were not doing the work for which they were paid, the state industrial commissioner ruled. The 16-year-old boy, white, lost two fingers and a thumb in a cotton mill and the younger boy, a Negro, lost three fingers in a veneer factory.

HOUSTON, Tex.—Committees have been appointed to prepare for the annual convention of the Intl. Typographical Union, which will meet for the first time in this section of the country in September. 2,000 delegates and visitors are expected.

LABOR HATERS MERGE FORCES

The merging of Chase Natl. Bank, Equitable Trust Co. and Interstate Trust Co. places Rockefeller interests at the head of the largest bank in the world.

Until now Rockefeller's Natl. City Bank has been the largest in the United States, but London has held its leadership with the largest in the world. The new mammoth Chase Natl. with total deposits of $2,100,000,000 now steps ahead of the Midland Bank, Ltd., leading British bank, and registers the fact that New York has displaced London as the world's financial center.

Winthrop W. Aldrich who has been president of the Equitable Trust Co. will represent Rockefeller interests as president of the giant combine. He is brother-in-law of John D. Rockefeller Jr. and was personal representative of the Oil Emperor in the Indiana Standard Oil fight last year.

American Capitalists Combining

Other powerful industrial overlords, in addition to the Rockefeller men, are directors of the new financial titan. Copper and iron mining interests are represented by D. C. Jackling, American Smelting and Refining Co. by F. H. Brownell, utility interests by G. M. Dahl, the Western Union Telegraph by Newcomb Carlton, explosives and chemicals by W. S. Carpenter of the DuPont Co., packing interests by F.E. White of Armour's, the international match trust and the sugar trust by H. O. Havemeyer, silk textiles by T. F. Viator, expresses and railroad interests by Cornelius Vanderbilt and other railroad magnates.

As Aldrich has represented Rockefeller interests in a Morgan bank, so now Morgan interests sit on the new combine through Geo. H. Howard and F. L. Polk (utilities), Alfred P. Sloan of General Motors, A. H. Griswold of International Tel. and Tel. and G. K. Morrow of Morgan's grocery interests.

Bitterly Anti-Labor

For the workers in the United States, this merger means a further step in consolidating the strongest financial interests, whose anti-union policies are well known. Strikes in the factories, mills and mines controlled by these directors have always been savagely broken up as scabs, thugs, police, courts and churches have been lined up to break the workers' resistance.

Internationally, this latest and mightiest financial merger marks a new stage in the British-American conflict. Rockefeller's Natl. City Bank has long been an outpost of American imperialist finance in territory once dominated by British investors. Now the Chase Natl. steps forward under Rockefeller leadership to displace a British bank as largest in the world.

STATE LABOR HEAD SHOWS HEAVY UNEMPLOYMENT IN MICHIGAN

DETROIT—Speaking at a Detroit student gathering, Eugene J. Brock, state commissioner of labor stated:

"The situation here in Michigan has become steadily worse," said Brock. "Where we usually have 3,000 families totally destitute in Detroit we now have 12,000. In the state at large over 100,000 are totally dependent on charity for their continued existence. 75,000 persons have already been compelled to leave the state."

"This is one of the busiest seasons of the year for both furniture and automobiles and yet we find unemployment reaching unprecedented figures in Grand Rapids, the furniture center, while out of 48,000 workers in Flint only 28,000 are employed. And they are employed only on part time."

"In Detroit less than 60% of the workers are at work and even they are working considerably less than two-thirds full time."

ASHEVILLE, N. C.—More than 2,000 workers are now employed at the new Enka rayon mill near Asheville. Of these 1,270 are girls and 750 men.

Relieve Unemployment

have wasted two hours listening to political propaganda". From such as these—the Walkers, et al—nothing can indeed be expected. It is for the workers to understand and act in their own interests.

Workers Begin to See Capitalism as Cause of Unemployment

It is no longer possible to get all the workers to accept the situation as quietly as they have in the past. Greater numbers of them are becoming conscious of the situation and the causes behind mass unemployment. They are beginning to recognize that unemployment grows out of, is nurtured by, increases, and cannot be done away with under capitalism. Thus they are driven to the consideration of ways and means for the abolition of capitalism.

The Senate Committee on Commerce listens for hours upon hours and days upon days to capitalists or their representatives, discusses business growth, tariff revision, censorship of radical and scientific literature, but they will not permit and will not listen to representatives of workers who have definite measures to put forward for the alleviation of unemployment. This was very clearly demonstrated when the representatives of the Trade Union Unity League were refused a hearing on the matter of unemployment. To listen to representatives of the workers is not to the liking of the bosses; but soup lines remain meanwhile and the poverty of the masses increases.

What a mockery the "benefits" of capitalist society are to the working masses, is exhibited by the words of Dr. Julius Klein, assistant United States Secretary of Commerce and a close co-worker of President Hoover, who states: "At least two-thirds of the population of the world live in countries where a considerable proportion of the people are underfed."

To Aid Unemployed, Demand Credits for Soviet Government

Hoover "strikes up the band" with a roar of prosperity that is to come and writes the score for programs of work, building and reconstruction. But all remains on the sheet. Nothing is said of the utilization of such actual sources as would make possible the employment of tens of thousands and even hundreds of thousands of American workers now out of a job. We refer here to the silence on the question of the extension of large-scale and long time credits to the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

This, on the one hand, would make possible the purchase of large orders of machinery for the industrialization of the Soviet Union, as well as modern agricultural equipment for use on collective and Soviet farms; and, on the other hand, it would thereby make possible in return the greater export from the Soviet Union of various articles of consumption, such as, grain, butter, meats, as well as those products which the Soviet Union now exports in large quantities, such as oil, timber, etc. Why this failure of the Hoover government, with all its talk of prosperity building, to utilize the possibility to aid materially the American workers through the medium of large-scale trade with and credit extensions to the Soviet government?

The material interests of both the American workers and the Soviet workers are affected by this question. Obviously, too, the material and political relations between the Soviet workers and the American masses would be enhanced and a better understanding gained by the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries, namely, the recognition of the Soviet Union by the United States.

It should be plain to every worker that the establishment of big and planned economic exchange between the Soviet Union on the one hand and the United States on the other, could help in a good measure the amelioration of the economic situation of the masses of the unemployed in America, though it cannot of course solve the question of unemployment under capitalism.

Unite Forces on Behalf of Jobless

We have referred time and again to the narrow, sectarian policy that has been followed by the official Communist Party in the movement on behalf of the unemployed.

The Party has failed to initiate a broad movement for the unemployed, to unite all possible elements on this issue. By their failure to propose a united front to the socialists, A. F. of L. and other elements being jerked into motion by rank and file pressure, the official Communist Party has made and makes it easier for these social reformists and outspoken capitalist supporters to lead the unemployed movement into channels that betray the interests of the workers. Not one real step has the Party taken to develop such a united front movement.

The official Communist Party press is filled with the arrests and persecution of workers throughout the country who engaged in activities in the unemployed movement, organizing the unorganized, etc. It is necessary to unite all possible forces for the defense of these arrested workers and against the attempts of the bosses and the government to frame them up and railroad them to prison. But the defense movement of the Communist Party, as expressed through the International Labor Defense, rejects in practice any proffers to aid the defense of the arrested and persecuted workers and continues a narrow line on all fronts.

Demand Communist Party Change Its Isolation Policy

It is high time that the Communist Party turns sharply away from this course that leads to further isolation and weakening of the prestige of the Communist movement.

Such a broad united front movement can make militant efforts on behalf of the unemployed for work or compensation, a shorter work day, lessening of the speed-up, a campaign upon the United States government for large-scale and long time credits to and recognition of the Soviet government by the United States government.

It was to be expected, as we anticipated, that the national unemployment conference of the Trade Union Unity League, with a narrow outlook, would prove chiefly a talkfest and hence will leave its various slogans on behalf of the unemployed largely paper resolutions. It is time for the Party to call a halt to such practices and conceptions.

Methods in the Unemployed Movement

On the burning issue of mass unemployment, which will remain a central problem for capitalism and which the Communists must know how to utilize effectively, the Left wing and Communists have to present the issue concretely so that every worker can understand the partial program of the Communists for the relief of the unemployed. The appeals to the mass of the unemployed and the employed cannot be based merely on the abstraction of solidarity. A big task is to reduce to the minimum the friction between the employed and the unemployed that naturally grows out of the economic situation. A broad united front movement is imperative which has the possibilities in it to bring together more closely the employed and unemployed, the organized and unorganized in the country, and which can also be the means of serving to cement the alliance of workers in all lands. The economic and political reasons speak loudly for such a policy.

It is therefore, for this reason, among others, that we regard it necessary for the Communists to conduct a campaign for and to make demands upon the Hoover government for the establishment of broad and long time credits to the Soviet Union by the United States. This should, in fact, be a central slogan of the Communists in all countries. It is possible to demonstrate to the American workers the simple material needs that link them closely with the needs of the Soviet masses. The refusal of the Hoover government, in the face of mass unemployment in the United States, to recognize the Soviet Union and thereby to facilitate vast economic relations between the two countries, more than ever makes this a national political issue. The Communists must make it clear that the development of economic relations on a larger scale between the two countries also increases many times the opportunity to strengthen the sympathy of the American working class toward the Soviet Union.

Tasks of the Communists

To the Communists it should be plain that such an economic development, the wider importation of machinery and agricultural equipment, would aid tremendously the five-year plan of the Soviet government (howsoever crudely, mechanically and arbitrarily this plan is being carried out by the Stalinists.) (We do not here deal with the question, that naturally arises through the growth of such a policy, of international political and economic relations between the Soviet Union and the capitalist world and its contradictions: such as the reduction to absurdity of the theory of socialism in one country (Stalin-Bucharin) and the peculiar brand of National-Socialism of the Right wing of the Western countries (Brandier-Lovestone) nor of all the other contradictions which can be solved only in the arena of the international socialist revolution. These will be dealt with in other articles.)

What we reiterate again in the sharpest manner are:

1. Revive the policy of the United Front for a struggle in the interests of the unemployed.
2. Build a genuine mass movement of the unemployed.
3. Organize a wide national defense movement for the aid of the arrested and persecuted workers at the hands of the ruling class.

The rank and file of the Communist Party must demand of the leadership that it stop at once its sectarian and isolationist policy and that it unite all Communist forces to lead an effective struggle for the above demands.

Buffalo Unemployment Heavy

BUFFALO—Again the workers of Buffalo have been promised "pie by and by". Meanwhile they will have to sate their hunger with the more solid feel of police billys. One doubts if the promise of "better times" that comes from the head of the Chamber of Commerce will enable the workers to extend their credit at the corner grocery. For the present they are permitted to starve.

Buffalo is a highly industrial town and conditions are very bad. "Normally" there are about 8,000 unemployed workers in the region. According to the figures of John J. Johnston, secretary of the Buffalo Central Labor Council, there are at present about 40,000 unemployed in the city alone. Johnston bases his figures primarily upon reports of the skilled and semi-skilled organized in the trade unions, so that the percentage of unemployment is actually higher. Even Johnston's figures would show one out of every four Buffalo workers unemployed.

The reports from the various charitable organizations testify to the miserable conditions of the unorganized workers especially. The municipal department of public welfare is now giving aid to 3,400 families, three times the average number. When we recollect the case of the youth who was recently shot and killed while taking a loaf o bread, it is testimony to the fact that the so-called charitable organizations do everything to discourage and humiliate the workers who come to them for aid. Large numbers have, nevertheless, asked, but only to be denied aid.

The hokum of increased building construction is also being handed out in this city. Average unemployed among the building trades at this time of the year is less than 40%. The report of secretary Johnston itself indicates that 53% of the workers in the building industry are out of work. Over 15,000 workers stormed the city employment office one Friday for snow shovelling work. About 1000 were hired for the short time needed. A class conscious labor movement yet needs to develop.

NEW BEDFORD, Mass.—New Bedford textile mills are operating at only 55% of capacity, with 25,000 looms idle out of a total of 55,000. This is a high mark for inactivity in this textile center.

Communist League to Print Important Books

The Communist League of America (Opposition) will begin the publication shortly of a series of books and documents of the most extraordinary interest and importance to the working class and the revolutionary Communist movement in general. This material which represent some of the most important writings, speeches, theses, etc., of the Russian Opposition, of Trotsky, Rakovsky, Zinoviev, Radek and others, has never been published in the English language. They have been suppressed by the Stalin-Bucharin factions.

Despite the fact that these documents were presented officially to the congress of the Communist International, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and to various Party plenums, and represent the views and platform of the Opposition, they have never seen the light of day. Among these books, the first of which will soon be out, are:

1. The Revolution Disfigured by L. D. Trotsky.
2. The Theory of the Permanent Revolution by L. D. Trotsky.
3. The Platform of the Russian Opposition (Bolshevik-Leninists).
4. The Struggle for Peace and the Anglo-Russian Committee by L. D. Trotsky.
5. The Declaration of the 500. (This is a lengthy document addressed to the Political Bureau of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union by 500 of the leading Bolsheviks of the Russian Communist Party).
6. The Chinese Revolution and the Thesis of Comrade Stalin by L. D. Trotsky.
7. The Thesis on the Chinese Revolution by G. Zinoviev.
8. The Defeat of the Chinese Revolution by Karl Radek.
9. A Letter of Three Comrades. (Representatives of the Stalin faction in China) presented in March 1927. A powerful criticism of the line of Stalin in the Chinese Revolution.
10. Speeches and Articles of L. D. Trotsky to the 8th Plenum of the Executive Committee of the Communist International on the Chinese Question.
11. The Transformation of the Russian Proletariat and the Party as Created by the Proletarian Dictatorship by Ch. Rakovsky.
12. The Crisis of the Right-Centrist Bloc and the Perspectives by L. D. Trotsky.
13. On the New Stage by L. D. Trotsky.
14. The Crisis in the International by L. D. Trotsky.
15. Speech of Comrade Vuyovitch to the 8th Plenum of the Executive Committee of the Communist International.
16. A Sorry Document, by L. D. Trotsky (On the Question of Capitulation).
17. The Legend of "Trotskyism".

These books and documents, which have already been translated from the Russian, German and French, will fill a number of large volumes, form an inexhaustible reservoir for the student of revolutionary Marxism and Leninism. They will serve as a practical guide for the Communists in the working class struggles. They enrich greatly the library of Marxist-Leninist theory and practice. All of these, as well as others now being translated, will be published with systematic regularity through the Militant at popular prices which will enable every worker to purchase them. The first of these to be printed will be "The Revolution Disfigured".

FROM A SOUTHERN WORKER

Richmond, Va.

Dear Fellow Workers:

I rode in a street car and found a copy of the Militant on a seat. I must say that everything you say is certainly so with us working people.

I've been a former I. W. W., but have dropped out. I wonder if you would send me a copy of the "Real Situation in Russia" which you advertise, by the great revolutionary leader, Leon Trotsky. I'm interested in happenings in Russia and I want the true facts—and I'm sure that book will give me all the necessary information.

I've been out of work for the last five months, and haven't a penny to my name, and therefore would appreciate it if you could send me the Militant free, and some back copies will also be O. K. One couldn't buy a job here... We need the kind of unions you are fighting for. J. J.

The Period of Right-Centrist Down-Sliding in the C. I.

by L. D. TROTSKY

The policy of the most important Communist Parties, decided upon at the Fifth Congress, very soon showed itself to be completely inadequate. The mistakes of the specious "Leftism" which hampers the development of the Communist Parties, later gave the impetus to new empirical zig-zag deviations, and those to an accelerated sliding down towards the Right. When people are burned by hot milk, they begin to blow cold on water, too. The "Left" Central Committees of a whole series of Parties were just as violently overthrown as they had been formed before the Fifth Congress. The adventurist Leftism made way for an open opportunism of a Right-Centrist type. To comprehend the character and the tempo of this organizational Rightward swing, it must be recalled that Stalin, the leader of this swing, back in September 1924, characterized the passing of Party leadership to Maslow, Ruth Fischer, Treint, Suzanne Girault and others, as the expression of the Bolshevization and as an answer to the demands of the Bolshevik workers who, on their way to the revolution "want to have revolutionary leaders" too.

Stalin wrote, "the last half year is noteworthy in the respect that it brought a fundamental reversal in the life of the Communist Parties of the West, in the sense that the social democratic remnants were liquidated, the Party cadres Bolshevized and an isolation of the opportunist elements took place." (Pravda, September 20, 1924).

But only ten months later the true "Bolsheviks" and "revolutionary leaders" were declared social democrats and renegades, removed from Party leadership and thrown out of the Party.

Despite this panicky character of the amputation of leaders, very often through rude and disloyal mechanical means of the apparatus, a somewhat rigid ideological dividing line between the ultra-Left policy and the period of opportunist down-sliding that followed it, can nevertheless be drawn.

The Revisionism of Stalin and Bucharin

In the questions of industry and agriculture in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, of the colonial bourgeoisie, of the "peasant" parties in the capitalist countries, of socialism in one country, of the role of the Party in the proletarian revolution, the revisionist theories already appeared in fullest bloom in 1924-25. They cloaked themselves with the banner of the struggle against "Trotskyism" and found their plainest, most distinct opportunist expression in the resolutions of the April conference of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in 1925.

Taken as a whole, the course to the Right represents the attempt at a half-blind, purely empirical and belated adaptation to the retardation of the revolution caused by the defeat of 1923. The original attitude of Bucharin, as has already been mentioned, was founded in the "permanent" development of the revolution, and that in the literal, purely mechanical sense of this word. Bucharin granted no "breathing spaces", interruptions or defeats of any kind and considered it a revolutionary duty to continue the "offensive" under all circumstances.

In the above quoted—in its way programmatic—article of Stalin "On the International Situation", which presents the very first entry by Stalin into international questions, we are shown that the second author of the draft also professed the very same purely mechanical "Left" conception in the first period of the struggle against "Trotskyism". For this conception, only a "decay" of the social democracy, a "Leftward turn" of the workers, a "growth" of the Communist Parties and an "approach" of the revolution, existed always and unalterably. But the one who could look about him and discern things was and is a "liquidator". This new "tendency" needed a year and a half in order to observe something new after the change in the situation in Europe in 1923, so as then to transform itself in panic into its opposite. The leadership orientated itself, without any syn-

The following section represents chapter eight from the larger work of L. D. Trotsky entitled, "Revolutionary Strategy and Tactics in the Imperialist Epoch", which will be published soon in book form by the Communist League. "Revolutionary Strategy and Tactics in the Imperialist Epoch", at the same time represents the third section of the document, "The Criticism of the Draft Program of the Communist International" which was presented to the 6th Congress of the Comintern on behalf of the Russian Opposition.

The entire book was suppressed from the delegates to the 6th Congress, in violation of the statutes of the Communist International. The Program Commission of the Congress was permitted to read only two of the sections of comrade Trotsky's historic document, and then compelled to return them to the archives. But this particular section "Revolutionary Strategy and Tactics in the Imperialist Epoch", which presents an exhaustive analysis of the strategy and tactics of the Communist movement in this period, was totally suppressed from the entire Congress. The Communist League has obtained a copy of it, along with other documents mentioned in another column, of which this chapter is now presented to our readers. This entire book will appear shortly in book form at popular prices.—Ed.

thetic understanding of our epoch and its inner tendencies, only after the feelings (Stalin) and filled the fragments of conclusions thus received every time with scholastic schemas (Bucharin). The political line as a whole, therefore, represents a chain of zig-zags; the ideological bond, a kaleidoscope of schemata that have the tendency to lead every fragment of the Stalinist zig-zag to absurdity.

The Sixth Congress would act correctly if it were to decide to elect a special commission which would have the task to gather all those theories that were created by Bucharin, for instance—only for motivating the various stages of the Anglo-Russian Committee. This commission would have to put these theories together chronologically and bring them into a system so as to attempt to draw a malarial curve of the ideas contained in them. That would become one of the most instructive strategical diagrams. The same also holds for the Chinese revolution, the economic development of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and also every less important question. Blind empiricism, sometimes scholasticism, that is the course that still awaits its condemnation. The effects of this course showed themselves more fully in the three most important questions: In the internal policy of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, in the Chinese revolution and in the question of the Anglo-Russian Committee. In the same direction, even if not so obvious and less fatal with regard to the consequences, this course of the Comintern was also reflected in all the other political questions.

So far as the internal questions of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics are concerned, a sufficiently detailed characterization of the policy of down-sliding is given in the Platform of the Bolshevik-Leninists (Opposition). We must limit ourselves here with a reference to this Platform. This Platform, moreover, now receives an apparently unexpected confirmation by the fact that all the attempts of the present leadership of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to free itself from the consequences of the policy of the years 1923 to 1928 are motivated through nearly literal quotations from this Platform, whose authors and adherents are dispersed in the prisons and in exile. The fact, however, that the present leadership has recourse to the Platform only in sections and particles, without connecting one end with the other, makes the new Left turn extremely unsteady and hopeless, but at the same time gives the Platform, as the generalizing expression of a real Leninist course, an all the greater value.

The question of the Chinese revolution is dealt with in the Platform insufficiently, not concretely and in part is positively false (Zinoviev). In consideration of the decisive importance of this question for the Comintern we are obliged to subject it to a more detailed investigation in a special section (III).

So far as the Anglo-Russian Committee is concerned, the third most important question from the strategical experiences of the Comintern in the last years, there still remains for us, after all that has already been said by the Opposition in a series of articles, speeches and theses, to sum up the results here briefly.

The Results of the Anglo-Russian Committee

The point of departure of the Anglo-Russian Committee, as we have already seen, lay in the impatient endeavor to leap over the young and too slowly developing Communist Party. The circumstances gave the whole experiment a false character already even before the general strike.

The Anglo-Russian Committee was perceived, not perhaps as only a purely episodic bloc of leaders that would unfailingly have to be and would be torn demonstratively at the first serious test in order to compromise the General Council. No, in it, not only Stalin, Bucharin, Tomsy and others, but also Zinoviev saw a long-lived "friendship", a weapon for the systematic revolutionization of the English working masses, and if not the gate, at least its threshold, over which the revolution of the English proletariat would stride. The Anglo-Russian Committee became transformed—the further the greater—from an episodic understanding to an untouchable principle that stood above the real class struggle. That became obvious at the time of the general strike.

The entry of the mass movement into the open revolutionary stage threw even those liberal labor politicians who had become somewhat Left back into the camp of the bourgeois reaction. They betrayed the general strike openly and consciously and then also undermined and betrayed the miners' strike. The possibility of betrayal is always imbedded in reformism. That does not mean of course that reformism and betrayal are one and the same at every moment. Agreements can be temporarily made with the reformists, if they make a step forward. But to keep up a bloc with them when they commit treason shortly before the development of a movement, signifies a criminal neglect and carelessness towards the traitors and a velling of betrayal.

The general strike had the task of exercising a united pressure upon the employers and the state with the power of the five million workers, for the question of mining was becoming the most important question of State policy. Thanks to the betrayal of the leadership, the strike was already strangled in the first stage. It was a very strong illusion, still to believe after that, that an isolated economic struggle of the mine workers alone would achieve that which the General Strike did not achieve.

That is where the power of the General Council lay. It aimed with cold calculation at the defeat of the mine workers, in the course of which considerable sections of the workers would be convinced of the "correctness" and the "common sense" of the Judas directions of the General Council.

The Role of the Russian Unions in the Bloc

The retention of the friendship bloc with the General Council, with simultaneous support of the lingering economic strike of the mine workers, against which the General Council came forward, was to some extent calculated to create the possibility for the head of the trade unions to come out of this heaviest test with the lightest possible loss of confidence.

The role of the Russian trade unions here, from the revolutionary standpoint, was a very unfavorable and positively pitiful one. Of course, a support of the economic strike, even an isolated one, was absolutely necessary. There can be no two opinions on that among revolutionaries. Yet this support should have borne not only a financial, but also a revolutionary-political character. The All-Russian Central Council of Trade Unions should have declared openly to the English Mine Workers Union and the whole English working class, that the mine workers' strike could count seriously upon success only if, by its stubbornness, its tenacity and its impetus, it could prepare the way for a new outbreak of the General Strike. That would have been achieved, however, only by an open direct struggle against the General Council, that agency of the government and the mining employers. The struggle to transform the economic strike into a political strike signified, therefore, an intense political and organizational war against the General Council. The first step to such a war had to be the break with the Anglo-Russian Committee which had become a reactionary hindrance, a chain on the feet of the working class.

No revolutionary who weighs his words will maintain that a victory would have been assured along this direction. Yet the victory on the whole was only possible on this road. A defeat on such a road, which can lead later to victory, would ripen lessons, that is, implant the revolutionary idea in the working class in the meantime. Whereas, the mere financial support of the lingering and inextricable trade union strike (trade union strike—in its methods; revolutionary-political—in its aim) only meant grist to the mill of the General Council, which could await calmly until the crumbling of the strike was forced through starvation and it was thereby proved that it "was right". It was not of course easy for the General Council to await this end as an open strike-breaker for several months. Precisely for this very critical period did the General Council need the Anglo-Russian Committee as its political protection from the masses. In this manner the questions of the mortal class struggle between English capital and the proletariat, between the General Council and the mine workers, were, so to speak, transformed into questions of a friendly discussion—between the two allies of the bloc, the English General Council and the All Russian Central Council of Trade Unions on the subject of which of the two roads was better: the road of an agreement or the road of an isolated economic struggle. The inevitable outcome of the strike was the agreement, that is, the tragic decision of the friendly "discussion" in favor of the General Council.

The Bloc with the General Council and "Stabilization"

The entire policy of the Anglo-Russian Committee, as a result of its false line, was from beginning to end only an aid to the General Council, a support and a strengthening of it. Even the long financial support with which the strike was sustained by the great self-sacrifice on the part of the Russian working class, did not serve the mine workers or the English Communist Party, but only the same General Council. And, as a result of this greatest revolutionary movement in England since the time of Chartism, no growth of the English Communist Party, while the General Council sits in the saddle even more firmly than before the General Strike.

These are the results of this unique "strategical maneuver".

The obstinacy with which the retention of the bloc with the General Council was advocated, which was converted to direct servility at the disgraceful Berlin session in April, 1927, was likewise motivated by reference to the "stabilization". During a retardation in the revolutionary development, one is forced to cling to Purcell, you see. This argument, which appeared to be very convincing, perhaps to a Soviet official or a trade unionist of the type of a Melnichansky, forms in reality a perfect example of blind empiricism—

Throughout the World of Labor

In Spain after the Fall of the Dictatorship Monarchy, Republic or Proletarian Revolution?

On March 1st, we published an article by comrade Gorkin on "The Fall of Primo de Rivera and Its Consequences". In connection with this article comrade Trotsky made certain comments, bearing particularly on the agitation of the petty bourgeoisie for a republic and the attitude of the workers towards this agitation. Comrade Gorkin replies below.

* * *

Dear Comrade Trotsky:

I shall attempt to clarify you on the points raised in your letter of February 12.

In my article, I stated that "In the beginning the struggle would be led by the petty bourgeoisie, the republicans, and the socialists". Already the different conspirators against the dictatorship have been led by the petty bourgeoisie in concurrence with a large part of the army which feels itself to be "republican". The proletariat has hardly ever interfered for two principal reasons: because the organizers do not inspire them with confidence—besides, the organizers fear the intervention of the proletariat—and because there is no Communist party or revolutionary class organization capable of launching the struggle. And the set-backs of these conspiracies have been due to just that: the lack of intervention of a genuine revolutionary element. It is a fact, too, that the struggle against the monarchy—in a weak and legalistic manner, it is true—is now being led by the petty bourgeoisie. They hold the monarchy responsible—contrary to us, who, of course, hold imperialism as a whole responsible—for the Moroccan "adventure", the loss of millions in money and huge loss in life, crowned by the catastrophe at Annual, even as at the time of the coup d'etat. The dictatorship was the monarchy's last card. Almost everyone in Spain realized this. Sanchez Guerra, former leader of the Conservative Party, a thoroughly dynastic party, prepares for presiding over a sort of heterogeneous Left bloc, embracing those who demanded a revision of the constitution, the various shades of republicans, up to the socialists—we shall return to him in due time. Ossorio y Gallardo, one of Maura's former lieutenants, a Christian socialist, known for his demagoguery which very often forces him to use language more radical than that of the socialist "lackeys", threatens to call for an accounting of the King's liabilities; and Romanones himself—whom you know well for having caused your expulsion from Spain in 1916—has begun to extol a form of republic, presided over by the king—a form of "republican monarchy". He has saved the monarchy twice already and at present wishes to save it again, but under the cloak of—a president of the Republic. Those former politicians who dare to speak of their monarchism, do so in a very weak voice. So unpopular is the monarchy at the present time that even those most monarchistically inclined, believe it prudent to disguise themselves as republicans; an example is one of Maura's sons, the assassin of Ferrer. Plainly, this disguise can fool only imbeciles.

Why the Petty Bourgeoisie Are Republican

But let us return to our petty bourgeoisie. Their republicanism is, as you have so well put it, the expression of despair. This despair is the result of deep-seated political and economic causes. Thus—the heaviest taxes bear down upon them. From 1922 to 1928 levies increased by 1,292 million pesetas*. Provincial and municipal taxes increased proportionally (the sums realized by municipal and provincial councils increased to 965 millions between 1923 and 1929). Spain maintains a corps of officers of much higher rank proportionally than those of other countries. This explains why in the last budget, so large a budgetary item was added to the ordinary budget of the dictatorship; 800 million pesetas were assigned to the army and navy, whereas only a 172 million was assigned for public education. This does not take into account the 700 millions expended by the dictatorship for war material and the 877 millions spent for the navy, this being reckoned into the extraordinary budget, as well as the loan of 500 millions recently raised.

The deficit of the expositions of Seville and Barcelona, about 500 million pesetas, must be added. In a word, the ordinary budget has risen from 2,879 millions in 1923 to 4,185 millions and the public debt which was 14,700 millions in 1923 is today—these are the official figures—more than 21,000 million and to this must be added the debt of about 350 million pesetas destined for manipulation of the international money market. It can be said that at the liquidation of the dictatorial period the debt exceeded 23,000 million. Since Spain has a population of about 22 million this represents a debt of about 1,050 pesetas for each inhabitant.

To this must be added that during the dictatorial period the petty bourgeoisie suffered on two fronts: the constant intervention of the economic organs of the state which hindered its development, and the concentration of the national economy into the hands of the big financiers and industrialists which threatened its existence as a class. The republicanism of the petty bourgeoisie is completely explained: it holds the monarchy responsible for the experiences of the dictatorship and demands a new constitution which would make impossible a renewal of such experiences.

Fear of the Proletariat

Will the petty bourgeoisie be able to set into motion the masses of workers and peasants in a struggle for the bourgeois republic? No. Today as yesterday, during the conspiracies, it fears the proletariat. Recently the demonstrating unemployed in Madrid—we shall speak of the unemployment situation presently—sought the aid of the students. The latter, although clamorous the day before, refused. And the Republicans and Socialists said to the unemployed: "Remain quiet, you will spoil everything". The petty bourgeoisie who desire a small tranquil republic, attained by legalistic means are afraid that the proletariat will interfere with their plans. As between the reactionary bourgeoisie and the revolutionary proletariat, their choice will be made quickly. Besides, Sanchez Guerra is preparing to place himself at the head of the petty bourgeoisie and this is very significant. One word about this man: in 1903 while governor of Madrid he compromised himself in the assassination of a news dealer who took part in a workers' demonstration. In 1909 while minister together with Maura and La Cierva, he was one of those responsible for the "bloody week" of Barcelona, and for the assassination of Ferrer. In 1917 while at the head of the conservative government, he played a sinister role in violently suppressing the great revolutionary strike and mutilating the dead bodies of the strikers. These are three small exploits of the "saviour" who is preparing to attempt the "operation".

The Condition of the Workers and Peasants

Before taking up what our position toward the republican petty bourgeoisie should be, let us say a few words on the situation of the workers and peasants. If the conditions of the petty bourgeoisie are bad, those of the workers are naturally much worse. This is especially evident in the form of chronic unemployment. For the past two years the number of unemployed has been: thirty percent of the mining basin of Asturias, sixty percent in the Biscay, from thirty to forty percent of the building industry of Madrid (in the latter industry in Madrid there are at present 35,000 unemployed).

The ultra-protectionist policies of the dictatorship during the last few years has lowered these figures somewhat, but these policies have at the same time caused living expenses to rise higher and higher. The unemployment situation will become intensified still more by the fact that the new government is stopping the major part of the public works undertaken by the dictatorship. The unemployed do not receive any aid from the state or from the municipalities. Those who do work receive niggardly wages.

The conditions of the agricultural workers are still worse. The Spanish peasantry, especially in Andalusia and in Castile, have always been subjected to the most miserable conditions possible. (Spain is a country with an agricultural economy; 71 percent of the population of Spain are peasants.) Side by side with the large estates there are thousands of agricultural farm workers without land and without work. In Andalusia side by side with acres and acres of non-productive land used for hunting, there are thousands of farm hands who work no more than 50 to 80 days during the year and that for starvation wages. It is there that the class differences are sharpest. Also, the class hatreds are easily aroused there. In 1918-1920, while struggles of large magnitude were unfolding in the principal centers under the influence of the October revolution, the Andalusian province was in a ferment of revolt. The workers burned the harvests of the large estates, ran through the streets crying "Long live Lenin!" "Long live Trotsky!" disarmed the police and freed their arrested comrades. The peasant nurses abandoned the children of the rich...

The Workers' Awakening

It is evident that the masses of workers and peasants will awake to struggle soon enough. If this awakening is not yet an accomplished fact, it is due to the absence of a strong and disciplined Communist Party and revolutionary unions. We should expect powerful strikes which must be coordinated by connecting the economic demands with revolutionary political aims. It will be necessary to know how to link up the strike movements with unemployed movements. This plainly calls for special organizing of unemployed. And if the movement becomes really serious, and if conditions warrant the belief that it can develop with sufficient rapidity, activity should be directed, as you say quite correctly, towards militant propaganda for the election of Soviets and for the permanent slogan, For a Workers' and Peasants' government. (The slogan has just been launched by the Spanish Communist Party.)

A few lines now on class organizations. The only Party that had a legal existence during the dictatorship, outside of the Patriotic Union, is the Socialist Party; and the only workers organization, aside from the so-called "free" unions (organized by Martinez Amido during the period of harsh oppression)—is the Confederation of Labor. The collaboration of the Socialists with all the economic and political organizations of the dictatorship was the price of this legality. The Socialist Party numbers between 7 and 8 thousand members; the Confederation of Labor, some 200 thousand members. The latter are recruited mainly in Madrid and the backward rural districts. The well known anarcho-sindicalist National Confederation of Labor succeeded with difficulty in retaining 25 thousand members. The worker and peasant masses will swiftly create powerful revolutionary organizations. It is highly improbable that the reformist organization will succeed in augmenting its effective forces (as a contrast the National Confederation of Labor can see once again the splendor of former times.) It remains for us Communists to gain influence in its midst and to try to obtain the leadership.

After what I have said above, it is unnecessary to lay much stress on the subject of our relations with social-bourgeois republicanism. For the petty bourgeoisie the republic is a goal; for us it can be a stage toward the dictatorship of the proletariat. Our tactics are clear: struggle against the Monarchy, and, at the same time unmask the republicans and socialists, while organizing the proletariat for the social revolution. Our permanent slogan must be: A government of the workers and peasants. When the moment arrives, we must agitate for the elections of Soviets. It would be ridiculous to forward this slogan now. The street fights against the police and their machine guns, the revolutionary strikes and the demonstrations with red flags in the forefront, exist unfortunately, only in the minds of the scribblers of Humanite. Having seen a manifesto of the Communist Party of Spain, calling on this for the future and not knowing a word of Spanish, nor, for that matter, a word of Leninism, they believe that this had actually happened.

The Opposition and the Party

A final very important point: our Oppositional relations with the Communist Party of Spain. The position of the Party could not be any weaker. Since its founding, it has suffered from a series of crises which have reduced it to almost nothing. The Communist International shares a large part of the responsibility for this situation. It has favored a leadership of bureaucrats without the following of the Party to a fighting, capable and devoted leadership.

The Party is beginning to reorganize. Possibilities exist for the formation of a strong proletarian Party (a Party with four, six or eight thousand well-disciplined members could be a revolutionary force of the first magnitude in Spain.) Its organization is not difficult at this moment; on the contrary, it is very easy. The betrayals of the Socialists and the relative state of decomposition of anarcho-sindicalism, make the situation favorable for this organization. We must primarily work toward the capture of the Federations (of the seven regional federations; the three most important are in fact with us: the Asturian, the Catalanian and the Valencian).

This is a very good starting point.

War on Russia Cry U. S. Imperialists

The "Russian menace" was the chief topic of discussion at a preparedness "patriotic dinner" held by the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, at the Hotel Astor, New York City, on March 27.

Among those present were Mayor Waller of New York, General Ely, Brig. General Delafield, and Major Hardenbrugh. Coming together for a discussion of the possibility of an attack by a "foreign invader", the discussion continued on the need to increase the military preparedness of the United States. But the discussion did not linger on this very long. It turned to a discussion on who this "foreign invader" might be.

Militarist Hounds for War on Soviet Union

General Delafield in his speech uttered no words in declaring that the menace to the world was Russia. He made it clear that this was not the problem of the United States alone, but became the task of the leading imperialists of the world to unite in this common struggle. The speech contained lengthy invectives against the working class government of the Soviet Union; in closing, Delafield emphasized the need of the United States to join "with France, Great Britain and the other nations in preparing to ward off the Russian menace." (N. Y. Times, March 28)

This session of militarists is part of the concerted organization of the capitalist powers preparing for assault against the Soviet Union. While disagreeing among themselves, they are as one on the question of uniting to destroy the working class of Soviet Russia and the proletarian dictatorship. It is well that the workers of this country remember the Walkers, Davisons, and Delafields.

GANDHI'S POLICY AND THE PROLETARIAN MOVEMENT

According to recent newspaper reports, Gandhi, the Indian nationalist leader, was preparing to use the power conferred on him by the Indian National Congress in the month of January, for the purpose of carrying on an active campaign of "non-cooperation" throughout the country.

This event is important in that it marks a new attempt of the bourgeoisie of India to resume the struggle against British Imperialism under the pressure of continued agitation of the worker and peasant masses.

A problem of prime importance for British Imperialism, as well as for the Communist International, is that of the Indian Revolution. For England, its importance is infinitely greater than that of the Chinese Revolution. Although the Indian Revolutionary movement is unfolding thousands of miles away from the Metropolis, it affects one of the principal vital centers of the English Empire. As for the Communist International, it is occupied with a big battle in India, which, with improper leadership, can prove even more disastrous to it than its defeats in Germany in 1923 and in China in 1925-27.

British Policy in India

India is England's last great colony—Canada, Australia, South Africa, etc., have long since become Dominions under the leadership of the national bourgeoisie united with the English capitalists. India alone remains completely dependent on England. It embraces a mass of 300 million inhabitants, which means a formidable proletariat, although mainly a peasant one. Considerable English capital is invested in India; and in addition it provides an indispensable market for British industry. Its location, important from an economic point of view, has an added importance from a strategic point of view. India is the center of an expanse which extends southward to Africa and Australia, and northward to Egypt and China. English policy in the Mediterranean, Gibraltar, Malta and Suez, is determined by the necessity to maintain at any price the freedom of communication with India. Under these conditions, the necessity for continuing the domination of India by force cannot become weaker. Baldwin, Lloyd George or MacDonald—all carry out, and are compelled to carry out the same policy, that is, a policy of coercion and violence against the worker and peasant masses and in certain circumstances, even against the petty-bourgeoisie.

Gandhi's Policy Is Unstable

The nationalist bourgeoisie and Gandhi, its leader, pursue a policy of instability toward the government and toward the revolutionary masses. In India, as elsewhere, the petty bourgeoisie represents strata susceptible to various influences, and never able to pursue consistently and energetically either a reactionary or revolutionary policy. The petty bourgeoisie, and even large sections of the big bourgeoisie in India, are naturally nationalistic; that is, they demand national sovereignty for India, which means the right for the Indian bourgeoisie alone to exploit the worker and peasant masses. Among the Indian nationalists there are variations in program and in the means of applying it. Some would be satisfied with a Dominion status while others, now in the majority, want to push the struggle until complete independence is achieved. It is because of the pressure from the growing unrest of the masses, taking the form of important strikes in the large cities, that certain nationalist leaders, among them Gandhi, go as far as that.

But the truth is that these leaders have never stopped negotiating with British imperialism and betraying the revolutionary masses. This policy finds characteristic expression in the attitude of Gandhi, apostle of "non-violence" and "non-resistance" with the English imperialists, but who forgets that English domination is maintained only by violence, and that, like all class domination, it can be destroyed only by violence.

The Indian nationalists reissue under a new form, or at least are attempting to reissue the politics of the Chinese Kuo Min Tang, that is, an alliance of workers, peasants, artisans and the petty bourgeoisie under the leadership of the petty bourgeoisie against foreign imperialism. However, the revolutionary movement of the workers and peasants constantly outstrips the action of the nationalists.

Indian Masses Militant

This is because the workers—metallurgical, longshore, textile, as well as the farm hands, the artisans and the ruined peasants, etc.—fight against the British capitalists as being an enemy class. In order that their class liberation be complete, they must overthrow not only the domination of the British bourgeoisie but also that of the Indian bourgeoisie. For them the national deliverance can only be the first stage in mass actions which will culminate in the overthrow of all capitalist oppression, and in the establishment of a dictatorship of the proletariat through which will be achieved the emancipation of the workers and peasants under the leadership of the proletariat organized in a class party.

Naturally in this perspective, which appears to be in line with the growing ferment of the masses, is violently combatted by all sections of the native or British bourgeoisie, and, at the moment, it is not at all favored by the Communist International. The programs of the liberals, conservatives and intellectuals in India is at bottom the same, the only difference being in phraseology. Their opposition to the native bourgeoisie is coupled with the suppression of all workers' movements. British capitalism alternates periods of political tension with periods of apparent concessions.

It is these policies on the one hand, and the pressure exerted by the revolutionary masses on the other, that determine the course of evolution of the nationalist petty bourgeoisie. Naturally, the form and speed of the movement of the masses can be influenced to a large extent by the tactics for struggle laid down by the Communist International.

Comintern Policy Continues Wrong Line

Unfortunately, the Communist International persists in a political bloc with the petty bourgeoisie in the same manner as that which led to the defeat of the Chinese proletariat. In theory it has corrected its tactical line. But in actuality it could not and still cannot change its method of combat. Its first concern should be the creation and building of a genuine proletarian party, completely independent of the various nationalists and "popular" groups. Only such a party can lead the proletariat in virtue of the soundness of its doctrines, and its organization on the solid base of proletarian hegemony. But, it must be admitted, at present the Communist Party of India is almost non-existent. The Communist International carries on by means of superficial agitation among the nationalist masses, but it does nothing to hasten the formation of a genuine Communist Party in India. The International Communist press never makes mention of this Party. They never have a word to say about it. They never tell us of its struggles, its political developments, and of its activities among the masses.

This may seem astounding, but it is actually so. At the moment when a renewal of the proletarian struggle is unfolding, at the moment when the petty bourgeoisie is preparing to dupe the workers once again by drugging them into a meaningless struggle against English imperialism, the Indian Communist movement does not possess the least organization which would enable it, if not to conquer immediately, at least to place itself at the head of the struggling masses. The position of the Indian proletariat is thus very unfavorable. Gandhi, Nehru and the other nationalist chiefs enjoy great prestige among the peasant masses, and will make use of this prestige to deceive the masses, to check their revolutionary development, to bind them to conciliation with British imperialism. Before the cannon of the British police they will persuade the workers to refrain from all violence. What makes this a very serious situation is the absence of any coherent proletarian organization, of any Communist Party. The present trade union movement far from sufficing as a base for the offensive of the masses. What they need are the cadres and the leadership of a Communist workers' organization.

Task Is to Build a Communist Party

An important movement of the Indian workers, especially in the cities where tens of thousands of proletarians live under conditions even worse than those of Chinese coolies, outstrips the nationalist chiefs in a Leftward direction. It is under this pressure that Gandhi and the National Congress have once again started the struggle against England. But it is necessary, it is indispensable for the future that these workers should be under the influence of the Communist movement. For the activity of the National Congress and of Nehru cannot lead on the masses. Actually they follow the masses, but are ready to turn against them.

The Split in the Leninbund

After barely six months struggle for the views of the Russian and the International Opposition led by comrade Trotsky, the Left Opposition in the German Leninbund was expelled at the instigation of Urbahns at a carefully "sifted" session of its National Executive Committee, on February 23.

After Maslow, Ruth Fischer, and Scholem emulated the example of capitulation set by Kamenev, Zinoviev, and others, the leadership of the Leninbund stood at the crossways. Its fundamental task was to sweep the boards clear of the theoretical and practical heritage of Maslow and R. Fischer, to build up a truly revolutionary German Left Opposition, and to link it up inseparably with the fighting Russian Opposition.

Developments have shown that the Leninbund leadership did not choose the historically necessary path. It did not make an end of the old tradition of covert factional struggle with the Russian Opposition. While on the one hand, the Leninbund leaders lived off the spiritual capital of the Russian Opposition, they did not give up their opportunism, superficialities and ambiguities. They did not so much lead the organization as alternately yield concessions, now to the Ultra-lefts, now to the Centrists, and then to the Right Wing tendencies. Without a clear-cut political position on the International and German problems of the class-struggle, the Leninbund confronted the Soviet-Chinese conflict (Far Eastern Railway) without a platform. The helplessness of this leadership was well characterized by the fact that the discussion of this question was allowed to open with an article entitled "Hands Off China" by a Korschist and a non-member of the organization.

The Theoretical Misconceptions of the Leninbund

The articles of Urbahns and the position of the national committee are well known: A conception of ultra-left, social democratic and pacifist conceptions.

The repudiation of the proletarian character of the Soviet State, the theory of a "third type" state ("hybrid state") resting on an equilibrium of the class forces, has been the only "independent" pearl of wisdom contributed by the ultra-left Leninbund leaders. Such a theory spells the adoption of the Austro-Marxist appraisal of the nature of the Soviet State, general conception of the State, and rupture with the Marxian-Leninist theory.

On the basis of its fallacious analysis, the Leninbund leadership was led to adopt the idea of a second party. Denying that the Soviet power is a proletarian state, despairing of the Comintern and German Party, losing all faith in the possibilities of its proletarian rank and file, the Leninbund leaders looked for salvation in the formation of a second (dual) party. The "declaration" of the Russian Opposition (Rakovsky, Okudschawa, etc.) was interpreted by the Leninbund leadership as a step in the direction of capitulation. The conception of the role of the Opposition as a faction fighting to win the proletarian core of the Party was regarded by the Leninbund leaders as masked capitulation.

Political Bankruptcy of Urbahns

In the German questions, Urbahns has not been able to define his position up to the very present. The leadership has been working on a "program of action" behind closed doors, since the meeting of the national committee last October. Urbahns himself had to admit at the national committee (February 23) that the leadership has not been able to work out this "action program."

It seems that the leadership of the Communist International should be aware of these dangers, but the false political line that it has been pursuing for years in the Indian revolutionary movement, carries it, in spite of itself, toward the formation of an organization wherein workers, peasants and petty bourgeois will be on equal footing. Having lost all trace of Marxist conduct and all means of control, the Communist International vaguely hopes for a spontaneous peasants' and workers' revolutionary movement against British Imperialism. But such confusionism invariably leads to defeat.

Actually the development of Indian revolutionary activity is a fact and the future of the struggle depends to a great extent on the possibility of supporting and leading it by means of a genuine Communist Party. Paris, March 7, 1930.

The only thing they did not have to learn was the Zinovievist Comintern methods. In this they appear to outdistance the master. By suppressing all proletarian thought and political discussion, by systematically diverting the attention of the membership from the big questions, the Urbahns group was able to exclude the Left Opposition at the handpicked "Reichsausschuss" (National Committee).

The extent of the ideological confusion in the Urbahns Group may be judged from the conclusions of the speakers at the "Reichsausschuss"... "The Communist Party of Germany no longer harbors any revolutionary workers"... The politically unorganized are more revolutionary than the communist workers" (Deductions of the representative of a bloc with the Right Wing)... "Social Fascism now rules Russia. Russia has entered upon its 18th Brumaire"... (Reporter from a conference in Halle). "The theory of the Comintern regarding social fascism is correct. Industrial Unionism is our salvation"... "Out of the old trade unions ('free trade unions'), blocs in the unions and other organizations, not only with the Rights but with the remains of the U. S. P. D. (Independent Socialists) and the S. P. D. (Social-Democratic Party)." Urbahns and others were of the latter opinion.

The Decline of the Leninbund

The result of this policy is a catastrophic defeat at the communal elections, a disastrous drop in the membership (from about 6,000 at the time the expulsion from the Party to, at the most, 400 to 500 today). The Fahne des Kommunismus has been stopped and the Volksstimme which was issued four times a week, is now a Weekly; lack of a platform owing to impotence, and rupture with the Russian and International Opposition. Without a platform, without a press, without a rudder or sail, the Urbahns organization is going full steam ahead to its complete collapse.

The struggle with the Right Liquidators and the criminal adventurist policies of Contrism will be conducted by the Left Communist Opposition (Bolshevik-Leninist) in Germany in closest organizational connection and principled agreement with the International and Russian Opposition. Only the petty-bourgeois and those who are completely hopeless, can befall this "newest" split. Freed from the harmful and irresponsible politics of the Urbahns leadership, the German Left Opposition will develop its program on the basis of a Marxist analysis of the international and German position, and will gather the proletarian cadres of the Party in the struggle against the Centrist leadership, for the reform and the conquest of the Communist International and the Party.

Trench Episodes A. D. 1936

A Short Story

By Bertram Chambers

ABOVE the eastern horizon the sun shines dully; a copper disc suspended in a thin grey haze. A mist that envelopes everything to a height of thirty or more feet...

An inter-city road breaks the desolation of the countryside. It glistens in the haze, its wide asphalt surface damp with a liquid other than rain or man spilled water. Every hundred feet or so its continuity is broken by shell craters; occasionally a titanic crater obliterates its entire width and some hundreds of feet of length—the unforgettable brand of a 5,000 pound "demolition" bomb.

From either side trenches rise out of the haze to meet in one of the colossal craters; the scene of a direct hit by a "demo". In the mist-filled hole, fifty feet deep, a small gang of engineers are working laboriously on a runway in an attempt to link together the severed trench. They toil slowly, painfully, like divers on an ocean bed. One straightens up, looks at his mate through the goggles of his mask and says: "Those bloody Germans knew a few things about war, but I'll bet my bloody life they never dreamed of one like this!"

His mate laughs ghoulishly in the grotesque mask that envelopes his head and face. "The ferries were muckers, but they 'ad some idee of plying the bleedin' game." The other shakes his head in an attempt to dislodge the sweat that is fogging his eyes. The sweat he daren't open his mask to reach. Silently they bend their backs again...

On the lip of the crater where it faces the center of the road a soldier stands, staring steadily into the fixed eyepiece of a periscope. On the top the revolving eye swings slowly back and forth, sending invisible ultraviolet rays through the gas-haze to the enemy lines. There, too, an ultra-periscope gropes with unseen rays...

A queer creature of rubber and leather; of metal and glass is this modern soldier; a fantastic statue in the coppery dawn. Not one particle of his flesh is exposed to the air. A leather uniform—treated to withstand corrosive poison gas—cloaks him from feet to head. It is air, gas and vapor tight. A mask, weirdly strange in the mist, covers his face. A strip of tough, unbreakable glass enables him to survey a ghastly world. Below the glass a flexible metal pipe runs from the mask to a flat metal box strapped to his shoulders—his oxygen-air apparatus. Strangest of all is the device that enables him to speak audibly, a stubby metal tube projecting from the mask like a pig's nose...

The necessity of his diver-like armor is made plain by the bodies beyond the crater. There, lying in grotesque, pain-distorted huddles are the men whose armor is punctured and torn. Men who gaze skyward with glaring, pain distended eyes; victims of the greyish haze and its invisible groping fingers...

TWO HUNDRED feet down in concrete dug-outs secretly made a year before the declaration of war, the remnants of the first contingents loiter around polishing rifles; nipping the little crosses on the soft nosed bullets that converts them into dum-dums; sleeping like logs with unspeakable weariness...

A gong strikes...once...twice. The signal that the armored gas-proof doofs are about to open. The soldier at the door reaches for a valve; the Sss-sss-sss of the antidotal gas fills the room. The gas that drenches the world above in a fog of death leaks in spite of all precautions in minute, but deadly quantities into the underground barracks...

A heavy door slides into a wall; a column of masked, gas-proof uniformed replacements file in. The door slides home. The air becomes slightly "close" as the antidotal gas "kills" the poison gas adhering to the uniforms of the newcomers.

An officer barks an order. The line stands easy, then begins to strip off the protective uniforms...

An old hand, veteran of the first world war, glances at the replacements. "Hell!" he exclaims disgustedly. "A bunch o' bloody kids. Why in hell don't they send us some men?"

"Can't send us wot they 'aven't got, matey," replies his buddy and lowers his haggard face to the rifle he is polishing.

The new recruits look around with boyish curiosity. Some look "tough" but the majority show sallow faces with downy hair where the older men show grizzly beards...

The officer in command looks fixedly at his new "men". Cradle babies, not one over eighteen, the majority far less he decides, and swears viciously under his breath...The cities of course are charnel houses under the incessant rains of gas bombs; these kids are the pick of the remnants left...He swears again, audibly...

FLING through a gas-proof door a battalion takes their places in the trench. They wait. Presently comes the signal that all stations are manned. Another wait; a stirring along the lines. Expectancy. A whistle...

They climb over the top clumsily; retarded by the all-enveloping gas-proof uniform. They disappear onto the gas-haze in a ragged line...

The surprise attack fails. A titanic monster of metal rushes out of the fog, stands clear for an instant, vanishes...The enemy has launched a surprise attack with land-battleships...The line stumbles on in quick decimation...

The speeding tanks, making their way across the broken ground at a thirty mile clip, throw terror into the line of recruits. They loom out of the gas-haze with devastating suddenness; their ultra-modern machine guns—cooled by liquid air—spitting a solid wall of lead at a speed of 5,000 rounds per minute...

A recruit falters stands stock still in the slowing, vanishing line, then turns and runs, boy-courage gone. He passes an officer who, in one awful moment, sees his distended eyes in his ghost white face; hears him scream "Mother! Mother!" and stumbles on. The officer brings his gun up, mouthing: "God, Oh God!" The boy lurches horribly as the heavy service bullet drills through his back. He sags face down into the ground. "Mother." The word spews from his mouth in a torrent of blood.

The officer turns and runs forward to meet the tanks. Must not let them retreat...Advance...Advance...His mind is a riot, his guts a sickening cauldron...A tank looms up. He fires furtively at the metal belly as a yard-wide tread grinds him, a pulp of flesh and blood and bone, into the ground...

A recruit staggers, turns half-around. His face vanishes as a tank gunner gives him a burst at point blank range. He stands upright, swaying slightly, then goes down under the churning treads.

Another stands still in sudden dizziness; his uniform is punctured. The sweetish taste of an acid gas is on his lips. Terror stricken he gropes with his fingers for the break. The dizziness increases...he falls, twisting convulsively to the ground...As the taste on his lips communicates to his tongue, he rolls slowly around in a last desperate attempt to discover the infinitesimal, deadly break. His tongue begins to swell in his mouth; his eyes to stare glassily as his convulsive movements slow up under stiffening muscles...And now his eyes are the swollen eyes of the prawn-fish, pain distorted...His clawing hands cease to obey the confusion of thoughts that swamp his searing brain...And now his tongue is no longer an organ of his body...It is a stick of wood, swelling to the full limits of his mouth...It spills over his teeth; juts out between his distorted lips, dripping saliva...It commences to go down his throat...rigid, like a piece of wood...A piece of wood...

In the gas-haze the huge tanks grind into the ground the dead and the living...

The Roman slave holder had his "labor troubles". The slave uprising led by Spartacus in 70 A. D. proves that. The Southern U. S. plantation owner, master over many negro chattels, many centuries later had "labor troubles" also. The Fugitive Slave Act bears proof of this. The medieval baron, lord over many serfs, also had his "labor troubles". Wat Tyler's Rebellion, the Peasant Wars in Germany, testify how bloody these "labor troubles" became. Today a pick up of any capitalist newspaper will show the modern capitalist and his "labor troubles".

There is one essential difference between the labor troubles of chattel slavery, of feudalism and wage slavery or capitalism. Today the slave struggles for a chance to work, for employment. Then the slave would revolt to flee from employment. Today, police are called to club unemployed into starving idleness; then soldiers were called to keep the slaves at work. Then, stringent laws providing for terrible punishments like crucifixion, hanging, quartering, mutilating and flogging were meted out to any slave or serf fleeing his work. Now terrible punishments like jail terms and police beatings are handed out to any worker having the audacity to demand work.

In a few words, and this illustrates the superiority of the capitalist mode of production—for the master class—over any other: formerly the master sought the slave, now the slave seeks the master. He stands in line, he spits in his own face by offering to work for less food than his fellow worker; occasionally now he demonstrates and then the papers scream. Once in a great while he revolts—all for a chance to slave.

"Services No Longer Required"

Essentially there are two sorts of unemployment, the unemployment of the blue bloods the parasites, who while unemployed waste millions in degenerate orgies. For this class of leeches useful employment is a terrible nightmare. Then there is the unemployment of the wage slave—a terrible nightmare that haunts the mind of the worker. As he sees the job-line lengthen, however worn out and sped up he may be, he will manage an extra burst of energy so that he may not be the next one told that his "services are no longer required".

There are many millions of this type whose "services are no longer required". He goes from shop to shop offering his labor power, but the market is glutted with this material. As he walks he begins to think, a dangerous sign for the capitalists. Perchance a "Red", an "agitator", may give him some literature and he discovers:

Capitalism uses a new and much more efficient method than the cat-o-nine-tails to make the workers slave. That is hunger. We are told that we are free and the bosses are free. He is free to offer us terms of any kind—we are free to starve unless we accept these terms.

As we work, we create profits, such huge profits that even in their wildest extravagances the bosses cannot spend them. So there proves to be no more market for that commodity we are hired to produce; no more profits can be gotten so the free boss lays off the free worker to freely starve in the midst of a land of full warehouses which the worker filled.

Over-Production—Yet Poverty for Masses

The workers starve because they have grown too much, they wear rags because they wove too much; they live in hovels because they erected too many homes; they freeze because they have mined too much coal. This is the paradox of capitalism.

"Services No Longer Required"

Capitalism, greedily demanding more and more profits, puts faster machines into the shops which produce goods and profits at a faster and faster rate. More workers are thrown on the streets.

What of the worker thrown out of work?

Some of our suave, moral uplifters may take a look at this: during periods of unemployment, there is an increase of prostitution, murders and suicides. Our clergymen of every denomination rail at the morals of the people and point at the mounting crime wave, but of course do not dare to examine the economic cause or the capitalist system.

During periods of unemployment, disease and death rate increase. Among workers these are always high, but during hard times they rise to terrible levels. Fed on adulterated foods, shoddy clothed, poorly housed, the workers become more vulnerable than ever to disease.

Child labor increases as children are forced to leave school and provide for the family. While old workers leave the factory at one door, their own children enter at another—at lower wages. We have the case at present of unemployment generally and child labor specifically mounting at the same time.

During periods of unemployment the wages of those at work are slashed by the boss. The answer to any resistance is: "there are plenty outside who want your job."

These are but a few of the effects of unemployment upon the workers. Every worker must ask himself: What is to blame? Communists Have Unemployment Solution

The skilled worker says: the machine; the adult: the youth; men: women; white:

the Negro; the native: the foreigner; the deluded Republican workers says its the Democratic administration; the Democratic worker says its the Republican administration.

None of these are true. The youth, the women, the Negro, the foreigner, the Republican and Democrat all suffer from unemployment. While one group blames another, the boss has a hearty laugh as he sees the divided and thereby powerless workers quarreling among themselves.

The socialists have no cure for unemployment as socialist governments have proven in Europe: witness England, Germany, etc.

Only by overthrowing the system of capitalism will unemployment be done away with. The society of Communism alone can eliminate the terror of unemployment. Capitalism will be replaced by employment and plenty for all. To help bring this about all workers should join the Communist League of America (Opposition) and help fight for the overthrow of capitalism and the establishment of Communism. —C. CURTISS

In the Opposition Ranks

For some time now the press of the Left Opposition has discussed next steps for the unification of the International Opposition of the Left. The Militant on various occasions has presented this question and has put forward a number of concrete proposals for discussion. Now preliminary steps have been taken which have resulted in the formation of a Provisional International Secretariat which, as an initial act, is to issue an International Bulletin.

The Communist League of America (Opposition) is in full agreement with the steps thus far taken at Paris, France, on the initiative of representatives of the Left Opposition of the United States, the Russian Opposition (Bolshevik-Leninists), and the French Opposition. Comrade Max Shachtman, member of the National Committee of the Communist League, represented the American League at the preliminary conference and together with comrade Markin of the Russian Opposition and of the Russian Bulletin of the Opposition and Alfred Rosmer, representing the French Opposition and editor of the French weekly organ, La Verite, signed for the Provisional Secretariat.

The first circular of the Provisional Secretariat is printed below and outlines the steps taken to date and the ones proposed for the immediate future.

Circular No. 1.

To the National Committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition)

Dear Comrades:

In La Verite of February 21 and March 7, we raised the question of the organization of an International Information Bureau of the Left Opposition, which would edit an Information Bulletin, with the aim of preparing the Convocation of an International Conference at which all Left Opposition Groups would be represented. The Conference would lead to the unification of the Opposition.

The question of the unification of the Left Communist Opposition has become a very vital question at the present moment. Nevertheless its realization is rendered very difficult by important obstacles. The three principal kinds of obstacles against which we stumble, as the Opposition already has in the past, are:

1. The Opposition Groups of the different countries developed independently of one another, almost without contact. They know each other very little and resolve problems of international importance without concerning themselves about each other.

2. In a number of countries there are several groups which claim to be of the Left Opposition and combat each other.

3. In the U. S. S. R., the Opposition lives in illegality which involves very considerable practical obstacles, which transform themselves into political difficulties.

All these obstacles can only be surmounted by a lively democratic preparation of the International Conference. For this reason only, we have taken on ourselves the initiative in publishing, under the control of an International Secretariat, an Information Bulletin, where all the questions that interest the Opposition will be raised.

In consequence we ask you, expecting a reply in the briefest possible time, to express an opinion on the following questions:

1. What appears to you to be the best way of going about to realize an international union of the Left Communist Organizations?

2. What are the principle problems which you consider necessary to discuss toward the end of working out a single platform of the Opposition? Send all your theses, documents, resolutions, which you decide to place on the agenda of discussion for the International Opposition, without delay, their text in your own language.

3. To send to the Provisional Secretariat regularly, all the publications of your organization: papers, reviews, pamphlets, leaflets, notices, etc. (two copies).

4. To indicate to what extent your group can help finance the necessary expenditures of the publication of the Bulletin.

5. The approximate circulation of the Bulletin in your country.

It is understood that the role of the International Secretariat to issue the publication of the Bulletin would be purely technical. It would have charge of the control of the Bulletin and the convening of the conference, as soon as possible after reaching an understanding with the various organizations. It only has the right of initiative, but no power to define the questions to be debated.

We ask you to follow attentively all the news and information concerning the Bulletin appearing in La Verite.

We ask for an immediate reply owing to urgency of these plans. Make suggestions, etc.

With Fraternal Greetings

Northern China Organizes Opposition

In the previous number of the Militant we were able to report the development of the Left Opposition in South Africa. Now we have just received word of the formation of another body of the Opposition in North China, with their centre at Peiping. The Chinese comrades publish their paper, The Proletarian, at Shanghai, and now their ranks are augmented by the Oppositionists of the North.

We send fraternal greetings to the growing Chinese Opposition. History gives to the Chinese Opposition the task of revitalizing the Chinese revolutionary movement, of leading the Chinese workers and peasants to victory over the international imperialists and the Chinese bourgeoisie.

Opportunism within the ranks of Communism has decimated the ranks of the Chinese Communists and workers, and therefore they will remember the words of Leon Trotsky that "the cruel massacre of the Chinese proletariat and the Chinese revolution at its three most important turning-points, the strengthening of the trade union agents of British imperialism after the General Strike of 1926, and the general weakening of the position of the Communist International and the Soviet union, the Party owes principally and above all to comrade Stalin." The Chinese Opposition will know through their experiences and knowledge how to deal with the cancer of opportunism.

The Militant

Dear Comrades

We, the Oppositionist Group of North China, who stand on the same battle-field with you, here present our warmest revolutionary salutations to the Communist League of the United States of America.

We are happy to hear of the Militant. We believe that your paper is setting forth the important truth about the opportunism of the Stalinists throughout the world. The Militant spreads the message from which the proletariat of the whole world will trace the correct path of Leninism and will finally turn from the path of opportunism. It is the compass to guide the Opposition in the struggle against our enemy, the opportunists.

We sincerely hope that all issues of the Militant will reach us in good order; for it is our weapon in revolutionary theory which we need so much. We expect you will do your best to help us theoretically. We will report to you about the political and economic changes of China from time to time.

With warmest Communist Greetings

THE PERIOD OF THE RIGHT-CENTRISTS

mixed with scholasticism at that. What sort of significance did the "stabilization" have, in its application to English economy and politics, especially in the year 1926-27? Development of the productive forces? Improvement of the economic situation? Better outlook on the future? Relative satisfying and pacifying of the working masses? Not in the least. The whole so-called stabilization of English capitalism, held out only with the aid of the conservative power of the old labor organizations with all their currents and shadings, with the simultaneous weaknesses and irresoluteness of the English Communist Party.

On the field of the economic and social relations of England, the revolution is already fully matured. The question now stands politically. The cornerpillars of the stabilization are formed by the heads of the the Labor Party and the trade unions, which, in England, present a united whole, though with a division of labor. Under such a condition of the working masses, which became obvious through the General Strike, the highest rank in the mechanics of the capitalist stabilization is no longer occupied by MacDonald and Thomas, but already by Purcell, Cook and Company. They start things off and Thomas carries them to the end. Without Purcell, Thomas would hang in the air and along with Thomas also Baldwin. It is the false, diplomatic masquerade—"Leftism" of Purcell, which sometimes in rotation, sometimes simultaneously, fraternizes with sextons and Bolsheviks, and is always ready not only for retreats but also for betrayal, that forms the principal brake of the English revolution. Stabilization is Purcellism. From that we see what theoretical absurdity and blind opportunism is the reference to the existence of "stabilization" as an apology for the political bloc with Purcell. Yes, just in order to shatter the stabilization. Purcellism has to be destroyed, before all. In such a situation, even a shadow of solidarity with the General Council is the greatest crime and a mark of infamy against the working masses.

Even the most correct strategy cannot, by itself, always lead to the victory. The correctness of a strategical idea is judged by whether it fulfills the real development of class forces and estimates the elements of those forces realistically. The most disgraceful defeat, which has the most grievous consequences for the movement, is such a typical Menshevik defeat that is based upon a false estimation of classes, an underestimation of the revolutionary factors and upon an idealizing of the enemy forces. Of such a type were our defeats in China and in England.

The Rotten Strategy of Right-Centrism

What was expected from the Anglo-Russian Committee for the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics?

In July, 1926, Stalin enlightened us at the joint plenum of the Central Committee and the Central Control Commission as follows:

"The task of this bloc (the A.-R. C.) consists of the organization of a broad movement of the working class against new imperialist war in general and against an intervention in our land, especially on the part of England, the mightiest of the imperialist states of Europe."

While he was enlightening us Oppositionists so much that "the defense of the first workers' republic of the world against intervention must be taken care of", since we did not know that yet, Stalin added:

"If the reactionary trade unions of England are ready to conclude a bloc with the revolutionary trade unions of our country against the counter-revolutionary imperialists of their country, why should we not greet such a bloc?"

Were the "reactionary trade unions" capable of conducting a struggle against their imperialists, they would not be reactionary. Stalin lost the distinction between the conceptions: reactionary and revolutionary. He characterizes the English trade unions as reactionary from old memory, but entertains in reality miserable illusions with regard to their revolutionaryism.

After Stalin, the Moscow Committee also declared to the workers of Moscow:

"The Anglo-Russian Committee can and will undoubtedly play an enormous role in the struggle against all possible interventions directed against the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. It will become the organizational center that embraces the international forces of the proletariat for the struggle against every endeavor of the international bourgeoisie to begin a new war." (Theses of the Moscow Committee.)

What did the Opposition reply?

"The sharper the international situation will come to a head, the more the Anglo-Russian Committee will be transformed into a weapon of English and international imperialism."

This criticism of the Stalinist hopes in Purcell as the guardian angel of the workers' state was later characterized by Stalin at the same plenum as a deviation "from Leninism to Trotskyism".

Voroshilov: "Very true."

A Voice: "Voroshilov has affixed his seal to it."

Trotsky: "Fortunately that will all be in the stenogram."

Yes, indeed, all that is included in the stenogram of the July Plenum, at which the rude and disloyal opportunists dared to accuse the Opposition of "defeatism".

This dialogue, which I had to quote here briefly from my earlier article "What Did We Expect and What Did We Get?", as a strategical lesson is far more useful than a whole seminarist chapter on the strategy in the draft program. The question: What did we expect and what did we get? forms one of the principal strategical criterions in general. It must be applied at the Sixth Congress to all questions that have stood on the order of the day in recent years. It will then be shown unflinchingly that the strategy of the Central Committee of the Communist International, especially since the year 1926, was a strategy of unreal dimensions, false calculations, illusions with regard to the enemy and incitement against especially reliable and persevering co-fighters. In a word, it was a rotten strategy of Right-Centrism.

The 5 Year Plan and World Unemployment

RALLY WORKERS ON MAY DAY

The solidarity of labor against capitalism is the watch-word of May Day demonstrations by the working masses throughout the world. To unite the workers to see as their common enemy—the bosses and capitalist government; and to see in the Workers' Republic of the Soviet Union the first fatherland of the workers; to struggle militantly against capitalism, to overthrow it; and to aim to achieve in each country a government of the toilers. This summarizes by contrast the objectives of the class-conscious workers for May Day, 1930.

In the United States the millions of workers find themselves enduring the scourge of unemployment, caused by capitalism. They find themselves either thrown out of work, or wages reduced, work speeded up and hours of labor increased. Reaction, under the leadership of President Hoover is in the saddle. Rough-shod, it rides brutally over the basic needs of the workers. Protest against unemployment is met with arrests, persecution; jailings; removal of civil rights, such as the right of assemblage and press; deportation of foreign-born, etc. Arrogance, brutality, extreme exploitation by the ruling class are the order of the day.

The Situation of American Labor

The U. S. government persists in its refusal to recognize the Soviet government of Russia, now in its 13th year of existence. The agents of the bosses in the workers' ranks, namely, the American Federation of Labor officials, Wm. Green, Mathew Woll, et al, stand by and approve bourgeois rule in the United States.

The Labor movement in the United States finds itself weaker than at any previous time in its history. But potential power is still there; it need only direction and militancy from conscious revolutionaries who understand the immediate and ultimate interests of the workers. These elements are the Communists. Unfortunately, the Communists in the United States, even as throughout the world, find their forces divided, split into three fundamental groupings. An effective struggle against capitalism presupposes the struggle for the unity of the Communists again on a common principle platform. Notwithstanding, May Day demands from the official Communist Party, and from all Communists, in and outside the ranks of the official Party, the initiation for May Day of a genuine mass united front of workers and all workers' organizations against the employers, on a number of immediate and burning issues that concern all the workers in the United States.

The Issues for May Day

What are some of these immediate demands of the workers that must serve to unite them on May Day, 1930? They are: The struggle against unemployment; for work or compensation for the unemployed at the cost of the employers and the government; for the seven hour day and five day week; against any reductions in wages and for an increase; for a united front against the repression and persecution of workers by the bosses agents, the police.

Opposition Paper Published ST. LOUIS BUSMEN WIN STRIKE

La Verdad (Truth), organ of the Left Communist Opposition in Argentina, has issued its first number (4 pages), and hereafter will appear regularly. It is printed in the Spanish language and will also circulate among Spanish speaking workers in other countries.

Among the contents of the first issue are Lenin's "Testament to the Party", suppressed by the Stalinist regime, and which now appears in print for the first time in the Spanish language in the South American countries; articles by Robert Guinney, Dvorin and others on the situation in the Communist movement of Argentina and South America and in the International; a statement of principles and organization, declaring adhesion to the Left International Opposition led by L. D. Trotsky and many other articles of importance to the workers of the Argentine.

La Verdad is further evidence that the ruthless efforts of the regime of the bureaucrats—from Stalin down—in the Comintern will fail to stop the development and penetration of the ideas of the Left Opposition among the Communist workers and sympathizers.

The Communist League of America (Opposition) and the Militant greet La Verdad and the Opposition in the Argentine. We are confident that the militant and conscious efforts of the Argentine Opposition will in time bring the regeneration of the revolutionary movement there and the reestablishment of a Communist Party on the original foundations of the Communist International as led by Lenin.

6-HOUR DAY AIM OF TWIN CITY RAIL WORKERS

MINNEAPOLIS—On April 1st a large gathering of Minneapolis and St. Paul railroad workers held their second meeting at Woodruff Hall, Prior and St. Anthony Aves., St. Paul, for the purpose of developing a nation-wide movement for a six hour day on the railroads. A third meeting has been arranged for Tuesday, April 22nd at the same hall.

The first Twin City Conference of Railroad Workers was held on March 19th and was called originally by Local No. 206 of the Switchmen's Union. Among the points discussed were the railroad mergers and speed-up, the need for a six hour day and five day week without any pay cut, and other problems affecting the organized and unorganized railroad workers throughout the United States. The Conference went unanimously on record to fight for the six hour day, for the organization of the railway workers, as well as for other demands of an economic and political character.

A Provisional Committee, consisting of members from the different local unions, has been set up to organize these meetings and to send out the calls. The Provisional Committee consists of: G. H. Farrell, Railway Clerks, No. 319; Ulrick Ulrichson, Railway Clerks, No. 1310; V. F. Case,

As we go to press, we learn that the St. Louis bus drivers have won their strike. A flat 9 1-2 hour day is established, instead of as much formerly as 13 hours; a six day week supplants the seven day week; garagemen work 44 hours with a Saturday half holiday. The union is recognized. Other demands of a secondary nature are also gained.

* * *

ST. LOUIS—(FP)—With 5,000 members of the St. Louis street car men's union assessing themselves $1 a month. The strike of bus drivers and conductors enters its third week assured of financial support. The international union is also granting relief funds.

The members of this young union voted a unanimous "No" to the company's proposed terms of strike settlement, which would tie the men for three years under 'open shop' conditions at wage rates in effect prior to the strike.

Not a bus has moved since the walk-out. Threats to operate busses with cabs under police protection have not passed the threat stage. The Central Trades and Labor Union has voted to accept the new union and exempt it from payment of per capita tax until the strike is over.

The central body stands ready to go into action with strike relief machinery in behalf of the 750 strikers if the situation warrants. The strikers offer to return to work when the right to organize is recognized. Pres. R. W. Meade of the St. Louis Bus Co, who boasts that he has broken six strikes during his career, refuses to consider any proposals which fail to give the company the world encircled by an airtight fence.

Switchmen's Union, No. 7; Paul Johnson, Firemen, No. 887; Carl Skoglund, Railway Carmen, No. 299; F. J. Glaser, Firemen, No. 814; J. D. Barr, Switchmen's Union, No. 206; and P. G. Hedlund, Firemen, No. 814, Secretary. Other active forces are Wm. Watkins, Switchmen's Union, No. 206; I. Nelson, Engineers.

Consider Labor's Economic and Political Problems

The question of setting up a permanent organization in the shape of Railroad Councils in each railroad center is also being considered. These Councils will consist of elected delegates from the several locals in each place or terminal. The purpose of these Railroad Councils is to provide a medium which will enable the workers from the 21 different Railroad Crafts to get together periodically to take up the many growing problems the railroad workers have in common, of which the growing unemployment is an immediate and serious one.

It is also proposed to induce railroad workers in other terminals to set up similar councils in connection with the six hour drive.

By L. D. TROTSKY

The internal development of the Soviet Union is reaching a critical point. No matter in what way we evaluate the present course of the collectivization which, in one year, has surpassed by two and a half times the plan elaborated for the whole five years (fifty percent of the peasant holdings collectivized instead of the twenty percent prescribed at the end of the five years), it is clear that the tempo of collectivization has already blown up the whole five year plan. Up to now, the official leadership has maintained silence on this point. But it would be impossible to be silent for long. To imagine that all the other elements of the plan—industry, transportation, commerce, finance—can develop on the formerly prescribed scale while agriculture makes totally unforeseen jumps, would signify to see in the economic plan not an organic whole but a simple sum of various departmental orders. Until recently it was recognized, at least in principle, that the relations between industry and agriculture ("smytchka") form the principal axis of the plan. Well, what has happened to this axis? If the "smytchka" was taken into consideration in the plan, then it must now have been destroyed by the prodigious leaps of the collectivization which nobody foresaw. On what side will an equalization be made?

At this very moment, "complete collectivization" has already aroused among the frightened leadership a certain backward movement. At what point will the commenced recession come to a halt? It is as yet impossible to foretell. It is probable that this time; also the retreat will extend much further than is required by the objective conditions. But the retreat itself is unavoidable. It is quite probable that because of the effects of the signs of inflation there will begin a revision of the slogan "The five year plan in four years".

The Bureaucracy Runs Blindly

Retreat is always a painful operation, in the military field as well as in politics. But a retreat carried out in time and in an orderly manner can prevent unnecessary losses and prepare the possibility for developing an offensive in the future. The fatal danger is always a belated retreat, panic-stricken, under fire, when the enemy is at your heels. And that is why we, the Left Opposition, are not afraid to call back the bureaucracy which is running ahead blindly. It is necessary to call a halt to the prize races of industrialization, to revise the tempo on the basis of experience and theoretical foresight, to reconcile collectivization with the technical and other resources, to subordinate the policy towards the Kulak to the real possibilities of collectivization. In a word, after the periods of "Khvostism" (the policy of dragging along at the tail of events and movements. —Ed.) and adventurism, it is necessary to take the road of Marxist realism.

The plan corrected in this sense would present a minimal variation. It would necessarily proceed from the situation which has been created up to now as a result of great successes and no less great mistakes. Such a plan cannot eliminate the contradictions that flow from the historical past and the world environment. But it must reduce to a minimum the results of mistakes, partly mitigating and partly post-

Minnesota's «Farmer-Labor» Meet

The «Practical» Politicians and Business Men Take Charge

The St. Paul convention of the Farmer-Labor Association closed March 28th after two days of gerrymandering by the small group of political adventurers who have in devious ways attained power in the organization.

Following the course marked out several years ago by men of the Starkey-Shipstead type, and with the example of the shameful campaign in 1928 as a guide, the organization was appropriated by the banker-farmer-office-holder delegates and turned over to Floyd B. Olson who «accepted» the endorsement for governor.

Out of the hundred and fifty odd delegates present, less than half represented any organization. The overwhelming majority were especially picked by the machine for the task of keeping out the platform and program of the Left wing and trade union elements. These were presented by the Hennepin County (Minneapolis) delegation, who, with a dozen notable exceptions, were members of organized labor.

The Hennepin county convention under pressure of the Left wing had been forced to adopt a series of proposals for the State convention which embodied the idea that all candidates of the F. L. P. put forward the organizational and agitational program of the labor movement in the campaign. The rank and file were for this and demanded that these proposals be embodied in the platform. They were in dead earnest about this and even succeeded in placing one of their leaders on the platform committee.

Olson had notified the convention in a brutally frank letter on the first day that «...I shall assume that if I am endorsed and elected to office as a candidate of the F. L. P., I shall have absolute independence the selection of men and women...»

Lommen, who is known in the Party as «the Steel Trust Senator», was in full charge of the platform committee. Knowing that Olson was already nominated and that the platform already prepared could not be changed, he quite naturally assumed that the demand for «absolute independence» was also already accepted. He did exactly what he was told to do; brushed aside the entire document presented by the trade union workers; and buried a couple of minor demands under a heap of words and rubbish. He handled Walter Frank, the Hennepin Co. trade union centrist, as an experienced and determined politician handles another with less experience and little determination, and brought out the most reactionary platform that has even been adopted by a F. L. gathering in Minnesota. What should have been the center of a really stubborn fight in the convention against the obvious manipulations of the machine fizzled out completely for lack of proper direction and leadership.

Under the chairmanship of the arch-reactionary Rolster, with the secretaryship in the hands of the equally reactionary Starkey, the Communists and Left wingers were denied any voice in the proceedings. The Left wing workers were unable to have their platform resolution even considered. This resolution proposed a platform of political demands coupled with trade union demands for the closed shop, for a six hour day and a five day week, etc., and also proposed a complete re-draft of the program as well as a change in the structure of the party in order to abolish individual membership and to base it upon the workers' movement.

Left Wing To Continue Fight For Fighting Workers' Movement

The slickers who came in by the individual membership route together with the trade union bureaucrats, who controlled this convention, trampled upon the workers demands and actually, in the person of Starkey, openly insulted them, by crumpling the Left wing resolution before their faces.

In spite of the feeling in the ranks of the workers against fusion with the Democrats, the manipulators in control, by the action of the convention, and in accord with the wishes of the majority of the endorsed candidates including those for the highest posts, have made fusion almost certain.

In the coming campaign and in the following period the Minnesota workers have the task before them to salvage the movement, to keep their unions out of the hands of the clique now in control of the F. L. P.; and to shape a course toward a Labor party, which must be national in scope, based upon the unions and other workers' organizations and with a class-struggle platform. The Communists in this movement, must undertake to clarify and educate the masses and to steer them towards Communism.

(The comrades of the Communist League of America (Opposition) in Minnesota have prepared a detailed analysis of the Labor Party situation in Minnesota. It will be presented to the Minnesota workers in either leaflet or pamphlet form.—Ed.)

ECONOMIC REACTION WORLD-WIDE

The depression affecting not only the United States but the leading capitalist nations throughout the world, and that brought on a huge unemployment crisis, continues. Seasonal improvement has not changed the basic condition. Uncertainty, doubt and pessimism animate even the more optimistic capitalist elements. No proposals have been set forth by the ruling interests that are likely to have any really important consequence on the mass unemployment situation.

The National City Bank, in its April bulletin, summarizes the situation briefly as follows:

«It is now evident that the failure of business to make a more rapid recovery since the first of this year is due to fact that the situation is not simply a domestic one but that we are involved in a world-wide reaction. (Our emphasis.) The fall of prices of staple commodities has been even more serious in other countries. This is most clearly seen in the state of British industry and trade...»

«The world's industries», the bulletin goes on to say, «have more than recovered their pre-war capacity, but the markets are overloaded with staple goods...Despite the improvement in the past few weeks, the aggregate volume of manufacturing and trade is still running considerably below that of the same date in 1929...»

Bosses and Government Do Nothing For Jobless

The United States government, President Hoover and state and local governmental agencies know full well the acuteness of the situation. But not one step do they take to appropriate sums of money to compensate the unemployed workers. Every remedy is sought except the ones that will really aid the jobless worker. The willing lackey of the bosses, Wm. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, warns the Senate Commerce Committee that the alternative to unemployment relief is revolution. This labor faker fears the workers' revolt that will put him and his kind on to the scrap-heap, and would like to stave off the inevitable historic event.

No responsible person or group holds out hopes for substantial change in the future. The condition of mass unemployment is of long standing. Yet investigators, Congress and other bodies are still «taking the census of the unemployed» and «awaiting more data». Public works and construction are the byword of all, but they remain on the blue-prints. None of these capitalists or politicians whisper a word about the development of large-scale economic relations with the Soviet Union.

LABOR PARTY SENTIMENT POLLED IN PHILLY

PHILADELPHIA—(FP)—By a vote of 10,575 to 7,425, readers of the Philadelphia Union Labor Record, organ of the Central Labor Union decided in favor of the A. F. of L. on-partisan political policy as against a straight labor ticket.

«Out of the maze of letters commenting on the referendum», states the Record, «most of them came from Labor Party enthusiasts, while others, evincing an opposite viewpoint, felt that while there was a growing tendency toward the Labor Party, and that it would eventually come, the time was not yet ripe.»

«What the vote did show however», sums up the Record, «is that the shadow of a Labor Party is immediately before us, if not this year, then in the not far distant future.»

NEW YORK—Three Brooklyn judges in special sessions dispensed a little wholesale «justice» by sentencing 26 members of the Independent Shoe Workers Union to 30 days in jail for violating an injunction against picketing struck plants, and contempt of court.

economic relations with the Soviet Union. Why? This is one of the genuine ways to relieve unemployment in the United States. Every worker must put this question.

Relieve Unemployment Through Broad Economic Relations with Soviet Union

Let the United States government extend long time and large-scale credits to the Soviet Union, which has always made good on its obligations, and hundreds of thousands of unemployed American workers can be employed and at the same time there is promoted thereby the development of the economy of the Workers' Republic in Russia. It is necessary to break this united front of Hoover and the bosses, Green, Woll and the labor fakers against the Soviet Union and thus against the immediate and ultimate interests of the American working masses

The workers, organized and unorganized, have a common interest in a struggle against the capitalists and their tools. To make unemployment relief mean anything, the workers must fight for the shorter workday, the 40 hour and five day week; for the abolition of the speed-up; for work or compensation at the cost of the employers and the government, to be administered by the workers' committees and organizations; for the extension of large-scale credits to the Soviet Union by the U. S. government.

20,000 Rush Ford's Plant for Work

DETROIT—Twenty thousand unemployed men gathered at the gates of Henry Ford's River Rouge plant were brutally dispersed by police who hurled tear gas bombs and laid about them with clubs. Eyewitnesses reported scores injured. Three of the jobless were arrested.

Rumors spread throughout Detroit that Ford would hire thousands of men. At 6 p. m. crowds were in front of the Ford gates, pushing to the front in a long weary vigil which they hoped would reward them with work the next morning. Monday morning they were told that the rumor was a fake. Hungry and desperate, the shivering thousands refused to leave the Rouge gates.

Hundreds of police reserves were rushed to the plant when the crowd grew angry at the deception. The jobless stormed the steel fence protecting the plant, smashing it underfoot and assailed the employment office, breaking windows and hurling missiles.

Mounted police rode ruthlessly through the ranks of the unemployed, beating with their clubs and hurling gas bombs.

Toothless Foster Silent at Party Plenum

Thursday, April 3rd marked the ending of the Plenum of the Communist Party. It can be described as the dullest, most inane and valueless Party gathering ever held in its entire history. At the opening of the Plenum a cable (where have we heard of this before?) arrived from Moscow, stating that the thesis on the economic and political situation in American was unsatisfactory and had to be revised. So discussion on the political questions was postponed till the end of the Plenum and the thesis could be changed.

The Plenum proceeded to occupy itself with lengthy and wordy general discussions. The floor was occupied largely by Johnstone, Browder and the Comintern representatives. The Plenum delegates were made up of fourth-raters. Never was the level so low.

Wm. Z. Foster did not so much as open his mouth during the sessions. He declared that he had left his teeth at the dentist! Maybe it was just as well.

The only opposition that showed itself in any way at the Plenum came from Fred Biedenkapp (ye gods and little fishes!) who had certain objections to offer on the trade union policy. Yet even this opposition, in a gathering of mediocres, was not permitted to express himself before the enlarged session but only in closed executive session...The Plenum goes down as the low-water mark in Party history and activities.

Rally Workers on May Day

etc., for the unrestricted right of press speech and assemblage; for the extension of large-scale credits to the Soviet Union by the U. S. government. These and like demands form a base for a united struggle and demonstration of workers of all political and economic views on May Day.

For a United Front

The policy of the official Communist Party in the United States, as led by Foster, Minor, Bedacht, et al unfortunately sees in May Day only a Communist demonstration. There persists the false conception that the mass of workers in the United States will rally on May Day under the leadership of the Communist Party. This by no means represents the actual development of the mass of American workers at the present time. The united front still remains one of the main levers by which the Communists will rally the workers to its banner.

Our aim on May Day should be to draw every worker into a common movement against capitalist rule and for specific demands. For the Communist Party to refuse to enter into or develop a united front movement for May Day is to limit sharply the mobilization of the workers' forces for that day. This course is wrong narrow, sectarian and has the result to divide, not to unite, the masses in a common fight against capitalism. May Day draws near, but there is still time for a broader movement. We call upon the official Communist Party to act accordingly. The Communist League (Opposition) at these conferences will work for a May Day mobilization on the above basis.

THE SITUATION AMONG THE COAL MINERS

By ARNE SWABECK

Open rebellion on a wider scale than ever before is once more the answer to the rule of corruption and reactionary policies which have long dominated the United Mine Workers Union and reduced it to a mere shadow of its former strength. Its main result to date, that of setting important working class forces into motion, notwithstanding its as yet obscure direction, may have far reaching significance for the immediate future of the American labor movement. Without recognition of these facts, a correct estimate of the events in connection with the split producing two unions, both laying claim to the title, United Mine Workers of America, cannot be reached.

The old union now even more securely lodged in the grip of John L. Lewis, with his arbitrary powers extended and his past reactionary wrecking policies given the seal of approval by a delegation largely representing locals and districts long since defunct, at the Indianapolis convention, is well known to the coal miners. As far as the rank and file membership is concerned, the past history has left its marks. The cowardly retreat of the Lewis administration in the face of the government injunction in the 1919 national strike and subsequent crushing of insurrectionary strike movements; the sell-out of the 1922 national strike, leaving some 100,000 Pennsylvania miners who had just joined the union in the lurch; the betrayal of the Pennsylvania and Ohio miners and the defeat of their strike in 1927-28; the breaking up and destruction of district after district with the suppression of all opposition, expulsions and gunman rule—these are but a few high points of Lewis' regime. They are so commonly known that it cannot be expected that the coal miners should now hark back to support the remnants of his union or even have much sympathy left for it.

A most vital question therefore is what the new union signifies and what its prospects are. Its leadership, apparent at the Springfield convention, can be recognized at a glance: A combination of forces composed of a section of the old corrupt and reactionary officialdom—the Fishwick-Farrington machine; socialist party types like Germer and Ameringer; and progressive, or one time progressive, elements, typified by Howat, Brophy and Hapgood.

Serious Errors of Wrong Analysis

The official Communist party disposed rather quickly of the significance of this new union and the perspectives for it. It was viewed merely as a matter of Peabody, the coal operator magnate, hiring some more help and already asserting his ownership of the union. That, of course, is no analysis whatever, since it fails entirely to recognize the workers set into motion or take account of the objective position of the new union. Conclusions for a policy based upon such an analysis, can lead only to further fatal mistakes, to neglect of opportunities for extension of militancy, and to even further isolation of the Left wing directed by the Party. It is upon just such mistakes that the Fishwicks and Walkers thrive and are able still to maintain a hold upon the miners.

A series of tactical mistakes have been made by the Left wing under the official Communist party direction, which in sum and substance has assumed the character of a system of wrong policies ever since the formation of the National Miners Union. It culminated in the last ill-fated Illinois strike, and to a great extent made it possible for Fishwick, Farrington and Walker to leave the sinking ship of the Lewis administration and to edge in on the crest of the naturally maturing rebellion. Moreover, the Left wing became impotent and no positive factor at all in these events.

What Does the New Union Signify?

First of all, it should be remembered that the new union came about as a rebellion against the worst features of the corrupt regime of John L. Lewis and threw into its foremost ranks, Howat, the one who to the miners symbolizes their traditional militancy. In that sense it certainly signifies a step in a progressive direction. Secondly to regard this first step as a finished product would be sheer folly. This important section of the working class set into motion, breaking the bounds of the Lewis rule, cannot be expected to be checked or cowed by a Fishwick or other, like him, coal operator agents. Thirdly, there is the objective position of the new union, with a basis of rebellion, to be considered. Competition with Lewis in delivering the goods to the operators, after what has happened to his union, does not lead one to believe that much rank and file support could be gained along that road. No; to avoid stagnation and early death it will be compelled at least to move in a forward and a progressive direction. The rank and file, who have proved their fighting capacity in the past, will be certain to press in that direction and there is no better way at present to eliminate Fishwick and all his henchmen of the old machine. This forward course should be aided and given definite meaning by the Left wing.

Rather indicative of the trend of developments, aside from the factors already mentioned, is such an incident at the Springfield convention as the driving of Fishwick from the chairmanship at the first session and the election of Howat for that post, and later on for the Presidency of the union. This is solely because Howat symbolizes to the miners their militant struggle against the operators. On the other hand, the fact that the seating of Frank Farrington—an openly acknowledged agent of the Peabody coal company, who had the crust to tell the delegates that he accepted his $25,000 a year position in order to "step aside, secure a wage cut for the membership and thus save the union"—the fact that the acceptance of his credentials could command such a big majority vote clearly show the immense strength of the reactionary Fishwick-Farrington-Walker combine within the union. But even that relationship can be changed, and more swiftly so, with a broadly organized Left wing in this union giving the necessary direction for the struggle: Or—will anybody perhaps maintain that Left wing workers have no business within a union which has in its ranks the majority of the organized soft coal miners in the United States and has union control over their jobs?

Reactionaries Strengthen Hold—But Workers Move On

At times, when workers are stirred into action, one can always observe reactionary forces, labor lieutenants of capitalism, becoming active. They endeavor to follow the tide, try to get into a commanding position and assume, if necessary, a progressive front, both to advance their own personal interests and to serve their masters at the opportune moment by using their position to check the movement, to lead it into harmless channels, and to work for its complete annihilation. At present the wrecking career of John L. Lewis has left him much discredited in the eyes of the workers; but the Fishwick machine is there to continue Lewis' role. That has been sufficiently established by its record in Illinois of wage cuts and sell-outs, expulsions of militants and the use of gunmen, police and militia against struggling miners. History has repeated itself, and this machine has been able to maintain itself in a commanding position within the present rebellious movement. The militants cannot compromise a single one of their principles with this outfit. Against it the ceaseless struggle must continue.

Concerning the so-called progressives, Brophy, Hapgood and the others who as yet, in the eyes of many miners, symbolize militancy against Lewis and the operators, there can be no illusions whatsoever. They are careerists who regard Communism as weakened and compromised today; they do not find it useful at present to cover themselves with sympathy for it. These American species of trade union centrists need to be steadily exposed for their weaknesses and vacillations. The miners must continually be on guard to thwart inevitable betrayal and treachery from them. A powerful Left wing in this new union will be one of the ways to guide this movement into militant channels, and at the same time to expose more effectively these so-called progressives who will more and more openly, as time passes, be the fig-leaf for the Fishwicks, Lewises, etc.

At this very moment additional evidence has been given to indicate that the miners will continue in motion in a progressive direction. A number of Illinois local unions have already made decisions to reinstate all members expelled by the Fishwick machine since 1928. These are the expelled militants who were with the "Save the Union" movement.

How Far Will the Rebellion Reverberate?

Unquestionably, this open rebellion and split, which brought about this new miners' union, set a precedent dangerous to reactionary machine control in other trade unions. It is certain to produce reverberations within the A. F. of L.; if nothing else, then at least the problem of facing a new "dual" union with a considerable base among the workers. Indicative of this already is the support thrown by Green to John L. Lewis as against the new union.

The impotence of the present A. F. of L. officialdom, from the top down practically speaking, and failure to secure even the slightest assistance for the workers during this crisis, has been glaring. Their absolute partnership with capitalism is now laid even more open and bare. The assaults of the employers, who take advantage of the crisis and permanent and mass unemployment, as well as the prospect for coming, perhaps turbulent, defensive struggles by the workers may also seriously shake the apparently secure position of this trade union bureaucracy.

In regard to the present status of the coal miners, one must not fail to take into account the several serious defeats suffered during the last few years, in which official treason was no small factor. The immediate effects of a serious economic crisis and the extensive displacement of labor by machine and mechanical mining, coming closely upon the heels of these defeats, will not tend to produce the swift development of offensive battles by the workers. But on the other hand, these very problems, embodying continuous assaults upon their meager existence, become bound up with active resistance—with struggle. Under these conditions, plus the quite solid phalanx presented by the coal operators toward the workers' aims, the most thorough preparations and most complete organization possible become questions of serious import. We reserve this particular point for another time. But certainly it must be admitted that with three unions in the field, this problem is, at best, yet more complex. However, that fact merely serves to emphasize the continuous process of development and change in the social world. In this case it represents a new "stage in a long struggle to reconstitute the miners' organization on a national scale on a militant basis."

The National Miners Union remains the only union resting programmatically on a class foundation; but, as has often been emphasized, despite its objectively favorable position and the courage and determination displayed, the other two unions retain the membership of these miners who are at all organized and have union control over their jobs. Will the Left wing and the Stalinized Party leadership continue its policy of trying to withdraw the best elements from these unions where they have job control, thus eliminate these elements from the industry and isolate itself from these important sections of organized workers; or will it again take up the correct Leninist position of maintaining the closest contact and extending its influence among them? That is now the decisive question. A return to a correct policy can yet make the National Miners Union—that is, the organized Left wing—an important factor both in developments in the unorganized fields as well as within the organized sections. But its methods and functions must of necessity constantly change in conformity with developing conditions.

The union still under control of John L. Lewis embraces important sections of coal miners. Within it are, particularly in the light of the latest events, possibilities to spread the ferment and to do away with this corrupt regime.

The new union is officially committed to the aim of the six hour day, the five day week and unemployment insurance. These were adopted at the Springfield convention, the presence of the Fishwick machine elite notwithstanding. These two points, the shorter work day and social insurance, were the two specific points correctly emphasized in the Comintern address to the American Party membership last year as practical demands to be put forward in the daily struggles of the workers. Their adoption by the new miners union should serve to make it a more favorable starting point for further development toward a greater militant basis. But this will require systematic, correct Left wing activities and devoted work.

In conclusion it is well to restate the position of Lenin:

"Undoubtedly, the leaders of opportunism will have recourse to all the tricks of bourgeois diplomacy, will appeal to the help of bourgeois governments, to priests, police courts, in order to prevent Communists from entering the trade unions, by all and every means to put them out, to make their work inside these organizations as unpleasant as possible, to insult, hound and persecute them. It is necessary to be able to withstand all this, to go the whole length of any sacrifice, if need be, to resort to strategy and adroitness, illegal proceedings, reticence and subterfuge, to anything in order to penetrate into the trade unions, to remain in them and carry on Communist work inside them at any cost." ("Left" Communism, page 36.)

Machines Displace More Miners

Displacement of coal miners by machinery makes a new record in the stripping operations on the Northern Pacific Railroad properties at Coalstrip, Montana. The Scientific American describes the new Bucyrus-Erie coal loading shovel that lifts out more than eight tons at a time, dumps it into gondola cars skirting the pit and returns for a new load all in 45 seconds. Operated by only two or three men it digs and loads 5,000 tons in a 10-hour shift. With the aid of a smaller loader a total of 20,000 tons are loaded in 24 hours, enough to fill 300 of the 70-ton cars recently purchased by the company.

A dirt stripping machine bites out 15 tons of earth at a chunk, depositing it a city block away at a height of 10 stories if necessary all in one operation. The pick and shovel man is out of date here.

Miners unemployment grows.

SIXTEEN COAL MINERS DIE IN BLAST

KETTLE RIVER, Ky.—Rescue workers striving to save 16 coal miners trapped by a gas explosion in the mine here, have found bodies of six. The other 10 are believed dead from heat and gas which filled the shaft after the blast had crippled the ventilating system. One victim was 17 years old and the others had wives and children.

Over 30 rescue workers, who believed the remaining bodies may not be found for several days are themselves in danger from the fumes.

The Five Year Plan and World Unemployment

poning the manifestations of a crisis, and in this manner gain a new breathing space for the isolated Workers' State. The task of the moment is a planned retreat from the position of adventurism.

However, in addition to this "minimal" variation, it is necessary to prepare immediately another, more extended variation, calculated not only on the internal but also on the external resources. The perspective of the proletarian revolution in Europe is by no means less of a reality than the perspective of a genuine collectivization of the Russian peasants. More correctly, the second perspective becomes a reality only in connection with the first. The official leadership of the Communist International conducts its policy as though we were on the eve of the insurrection of the European proletariat. At the same time, the economic plan for ten-fifteen years is constructed with the aim of "out-distancing" the whole capitalist world by means of an isolated Workers' State. This incompatibility, flowing from the reactionary, utopian theory of socialism in one country, runs through the program of the Comintern and all its policies. Nobody knows the dates, but it can be said with certainty: the conquest of power by the European proletariat is undoubtedly closer to this date than is the liquidation of the classes in the Soviet Union.

The elaboration of a minimal plan with the aim of mitigating the approaching crisis must necessarily proceed from the fact of the present isolated position of Soviet economy. But simultaneously it is necessary to create a variation based on the mutual interlinking of Soviet and world economy. The general plan elaborated for ten, fifteen or more years can under no condition be construed any other way.

Obviously, systematic and all-embracing economic cooperation of an international character will become possible only after the conquest of power by the proletariat of the advanced capitalist countries. However, the time of this overthrow cannot be foreseen. That is why preparations must be made in time, politically as well as economically.

World Unemployment and the Soviet Union

Secondly, there is every reason to count that under the conditions of the present commercial and industrial crisis, particularly in case of its further aggravation, the Soviet government, by a correct policy, can gain an incomparably larger access to the resources of the world market. Unemployment is a factor of huge importance which can make its impress upon the policy of the next future. Under the blows of unemployment the powerful edifice of the conservative trade unions and the social democracy can suffer deep-going cleavages before the infinitely more powerful edifice of the capitalist state begins to crack. But this will not happen of itself. The correct direction of the working class struggle acquires an exceptional significance in the conditions of a social crisis. The general strategic line of Communism must obviously, more than ever before, be directed towards the revolutionary conquest of power. But this revolutionary policy must be nourished by the concrete conditions and tasks of the transition period. Unemployment occupies an ever more central place among them. One of the most important slogans of the transition period can and must become the demand for economic cooperation with the Soviet Union. But the agitation under this slogan must in turn have a thoroughly concrete character, armed with facts and figures. It must base itself on a general economic plan which takes into account the ever-increasing interlinking of Soviet with world economy. This signifies that the general plan must be built upon a genuine Marxist foundation and not upon the theory of an isolated socialist society.

In the present European and world unemployment, conjunctural events are bound up with the organic processes of capitalist decay. We have more than once repeated that conjunctural cycles are inherent in capitalist society at every stage of its development. But at different stages these cycles have a different character. Just as in a person's declining years a flow of strength is always uncertain and brief and every illness, on the contrary, affects the whole organism, so the conjunctural cycles of imperialist capitalism, especially in Europe, show a tendency towards the diseased swelling of crisis by comparatively short rises. The question of unemployment, in these conditions, can become the central question for the majority of the capitalist countries. It is here that the knot is tied between the interests of the Soviet Union and the interests of the world proletariat.

The task by itself is clear and indisputable. It is only necessary to approach it correctly. But that is precisely where the difficulty lies. At the present time, the international education of the world proletarian vanguard is based on two ideas: "The Soviet Union will build socialism without you" and "The Soviet Union is the fatherland of all the toilers". The first idea is false, the second abstract. Moreover, the one belies the other. This explains the astonishing fact that the struggle against unemployment is now directed by the pocket calendar of Kuusinen and Manuilsky ("March 6th", etc.), and passes over the economic problems of the Soviet Union. Yet the connection between the one task and the other is quite obvious.

Ways to Aid Unemployed and the Soviet Union

Complete collectivization on the basis of the peasants' holdings is an adventure pregnant with a crisis in agricultural production and with dangerous political consequences. But if the possibility arises to fructify the collective farms in time by an influx of advanced technique, then collectivized agriculture could pass far more easily through the period of infantile illness and be able, almost in the next few years, to realize a greatly improved harvest, with such stocks for export as would radically change the picture of the grain market of Europe and later on put the consumption of the working masses on a new foundation. The menacing disproportion between the swing of collectivization and the state of technique flows directly from the economic isolation of the Soviet Union. If the Soviet government could even use only the capitalist credits "normal" in interstate relations, the tempo of industrialization, as the framework of collectivization, could even now be considerably enlarged.

By all these circumstances, the Communist Parties of the West are placed before the task: of tying up, in their agitation, the question of unemployment with the most essential factors in world development, and, in the first place, with the economic development of the Soviet Union. And what is needed for this?

First, to stop fooling the workers of the West with regard to the genuine situation in the Soviet Union. Together with the indisputable and immense successes arising out of nationalization, to show them honestly at the same time the internal contradictions arising out of the isolation of the Soviet Union and mistakes of leadership, and threatening it with political dangers.

Second, to explain to them that these dangers could be considerably diminished, and later overcome, by the establishment of a broad and coordinated interchange between the Soviet Union on the one side and Germany and England, for example, on the other.

Third, to demonstrate that many tens, and later on hundreds, of thousands of workers would be able to find work in the annual, planned orders for machinery and agricultural implements of the Soviet Union.

Fourth, to explain that through these conditions the Soviet Union would receive the possibility to export a far greater quantity—leaving aside wood and other raw materials—of grain, butter, meat and other products of consumption of the broadest masses.

The importation of machinery and the exportation of raw material and food products could, by an adequate agreement, be set into direct dependence upon each other, on the basis of a large plan equally accessible to the understanding and the checking of the Soviet as well as the foreign workers.

The successes hitherto achieved in Soviet industry assure a necessary basis for this entrance into the international arena. It is not a question of naked agitation, but of serious, well thought out economic proposals, motivated by all existing experience and clearly formulated in the language of technique, economics and statistics. In this connection the Soviet government must certainly proclaim its full readiness to facilitate an all-sided examination of the accomplishments of the economic agreement for interested labor organizations (trade unions, shop stewards' committees, etc.).

Unemployment and the United Front

If we approach the question politically and in the first place from the point of view of the relations towards the social democracy and Amsterdam, the task can be formulated as an application of the policy of the united front on a scale such as it has not been and could not be practiced up to now.

But is it possible to hope that MacDonald, Hermann Mueller, the trade unionists of Amsterdam and the American Federation of Labor would consent to such a combination? then is it not utopian? is it not conciliationism? etc. Such an objection will undoubtedly be made by those who yesterday hoped that the British trade unionists would declare war against imperialism for the defense of the Soviet Union (Stalin and Company). We did not nourish these pitiful illusions at that time and we do not nourish them now. But it must be considered that economic agreements of a social democratic government with the Soviets for the diminution of unemployment in its own country is nevertheless far more probable than the war of the reformists against imperialism. When the crisis develops further, the reformist governments, which base themselves upon millions of organized workers, can be driven into such a vice that they are compelled—to one extent or another—to yield to economic cooperation with the Soviet Union.

We have no desire or need to guess the extent to which it would be realized in actuality. Should the social democracy be averse even to the discussion—in the first period that is most likely to be the case—then the plan will at the very outset imbue the masses of the workers to struggle against the social democracy. In any case, the reformists in power will find it more difficult to defend themselves from an agitation based on a concrete plan of economically advantageous cooperation with the Soviet Union than from the shrill yelpings on the subject of "social fascism".

It is evident that this plan of campaign in no way assumes the softening of our political relations towards the social democracy. On the contrary, by correct direction the campaign outlined above can seriously shake the positions of the international social democracy which for the last few years received immeasurable support through the policies of Stalin-Molotov.

Socialist Construction and the International Revolution

The necessity of posing the task of socialist construction in an international sense rises out of the internal needs of the economic development of the Soviet Union and at the same time represents the most persuasive and irrefutable propaganda in favor of international revolution. But in order to enter upon this road it is necessary to learn over again. Instead of a soporific optimism, the revolutionary tocsin must be sounded. It is impermissible to be content with the ritualistic conjuring against military intervention. It is necessary to put the economic problem squarely. The Communist agitator must say openly and honestly to the masses of the West:

* The paper of the Italian Left Communists, Prometeo, says quite appropriately that if it is very difficult for the social democrats to refute the accusations that they are agents of the bourgeoisie, it is, on the contrary, very easy for them to refute the affirmation that they are Fascists. In labeling the social democrats social fascists, the Comintern renders them a signal service.

"Don't believe that socialism will be built up in Moscow without you. They have accomplished quite a bit, but they cannot accomplish everything. The many things they have already accomplished are only a small part of what is still to be done. In order to help them, such measures must now be taken as will at the same time help you workers against unemployment and the high cost of living. The Soviet government has an economic plan for cooperation with foreign industry." Everybody can familiarize himself with it. To be sure, you are not obliged to put blind faith in me or in the Soviet government. Demand the examination of the Soviet proposals by our trade unions, our party, or by our social democratic government (Germany, England). This government must be compelled finally to take the road of economic agreement with the Soviet Union because that is the more effective and advantageous road of struggle against unemployment."

But is there any hope that with their present leadership the Communist Parties are capable of a serious revolutionary mobilization of the masses? We will not decide this question beforehand. The policy which we defend has such profound roots in the objective situation and in the historical interests of the proletariat that it will finally make its way through all the obstacles. It is entirely a question of time. But that is a very important question. The duty of the Left Communist Opposition is, therefore, to use all its strength to shorten the period.

Prinkipo, March 14, 1930

 We proceed from the assumption that such a plan must be created.

STEEL SLAVES NEED UNION

PITTSBURG, Pa.—W. E. Chalmers, of the University of Pittsburgh who spent months in a survey of labor conditions in steel trust towns, among other things says:

"Contrasted with a highly efficient labor spy system maintained by steel corporations to ferret out discontented workmen, the absence of any union in the field to lead in the fight against sharp wage cuts, unemployment and long hours

"The sweep of technocracy through the steel plants," has been unparalleled in any other industry. In a 3-year period from 8 to 23% of the working force has been eliminated in various departments of typical mills. The Edgar Thompson works at Braddock a Pittsburgh suburb, have cut the number of workers from 7,000 to 5,000 in four years while maintaining production.

"On the other hand the big steel corporations have never been so prosperous. Although the fourth quarter of 1929 was one of industrial depression, U. S. Steel reported the highest profits of any quarter in its history. Record profits have been matched by record unemployment, sharp wage reductions and the maintenance of long hours.

"In continuous process departments of the bigger mills, the 8-hour day is in effect. In other departments, and in some of the smaller mills, the 10-hour day is customary, but 12-hour shifts and the 7-day week are by no means uncommon. Four thousand men are on the 7-day week in the Pittsburgh area alone. Every third week U. S. Steel Corp. workers must work 16 hours straight in 24 hours."

Efforts to organize these mills, despite discontent, will not be easy, said Chalmers. The steel trust and other companies, following the 1919 revolt, organized an elaborate spy service. Company towns are under the iron rule of company henchmen; free speech and assembly are unknown; eviction can follow agitation; and boarding house keepers are often company agents.

Our Statement to the XVI Party Congress

January, 1930

Moscow

With regard to our tasks and immediate tactics our opinion is the following: it is especially important that Rakovsky, Mouralov, Kossior and the other comrades prepare a statement for the Sixteenth Party Congress, in the name of the entire Opposition. This declaration must be addressed to the masses over the heads of the leaders. The sense of this declaration must be: to explain the preceding statement and to reply to the apparatus bureaucrats; to dissipate any possible illusions concerning Centrism; to denounce once again the nature of Centrism—in particular that which concerns the problem of the workers, the Party regime, and the problems of the Communist International.

Centrism has not changed in the slightest. It remains true to its nature, but veils itself under a barrage of "Left" phraseology.

With respect to that which concerns the International problems: we still live in a period of reaction, which draws to a close. Our tasks are: to recapture the lost positions; to systematically organize and prepare the proletariat for the coming battles; to show up the inexperience and stupidity of the high-powered politicians, who discover a revolutionary situation today in order that on the morrow, having burned their fingers thereon, they can turn their backs when it actually exists; to point out the causes for the fiasco of all the red demonstrations; to sum up all of the "bolshyization" of the Communist International, and especially to combat the anti-internationalism, the pernicious theory of socialism in one country—which debases the world wide significance of the October revolution and gives birth within our ranks to economic adventurism; to once again put forward the slogan of the Soviet United States of Europe.

What To Tell the Party

In our statement the complete truth must be told to the Party and to the working-class. They must be forewarned of the threatening crisis which, today, is closer than ever. An infinitesimal minority tends towards making concessions to Centrism at the time of the Sixteenth Congress. Their path is not ours. Without a thrust from the base we shall not influence Centrism. This "thrust" must be prepared—therein lies the problem.

One of the most serious of moments appears to be in the country—with respect to the malodorous situation in the collectives. This is explained to a large extent by the possibility of avoiding difficulties, of utilizing credits and machines. Unions of poor peasants must be organized more than ever before. Only these unions, under a proper leadership, can give a clear cut class character to the collectives and orientate the movement upon our path.

The apparatus, acting only through administrative means and by thrashing about in the press, can make the collectives the opposite of what they should be. They can become the organizational centers for all the enemy elements in the country. Unquestionably, the Kulak movement is growing. A serious warning is given by an incident which occurred in the Ivanovo-Vosnessensk district, where a crowd of peasants, under the direct influence of the Kulaks, arose to beat up the Communists.

The Centrists' Adventures

It is urgent and important that the causes for the enormous destruction of cattle be analyzed. Despite a certain halt in the grain crisis and an amelioration in the rationing of meat, the real salary of the worker shows no signs of any increase. Particular attentions must be given to the spirit of the proletariat. The Mensheviks already profit by their discontent...

By not letting up their blows against the Leninist Opposition, Centrism has favored the possibility for all anti-Soviet elements to raise their heads. The attention of the entire Opposition must be drawn to this side of the question—the resistance to counter-revolution. A pitiless struggle must be waged against these elements, the Social Democrats up to the Right wingers in the Party!

...The entire Centrist politics, with its present "Left" aspect, is more and more becoming transformed into a bureaucratic adventure. The counter-revolutionaries are rapidly mobilizing their forces, and the politics of Centrism furnish them with forces. That is why the truth must be put brutally and the problem posed in this manner so that every comrade understands: the Party course must be changed or reaction will triumph....

—A WORKER

Φ

The Communist Workers And the Opposition

At almost the same time that the Stalinist Political Bureau published an insidious "piece of news" in certain Leningrad newspapers about the supposed sabotage of a Trotskyist, the Pravda published a letter from a correspondent which is entitled "The Swan Song of a Trotskyist Group". The author of this letter, after some generalities concerning the struggle of the Party on two fronts, goes on to the following items:

"Thus, for example, a few weeks ago, at the Party purging of the nucleus in a repair shop at Belgosstroi (Minsk), a group of Trotskyists was uncovered who claimed themselves to be 100% for the Party line, and who were carrying on a desperate struggle against the Party. The group had published and distributed counter-revolutionary tracts, collected funds for an "anti-Party campaign fund", demoralized the less firm Communist and non-Party factory workers. This group was composed, amongst others, of party members and avowed Trotskyists who had been expelled from the Party. An agreement of mutual support had been concluded between the 'Communists' and the Trotskyists. Thus the 'Communists' of the factory nucleus had attempted to introduce some non-Party elements of their group into the Party. In their turn, the latter did not permit attacks upon the pseudo-Communists. At the last purging, for example, a certain Trotskyist, Reinzelberg, foaming at the mouth, had defended a member of the secret Trotskyist Party, Buslovitch."

Then the correspondent includes the discovery of the group and the statement wherein the leaders admit their errors, of a type well known in the statements which are lent to or extorted from the Oppositionists.

The Opposition and the Rank and File

This text permits of a certain number of lessons. But first, it must be pruned of its "third period" literature which is more copious than nourishing. It must be pruned also of insults and absurdities (the campaign fund against the Party, etc.). What remains is that in the large working center of Minsk, among the railroad workers, among the rank and file Communists, there was formed an organized group, unknown to the apparatus functionaries, which struggled for the program of the Opposition. The Communists of the nucleus had formed a united front with their expelled comrades and coordinated their struggle against Centrism. Thus, spontaneously, a secret fraction was formed which brought together in Communist work, the rank and file Communist workers and the expelled—and this among a group of railroad workers in a large industrial center. The life of this small group shows clearly the agreement of the rank and file workers with the Oppositionists, which the official press wears its lungs out in attempting to pass off as counter-revolution. It furthermore shows by a concrete example what work in common brings together the Oppositionists and the revolutionary rank and file workers. The example of Pravda's indignant correspondent illustrates the "united front" towards which the Left Opposition in Russia tends and which newspaper writers qualify as retreat or capitulation.

A. Nikitine can express his indignation. Such "swan songs" cannot sound too agreeable to the ear of the apparatus bureaucrats. And when the correspondent Nikitine in the end of his note states "that it is becoming incomprehensible that the Trotskyist group could have existed and could have carried on its disorganizing activity without the local organizations knowing anything about it", he only confirms the nature of the regrouping which, in workers' centers, calls the most informed of the militant workers to unite with the Opposition for Communist work.

This pretended swan-song brings us the proof that the revolutionary thought of the Russian Opposition is very much alive.

IN INDIA

Gandhi Enters the Field of «Struggle»

Last week we made clear the fundamental facts concerning the problems of the Indian revolution. We pointed out the impasse in which the nationalist chiefs found themselves, and in particular Gandhi, caught between the thrust of the masses on the one hand, and the pressure of the British on the bourgeoisie and petty bourgeois classes on the other.

On March 2nd, Gandhi, who has begun the campaign of "civil disobedience", foreseen by the Congress of Lahore, sent "an ultimatum" to Lord Irwin, the viceroy of India, which serves to illustrate this situation. In the matter of the ultimatum, it is an appeal to the kindness of the viceroy, an anguished petition full of irreconcilable contradictions. "I hold the British laws," writes Gandhi, "as applied to my country, to be an iniquity and a curse. But I feel no hatred for the British, nor the least wish to harm their legitimate rights in this country." But all this in no way approaches the duplicity of what follows. "The National Congress has declared itself for independence. The Dominion status would assure it to us. You, yourself told us so, but since your declaration I have become informed that the politicians of Great Britain had no intention of conceding it to us."

Gandhi on His Knees Before the Lord Viceroy

In the sentence which we underlined, Gandhi unites the claim for independence and that of Dominion status. He writes that Dominion status would assure independence, would lead to independence. And yet Gandhi cannot be ignorant of the fact that these are two quite contradictory things. Dominion status is a form of government in the group comprising the British Empire, accomplished to the benefit of the native bourgeoisie; it is the demand of the industrial and commercial sections of India; and it is also a promise that the Labor Party has made, but is, however, unable to keep. But independence, that is to open the door to the proletarian revolution.

Gandhi fears this second eventuality. He writes to the viceroy that his intransigence "explains the progress which the party of violence has made among us, and explains the increasing seriousness of the situation." In other words, Gandhi fears the weight of the revolutionary masses, and he also tries to make use of them as a scare-crow against the viceroy. But the end of his petition is more pitiful. He writes, "It is evidently in your power to prevent me from acting by locking me up. But, myself gone, I have the conviction that there will be hundreds of faithful companions to continue the struggle. While there is yet time, I beg of you, on my knees, to prevent the irreparable."

The Workers Will March Beyond Gandhi
Lord Irwin, viceroy of India by the grace of MacDonald, was satisfied with an indirect reply. His secretary answers to the Mahatma: "The viceroy has learned with the deepest regret that you contemplated a form of action which, manifestly, allows of a violation of the law and a danger to the public peace." Sick at heart, Gandhi is forced to renew the struggle for non-cooperation, and to preach the boycotting of British goods and the refusal to pay taxes. What can be clearer to Lord Irwin? It is a violation of the law, it is a danger to the public peace. Take care!

How far will Gandhi go in his campaign? The immediate future will tell. But when Gandhi stops, the revolutionary masses will not. It is in the perspective of this continued development of the activity of the worker and peasant proletariat, that the responsibilities of the Communist International enter.... At the moment, there is no Communist Party in India. There are only agitators who fight in the Left wing of the nationalist movement, in the bureaucratic manner of Molotov, by attacking the assemblies where Gandhi and the other nationalist leaders take the floor, instead of carrying on propaganda and class struggle activity within the masses by means of a class party. Only the formation of this party can make the perspectives favorable for the proletariat.

The Durban «Raid» in South Africa

As an example of the confidence with which policies are foisted on the Comintern sections and afterward justified, you will be interested to learn that a police raid recently carried out in Durban against defaulting native tax-payers, who, however, offered no resistance, was hailed in the Inprecorr recently as a triumph for the Comintern's new South African slogan. The raid was falsely referred to as a "native revolt" due directly to the application of the new policy which had increased the influence of the C. P. What are the facts?

1. There was no revolt. The police raided the native locations in Durban, without prior warning, to compel defaulters to pay their taxes. There was no attempt at resistance to the police, who were armed, the taxes were paid, and those who were unable to pay were put in jail.

2. The Communist Party has no influence in Durban, it cannot muster half-a-dozen members to form a branch. And so the new policy has been proved correct by a revolt which never happened, produced by an influence of the C. P. which is non-existent. These statements incline South African Communists—both in the Party and out—to laugh. But they are apparently swallowed whole in other countries, where faithful worshippers at the shrine of Stalin acclaim the correctness of his line. When will the Comintern cease to mislead? In fact, its line in South Africa is proving as true as did its line in China.

Sellier is Right - Lovestone Wrong

Ca Ira, organ of the P. O. P. (Workers and Peasants Party) of France, the newly-formed party of the French Right wing, writes on March 1: "Analyzing our manifesto, our friends from Germany (the Brandler group), after some criticisms of details, conclude that outside of Alsace we are 'the group closest to their position and the one possessing the greatest influence'. We are proud of this new approbation, sent to us by old militants. It is the commencement of our international contact."

Revolutionary Age, organ of the American Right wing, following the tip, changes the last line in its chorus of previously unstinted praise for the good French comrades, by submitting them to a timid "criticism of details." In its issue of March 1, it writes: "The Six (that is, the movement led by the six expelled municipal councillors) have taken the road of a new Party. On December 28, the conference called by the 'Six' decided upon the formation of a 'Workers and Farmers Party'... The apparent purpose of this move was to create an 'election Party', a parliamentary apparatus for the expelled. This step—which is directly contrary to the line (?) and experiences of the international Opposition movement—has set back the development of the French Opposition a great deal."

Thus the brave internationalism of the Right wing. The suspicious tardiness of the "criticism"—the P. O. P. was organized nine weeks ago and an analysis of it published a short while afterwards in the Militant—we will leave to more qualified parties to explain. But we must establish, if only on the interests of strict accuracy that Lovestone is wrong and Sellier the leading spirit of the new draft of French Mensheviks, is right; at least so far as the disputed point is concerned. And as between the stated view of Lovestone that Sellier and Co. should have constituted themselves only as a fraction for the "conquest of the Communist Party", and the action of Sellier himself in forming a new party, the more natural and proper path is the Frenchman's.

Internationalism Is Forgotten

Indeed, what have Sellier and his friends in common with revolutionary Marxism that they should form a faction to win even the shivering shadow of the once powerful Communist Party of France? Nothing, so far as we can perceive. The P. O. P. is a purely parliamentary apparatus to safeguard the municipal, and in general, the electoral bottoms of its leaders. In the trade union field (C. G. T. U.), it has allied itself with the syndicalist-reformist elements who are for the "independence of the trade unions"—that is, for their dependence upon the reformists and their masters. Its leaders' activities in the municipal councils are largely indistinguishable from those of a "Left" social democrat of, let us say, the more "solid" Austrian school. They do not even bother, as Lovestone and Brandler do out of politeness to the confused Communist workers still in their ranks, to call themselves a Communist movement; on the contrary, apparently taking Stalin's slogan as good revolutionary coin, they have labelled themselves a "workers and peasants" party. In their manifesto, which was posted upon the billboards and walls of Paris as I passed through that city two weeks ago, they addressed themselves to the good and honest French citizenry, and out of sheer oversight we presume... did not as much as mention the Bolshevik revolution or the Soviet republic. They did appeal, however, for a rally to the P.O.P. on the basis of the good old revolutionary French traditions of—1789.

After all, one can read the material of Brandler and Lovestone and find some vague mutterings about the Russian revolution and internationalism, like the incoherent babblings of a man waking out of a sleep and talking about something that happened long, long ago. But Messrs. Sellier and Co. are "sobered up", they are quite through with what they consider yesterday's bubblings of revolutionary beverages "artificially imported" from Moscow. What have they to do with Internationalism and with a revolution in far-off Russia (or any other country, it might be added)? Let Stalin build up his socialism in Russia: that's his affair. And let Brandler build his "Communist" Opposition in Germany, if he wants to. As for ourselves, say Sellier, Gelis, Chasseigne, Dunois and Co., let us build our modest little election machine in France. Everyone to his own taste! Live and let live! These are the fearless slogans emblazoned on the standards of the Right wing "international".

Travelling Toward Menshevism

At the conference to constitute the P. O. P., by the way, there was also on hand Maurice Paz, erstwhile Oppositionist of the Left. He too made his essential criticism of the Selliers the fact that they were forming a "second party". Paz has found bad company. Like him, Lovestone is little concerned with all these petty, bothersome questions of Communist principles. What is important is the question: Second party

Naval Parley Bound for «Davy Jones' Locker»

Officially the London Naval conference still exists. The issues of naval tonnage, and limitation of armament construction, minced with all the verbiage that preceded the conference, remain, today after almost three months of negotiations. Not the slightest progress has been made between the imperialist robbers.

During the course of the conference every conceivable method was employed by the Powers to bludgeon each other into agreement. From the beginning it was clear that the conference meant to establish the "agreement" of the hegemony of the British and United States fleets over the seas. The conference was an attempt to get "official" sanction from Japan, France and Italy.

The assumption of the United States to leadership in world economy and the deposition of England from her former role gave the political basis to the conference. To do away with the old watchword—"Britannia Rules the Seas"—became the object of America. In this she was successful, insofar as it dictated to Britain the ratio of naval strength giving her (United States) a free hand to roam the seas, and maintain a naval fleet second to none. What became necessary following this agreement between the two leading world powers, was to establish a form of restraint on the other powers, to establish the relative strength of Japan, France and Italy in relation to themselves.

Conference Cannot Solve Its Problems

The demand of the Japanese for a naval strength of 70 percent of the United States and England became the first obstacle. The proposal for a reduction of this ratio met the stubborn resistance of the Japanese delegation. The French position calling for a tonnage of 725,000 tons, a great part to be built by 1936, remains, despite all attempts to force France into reducing this figure. Italy stands on her original proposal of parity with France. To allow France such a high tonnage, and a fleet that, would in six years be the most modern afloat; and to allow Italy parity with France would present a direct threat to the British interests in the Mediterranean, and generally be a threat to both England and the United States.

With the growth of the intensity of contradictions between the capitalist powers, the possibility of their "agreements" become more and more slim. The prediction of the Communists that the conference would inevitably run into a blind alley has been sustained throughout the course of the deliberations. There is no solution to war under capitalism. All the problems facing imperialists prior to the organization of the conference that was to "solve" them, stand as before.

Recognizing that the probability of a five-power treaty was doubtful, attempts were made for a tripartite treaty between England, the United States, and Japan. With the hope that this would be successful, America and Britain threatened the conference that unless France and Italy would agree to the proposals for reduction of their fleets, they would proceed with a three-power agreement.

Japan threw the wrench into this wheel, by rejecting the proposals of the United States and Great Britain, that Japan accept a reduction below the Japanese figure of a 70 percent ration of the English and American party faction. And alas, it is precisely in this last question that Sellier is correct and Lovestone wrong.

It is necessary, again in the interests of strict accuracy, to conclude with one more aspect of the issue. Sellier would be wrong and Lovestone right if it were a matter of not organizing a new party but instead of that, a faction—in the socialist party, a faction allied—from the Left side, if you wish—with M. Zyromski and his friends. Indeed it is not so long ago that Lovestone, as secretary of the American Party, proposed to its Political Bureau that Party members be sent into the Socialist Party to build a "Left wing" there. Is there any reason to doubt that now, travelling with express speed away from Communism, Lovestone and Sellier will not soon realize the step that Lovestone advocated in an unguarded moment? In our opinion there is none.—M.S.

ican fleets. Italy has declared in the last week, that unless the conference would immediately agree to parity between her and France, it would be necessary for her to leave the conference.

Attempts at Security Pacts Fail

And additional attempts to revert to security pacts as a solution to the French problem at the conference met with failure. The powers evidently feel that the time is not yet ripe to enter into agreements of a political nature, at this stage of the game. They are content to play for time during this "peaceful" period of the war preparations. A political pact with either the United States or Great Britain, France claims, would enable her to lower her demand for a 725,000 tonnage ratio. But with Japan's refusal for a reduction in her demand, France's assumption of the same position, and Italy's refusal to agree to less than parity with France, the naval conference stands lifeless.

Secrecy Prevails in Conference

E. L. James in the New York Times of April 5, sums up the present situation in London in the following manner:

"Thus the complications of the naval conference do not lessen, and while there have been many interesting proposals no one knows exactly what the situation is. There has been no meeting of the conference for six weeks. There have been only private talks in the greatest secrecy, of which no record was kept. If the whole official record of the decisions of this conference were compiled, it would not fill twenty typewritten pages.

"There probably never was another conference so secret in its work. This means that if it ever gets down to making a treaty an immense amount of work must be done in setting down what has been agreed. It probably will be found that no two delegations agree on any point."

The collapse of the conference was inevitable from the moment it began. The mask of its pretensions has been torn through its complete failures. Technically the conference is continued—actually it has been dead for weeks. The conference demonstrates that under capitalism the contradictions that exist cannot be solved through peaceful means. War and capitalism are identical. The solution to this problem is the overthrow of this system of exploitation and war. It is the duty of the proletariat to destroy this system and its lackeys, to establish a system without classes, exploitation and war—a Communist Society.

STREET RAILWAYMEN ASK RAISE

PITTSBURG—(FP)—Three thousand members of the Amalgamated Assn. of Street Railwaymen are asking an increase in wages from the Pittsburg Railways Co. when the present agreement expires in May.

The union seeks a raise of five cents an hour for motormen and conductors to 75 cents per hour and a raise of 15 cents per hour to 90 cents for operators of one man cars. Negotiations have been in progress for nearly a month. No settlement has been reached. The local has been given the approval of the national officers for strike action if it becomes necessary.

Police Kill Worker at Anti-Fascist Meet

NEW YORK—Benito Mussolini, using the U. S. immigration service, reached out in a Cooper Union anti-Fascist meeting in New York to nab Armando Borghi, an anti-Fascist leader. As a result one unknown worker is dead and another wounded.

Borghi, with Vincenzo Vacirca, a socialist and both opponents of Fascism, were speakers at a Cooper Union meeting called to discuss labor strategy after the fall of Il Duce's castor oil regime. The meeting was nonpartisan and a Republican party member was chairman. Just as Borghi finished his speech a federal agent stepped on the platform to arrest him. Borghi jumped off the stage into the audience, which rose in excitement.

A city detective was being ejected from the meeting when he drew his gun and fired wildly. The shot wounded one man, glanced off, and instantly killed an Italian worker. None knew his identity nor political affiliations.

Borghi was seized for deportation several years ago, on the advice of fascist agents in Washington. Liberals and radicals put up a fight to keep him from being returned to certain death in Italy. Stays of execution had been granted to him, but he had not been notified that federal agents were after him.

ROCHESTER TYPOS SHARE JOBS WITH UNEMPLOYED

ROCHESTER, N. Y. —(FP)—Married compositors on Rochester newspapers will go on a 4-day week, while single men will work only three days weekly, under a program voluntarily adopted by the three newspaper chapels of the Typographical Union to relieve unemployment among printers here. The action follows a reduction of working forces by the newspapers.

Beating the War Drums

The periodicals of the ruling class in this country have in the past year devoted a great deal of space to the topic of war. The United States' new role as the leading capitalist nation in the world, with its search for markets, raw materials, and new fields of exploitation, brought with it an extension of its military preparations and development of every character. "Dollar Diplomacy" in its penetration into the world arena, is followed by the gun. The capitalists of this country, just as the capitalists of all other countries recognize that in order to safeguard their economic interests, the armed forces behind it are essential.

The inevitability of conflicts between the imperialists is evident through their attempts at meditation. A glaring failure of this character is the London naval conference. But the whole history of capitalist diplomacy shows the same result. Attempts at agreements, limitation of armaments, negotiations for peace, have all meant: preparation for war, the search for alignments, and the aim to discover the strength of their opponents. The imperialists recognize the inevitability of war and are continually in preparation for it. They write about it, speak of it, and are constantly on guard against the "enemy." A few weeks ago, a sham airplane battle was held in the vicinity of Los Angeles against the "red forces". This is indicative where the wind blows. At other times practice battles are fought against the fleet of Great Britain or Japan. The minds of the masses are being prepared.

War Department Calls For Free Hand

The armed forces, however, while playing a tremendous role during war, are not sufficient. The resources of the belligerent nations are the backbone of war. The organization of industry on a war basis at a moment's notice is the object of the ruling class. And so Nation's Business, the organ of the United States Chamber of Commerce, poses the question: "Who's going to win the next big war? And why?"

Assuming, and correctly so, that war is coming, this journal proceeds to promote a plan for mobilizing the industry of this country up to war strength at a moment's notice. The proposal called, "educational war orders for munitions", is set forth in a bill backed by the war department, the navy department and the Chamber of Commerce. The Bill has already had hearings before the House committee on military affairs.

In order to avoid all possible delays in the event that war breaks out, the Bill intends that the Secretary of War shall have complete power to place war orders for munitions without advertising for bids, and without being bound to award them to the lowest bidders. This would mean that the small industrial concerns would be pushed out in favor of the large industries that can over night begin the production of war implements. The War Department does not want to bother over "small concerns with no capacity worth consideration in war time."

Turning the Factories into War Machines

Nation's Business very clearly states:

"Making munitions is much more difficult and complicated than turning out trucks or tractors or pleasure cars or typewriters. Cannon must be as accurate as watches. Shells must be perfect."

"War is now a fight of the factories, a battle of machines...The nation whose manufacturing plants can most quickly be tuned up to quantity production of cannon, shells, searchlights, fuses, gun carriages, and what-not, will win a victory."

"Government plants in the United States have the capacity to fill only from five to ten percent of our munition needs in a war against another major power or combination of powers. So the matter comes down to the large, efficient well-managed establishments that in time of peace make automobiles, typewriters, sewing machines, multi-graphs, street cars, machine tools and other articles of ordinary commercial usefulness. In war the victory will go according to the way such plants have been taught beforehand their war-time jobs".

As far back as November, 1928, the Annalist in a lengthy article on the chemical industry pointed out that, while from an industrialist viewpoint the development of this industry was essential to the United States, yet of even more importance was the use to which the chemical industry could be subjected during war. The article illustrates that the chemical industry not only serves as one of the most important branches of a war-producing plant, but can without the slightest difficulty be transformed into manufacturing war products. While Nation's Business does not mention the question of the chemical industry in relation to the war, it is evident that its importance has not been minimized, since one of the writers of these war articles is E. T. Trigg, chairman of the committee for National Defense of the United States Chamber of Commerce. He is also the president of the John Lucas & Co., manufacturers of paints—a chemical industry.

All Workers to be Entrapped

It is clear that in the event of war the capitalists will utilize every conceivable force. We will witness the armed forces, the organization of industries on a war basis, the utilization of the women and children, and a virtual existence of martial law in the home country.

The war problem is of greatest importance to the proletariat. The workers bear the heaviest burden during war. Even exemption from the actual armed forces does not exclude one from participation in war. To begin now with the struggle against capitalist war is of paramount importance to the working class. This struggle cannot only be conducted with manifestos, meetings and protests. There is needed the actual organization of the masses. Such an organization against war must be carried directly into the shops. Parliamentary and legal means will not suffice. The role of the Communist must be that of leading the masses in the proper direction. To give leadership in the struggle, to help in the organization of the fight—to the destruction of capitalism. Defeat war by its own means.

POLICE BOARD APPROVES BLACKJACKING

LOS ANGELES—Police Commissioner Mark Pierce wants to see more official violence against Communists. "The more the police beat up and wreck their headquarters the better," Pierce shouted. "Communists have no constitutional rights and I won't listen to anybody who defends them." Two other commissioners agreed with this idea.

STUDENTS BACK JOBLESS AGAINST POLICE

DETROIT—Over two thousand students meeting here in a laboratory conference on social conditions have passed a resolution condemning the Detroit police department for its "brutal suppression of the unemployed and its demonstrations." It called for absolute freedom of speech and assembly at future unemployed meetings and expressed the "fraternal solidarity" of the students with their "jobless brothers and sisters."

TROTSKY ON FOSTER AND LOVESTONE

In the Revolutionary Age (March 1, 1930) the Lovestone Right wing attempts to show that the American Party in its activities and leadership is accepting the line of the Opposition. It happens, unfortunately, that this is not so. This time Lovestone quotes from the letter of comrade Trotsky to the American Opposition. In that letter Trotsky makes a scathing criticism of the then leaders of the American Party, Lovestone and Pepper. This letter also contains some views on Foster. What comrade Trotsky said in that letter written in Constantinople in April, 1929 is borne out by all events that have transpired.

In reference to the Stalin apparatus and its American lieutenants, Trotsky writes: "Lovestone and Pepper did not create this regime but they are its staff officers. I convicted Lovestone of a foul ideological falsification (see my book 'Europe and America'). Under a fairly normal regime that alone would have been enough to bury a man for a long time, if not for good, or at least to make him confess and repent...The spirit of the Lovestones and Peppers is fundamentally opposed to the spirit of the proletarian revolution."

Trotsky then discusses Foster. Lovestone, in his characteristically dishonest manner, quotes only a brief sentence from the letter, namely: "The latter (Foster) always seemed to me made of more trustworthy material than Lovestone. In Foster's criticism of the official leadership of the Party there was always much that was true and acute." Lovestone stops at this point and quotes no further. But the letter continues: "But as far as I understand him, Foster is an empiricist. He does not want to, or is not able to carry his thinking out to the end, and make upon the foundation of his criticisms the necessary generalization. For that reason it has never been clear to me in what direction Foster's criticism is pushing him: to the Left or to the Right of official Centrism...This same empiricism apparently suggests to Foster the whole form of his activity, which consists of struggling against the little devil with Satan's support. Foster tries to conceal himself with the defensive coloration of Stalinism in order by this contraband route to move toward the leadership of the American Party."

If Lovestone were honest he would have quoted the entire section the letter, but that would run against his grain. Comrade Trotsky's analysis of both Lovestone and Foster has been confirmed completely during the course of the Party events in the last year.

The MILITANT

we believe, has fulfilled a vital role in the best interests of the working class and Communist movement in the United States. It gives a true picture of the situation in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Communist International.

The MILITANT

prints the original and incomparable writings of Leon Trotsky, the leader of the Left Bolshevik Opposition, now exiled in Turkey by the Stalin bureaucracy. In so doing it makes clear to all intelligent and honest revolutionary workers, the revisionist policies of the present leadership of the international Communist movement as directed, since Lenin's death, by Stalin and Bucharin and their Centrist and Right wing supporters in the various countries.

The MILITANT

presents the views and policies of the Left Opposition in the United States, the Communist League of America (Opposition), on the labor and political problems before the American working class.

The MILITANT

has printed and will continue to print material on the events and issues in the Soviet Union, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Communist International, the writings of L. D. Trotsky, Christian Rakovsky and other leaders of the Russian Revolution, that are found in no other English publication.

The MILITANT

fights for the rebuilding of the revolutionary movement on the foundations laid by Marx and Lenin and against the Stalin-Bucharin revisionists, and thereby best serves the cause of international Communism.

We call upon our readers to help maintain the Militant by giving financial support to ensure its continued existence as a fighting weekly for the cause of Bolshevism.

Six other workers convicted in connection with the March 6 demonstration have appealed from a 60-day jail sentence for three and a $20 fine each for three.

LETTERS FROM THE MILITANTS

THE PARTY MATHEMETICIANS AT WORK

New York

Dear Comrades:

The Communist Party of the United States led by Stalinist "yes men" continue to highly exaggerate reports on the response of the workers to its appeals. If a worker in any other country would read the Daily Worker regularly for 30 to 60 days and have no other information on the economic and political situation in the United States, he would come to the conclusion that the American proletariat was rallying by the hundreds of thousands to the banner of the Communist Party.

As a result of this accepted view by the Party leaders the Communist Party is calling for a mass political strike on May First, in spite of the fact that all recent appeals for political strikes have been obvious failures. August 1, 1929 and March 6, 1930 are two recent examples of the Party's appeals for political strikes that were not at all answered by the workers. Those workers however, who picked up the Daily Worker after the August 1, International Red Day demonstration and the Unemployment rallies on March 6, were informed that hundreds of thousands of workers responded. According to the Daily Worker of April 2, 1,250,000 workers demonstrated on March 6 in every industrial center of the United States at the call and under Communist Party leadership. Is this so?

Unemployment is an immediate and burning issue for millions of workers. It is understandable why they can be set into motion on this issue. The Militant has previously accurately evaluated the March 6 demonstrations. A few additional comments may clarify further. We judge the exaggerations in relation to March 6 only insofar as New York is concerned, which was the most successful. The Party leadership and the Daily Worker states that 110,000 workers assembled in Union Square on March 6.

The March 6th New York Demonstration Counting every one present, 60,000 is the maximum figure. Probably the total crowd did not total 50,000. Of the 50 to 60 thousand assembled, at least half were present only out of curiosity. One only had to mingle with the crowd for less than 10 minutes to discover that. The writer saw many high school and college students, as well as business men, who in speaking among themselves, stated that they wanted to see the riot, while others, anti-radical to the core, asserted that they were waiting to watch the reds get beaten up. When these same persons appear in Union Square May 1, will these elements be counted as adherents of the Veterans or of the Communist Party?

The claim that 110,000 were present is ridiculous, and then to claim that they were all demonstrators does more harm than good to the Communist movement. It is, however, in general line with the Party policy to double or triple the attendance of any meeting or demonstration when a report appears in the Party press. This has resulted in any number of workers losing confidence in the Daily Worker and Party press as an accurate spokesman of the working class.

In the Unions

The same irresponsibility to be found in relations to demonstrations can also be discovered in the trade union policy of the Left wing unions under Party control. In addition to barring non-party members from playing any leading role in these organizations, the Stalinists exaggerate the strength of the Left wing organizations and constantly tell of the decay of the Right wing unions, even when it is far from the actual facts.

Untruths and Illusions. Don't Help the Communists

In New York City, where the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union has lost control of the needle trades workers to the Right wing International Ladies Garment Workers Union and the International Fur Workers Union, the Ben Golds and Rose Wortises, instead of admitting that the union is only a skeleton, do not admit past mistakes, but try to bluff the workers.

Becoming more and more disgusted by the tactics of the Stalinists, they are driven into the Right wing camp.

In the National Miners Union and the National Textile Workers Union, the same situation is to be found. The Stalinists make no attempt to face the problems of the workers, but instead take the easier path of issuing revolutionary statements. These look very good on paper but do not help to organize the workers. This policy must be ended, and in its place a program adopted that will rally the workers in struggles that will advance the workers' and Communist movement in this country. A first step should be to end the attacks on the supporters of the Left Opposition who are members of the Left wing unions. In general too, union members who are willing and capable to do work in the organizations must not be barred because of their political or lack of political point of view, as is the case now.

The "Cooperative" Cafeteria

The Daily Worker and other Party organs use up valuable space to condone the murder of comrade Blumkin at the order of Stalin, because he supported the Leninist program of the Opposition led by Trotsky. May we note a few other practices of the Stalinist Central Committee during the "Third Period"?

Up until a few months ago the Daily Worker press which prints the vicious, lying attacks on Trotsky and the Left Communist Opposition, also printed, daily the Nove Russkye Slovo, organ of the monarchist russes in the United States. Shall we say that the Daily Worker is the ally of General Koutieпов? For this white guard sheet stands on the same program as Koutieпов and the other counter-revolutionary forces who want to reestablish a monarchy.

The Communist Party disgracefully fools the New York workers by allowing the privately owned cafeteria in the Workers Center, 26-28 Union Square to use the name of Cooperative Cafeteria. When the Proletcos, a cooperative owned by the Party sold the restaurant to a private individual several months ago, the use of the name, Cooperative, was included. At the present time thousands of workers regularly use the cafeteria, under the impression that it is a left wing institution and the profits go towards the Daily Worker and the Freiheit, while actually they go in the pockets of the capitalist owner.

The proletarian members and the Left wing workers who support the Party must demand the end of exaggerations and bombast, a truthful policy in the Party press, a revival of the left wing unions on a broad basis and the ending of such treachery as the fake cooperative. Until that time all the so-called "victories" of the Communist movement in the United States are built on sand and will crumble at the first real major conflict with the capitalist class.

The capitalist class and its agents are mobilizing against the party for May Day. Let the Party answer by a united struggle in which all possible forces can participate and defeat the plans of the bosses. It is up to Foster, Minor and their associates. What will the answer be?

DIVIDENDS GO UP! WAGES COME DOWN

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Comrades:

If you are a worker out of a job and tramping the streets begging for a chance to work; or if you are still working, but your wages have been slashed to the bone, buck up and take heart, for your royal high chief and master, Big Business, is doing well. This should gladden the hearts of millions of unemployed and their families, whatever might be their present state of misery. Likewise, for all those who have been compelled to speed up and take a wage cut under threats of a layoff.

In regard to dividends for the first quarter of 1930, the Chicago Tribune, a newspaper always lavish with its praise of "Big Business," has the following to say:

"It is estimated that payments today reached approximately $550,000,000, and that for the entire month they total close to $700,000,000.

"Eight hundred important corporations and upward of 1,800 companies of all descriptions make disbursements this month. Dividend declarations during March are estimated at $427,121,988, and for the first quarter at $1,170,082,645. That was an increase of about 17 percent compared with the corresponding period of last year."

Meanwhile, the Hoover big business conferences in the early part of the winter are daily being revealed as nothing more than a get-together for the purpose to plan systematic reductions of wages. To put it over more successfully, it was necessary to adopt a plan based upon progressive stages and, cynically, salt it down with ballyhoo propaganda about no wage reductions in order to lull the unsuspecting workers to sleep, and thus to take them by surprise.

Mr. Owen D. Young, of Reparations fame, erstwhile partner of J. P. Morgan, let the cat out of the bag the other day when he made a guarded statement about necessity to reduce the standard of living of American workers in order to complete profitably, for the American capitalists, for the world trade. Nevertheless, working men and women are asked and expected to be cheerful in their state of misery. Remember, Hoover and Big Business are doing quite well.

MATTHEW WOLL PROVES HIMSELF

Kansas City, Mo.

Dear Comrades:

If any further confirmation of Matthew Woll's character were needed, the readiness with which he joins the anti-Soviet religious propagandists would be sufficient. As acting president of the National Civic Federation, Mr. Woll has been an efficient steward to the capitalist barons. And, like a trusty servant, he is alert to guard the ranks of the menials against the intrusion of any unorthodox ideas: political, economic or religious.

So Mr. Woll adds his pious voice to the hallelujah chorus now pronouncing anathemas upon the Soviet Union. He says in part:

"There is only one issue in the Soviet situation as far as Americans are concerned, and that is entirely one of principle. The question is not whether Russians are being a little better fed this year than last, or whether they are being a little more poorly fed this year than last. The question is whether or not we believe the freedom and democracy of our civilization superior to the dictatorship... of Communism."

All of this sounds suspiciously like the old war-cry, "Make the world safe for democracy." Only this time it will be, "make the world safe for God." For the nth time the world is to be drenched in blood in the name of religion—if the preachers, plutocrats and Mathew Wolls have their way. Before we go out to save God and Gold, we would request Mr. Woll to show us "the freedom and democracy of our own civilization." One suspects that, like God, they exist only in flights of rhetoric.

Woll's Poisoned Goods

The distinguished "labor leader" closes his comment, anent the Russian situation in two pithy sentences: "It is, in short, one system against another. And the conflict between the two will continue until one or the other passes from the scene. There is no such thing as compromise possible in such a conflict..." It is evident that the world at last senses something of the full truth about the Communist situation.

The first point is a naive statement for a politician of Mr. Woll's calibre to make. Of course the conflict between capitalism and communism is irreconcilable; in the very nature of things there can be no basis of compromise. On the one side are arrayed the capitalists, the preachers, the reformists, the pink-tea radicals, and the goose-stepping, so-called labor officials. On the other side stands the exploited proletariat, but wrathful and mighty, refusing any longer to swallow the poisons of religion and patriotism.

As Mr. Woll says, "It is evident that the world, at last, senses something of the full truth about the Communist situation." The full truth, realized by the workers of the world, will dissolve the economic system by which the Mathew Wolls profit, throwing both them and their capitalist masters out of jobs. We have learned to distinguish between bearers of truth and purveyors of poison. By the label on the wares, Mr. Woll cannot be placed in the former category.

1. The organization base of the Party to be the economic organization of the workers. All individual membership to be abolished.

2. Candidates of the Party to be members of the Party, who shall be pledged to the full program and who will sponsor during election campaigns and after election among other demands the following proposals:

- 100% organization of the workers. Against the Open shop.
- For the organization of a National Labor Party, based on workers organizations.
- For a 6-hour day and a 5-day week for all industries.
- For unemployment wages, furnished by taxation of profits, to be administered by the organization of the workers.
- Against the use of police, the courts or any branch of the governmental armed forces in labor disputes.
- For the abolition of all private employment agencies; workers to be employed through their organizations.
- For two weeks vacation with pay. Unanimously adopted at St. Paul Woodruff Hall, March 19, 1930.

FIVE COMMUNISTS FRAMED Corporations Make Huge Profits

Unite Working Class Forces for May Day Demonstrations

In a star-chamber proceedings in New York five Communists, including Wm. Foster, were found guilty on April 11 of unlawful assemblage and face a maximum sentence of three years in jail. They had been among the leaders of the unemployed demonstration on March 6th at Union Square.

Typical capitalist justice was dispensed from the time of their arrests till the frame-up was consummated and convictions were secured. So-called civil liberties were again mocked at by the agents of the bosses. A jury trial was denied the defendants. Three judges in special sessions court ruled on all points. No evidence was permitted to be given that stated the case and views of the defendants and the workers. Moving pictures showing that Police Commissioner Whalen had deliberately precipitated a riot were not allowed, nor could witnesses testify to the deliberate and provocative acts of Whalen's Cossacks against the participants at the Union Square demonstration. The riot was precipitated by the police on the pretext that the demonstrators could not march to City Hall to present the facts and grievances of the unemployed regarding the unemployment situation before Mayor Walker. The bosses and their governmental agents were bent on railroading the workers to prison. Sentence has not yet been pronounced. The case will be appealed to the State Supreme Court.

Thus do the capitalists show their concern for the misery of the unemployed and those who try to defend their interests.

It is necessary for all workers, workers' organizations and other groups to rally on behalf of the convicted comrades. A broad defense movement is needed. Among the issues are the right of free speech and assemblage; against the star-chamber proceedings; the right for the workers to express their grievances through demonstrations, parades, etc. without interference by the bosses' agents. Labor must show its solidarity. May Day can become one of the outstanding rallying days on this and other important issues, confronting the working class in the United States and throughout the world. Repressions of the capitalists against the workers are taking place throughout the country. In New York they have taken a most virulent form. The New York capitalists have taken the initiative and given the lead for the capitalists elsewhere.

* * *

Regarding May Day we have pointed to the necessity for a genuine united front of all working class forces against capitalism on a number of specific and burning issues before the workers; and that it is up to the Communists, especially the official Communist Party to initiate such a May Day movement. Otherwise, the May Day demonstrations will be limited, the workers' protests divided and made less effective; and to the degree of its influence, the official

RAKOVSKY'S ILLNESS

New information has come to us concerning the health of Christian Rakovsky. Our comrade has suffered a new and particularly severe heart attack. The doctors who were called to his bedside remained for a whole day. Will the Stalinist bureaucracy which exiled our comrade and his sick wife to Barnaul wait too long before permitting him to take measures for the alleviation of his condition?

Communist Party will be responsible for a division of the workers, particularly among those elements who are Communists or sympathetic to the cause of Communism.

All the conditions point to the need of a broad May Day movement. But the policy of the official Communist Party prevents this, and makes a mockery of the slogan it pretends to be for and issues; namely, a United Front of all labor on May Day. In New York the official Communist Party at the May Day Conference called to mobilize the workers for May Day, held a long talkfest, limited to its previously appointed speakers and gave no expression to delegates from the ranks and other bodies. The conference was like others for which the Party has become a laughing stock among honest and sincere elements who want to cooperate and participate in the movements of the day, such as the movement on behalf of the unemployed, etc. The

The Naval Conference «Agrees»

The Naval Limitations Conference at London is nearing its close with an "agreement". The imperialist powers and press laud the "achievements" arrived at in the conference. Yet the original aim set for the conference—a five-power treaty—did not develop further than discussions between the delegations. The intense rivalry between the belligerent countries involved at London doomed in advance a five-power treaty.

The conference in recent weeks, recognizing the attempts at a naval limitation agreement between the United States, Great Britain, Japan, Italy and France, as futile, reverted to a three-power agreement which means the exclusion of Italy and France. The negotiations in the latter part of the conference were centered in this direction. Thus the three-power treaty is attempting to establish parity between the United States and England, and a 60 percent ratio for Japan.

American Imperialism in the Ascendancy
Should the signing of the three-power agreement take place the conference will end with the following results:

1. The achievement of parity between the United States and Great Britain, signifying the destruction of the British Empire's hegemony on the seas, and its formal replacement by the United States as the leading imperialist power in the world. Such a parity would mean that Great Britain would cease in the next six years to build naval armaments. But the establishment of this parity involves a billion dollar building program for the United States, thereby destroying the myth of disarmament and placing heavier burdens upon the shoulder of the American working class.

2. The failure of the conference to arrive at its original program of a five-power treaty. The three-power treaty would not be binding upon Italy and France.

3. The complete collapse of the disarmament character of the conference.

Even the three-power treaty carries in its wake a number of difficulties. There are doubts as to Japan's signature to the treaty. Japan indicates that she will not sign the treaty until she is able carefully to study the final draft of the treaty. In addition, the present proposed treaty allows for a "safeguard clause". Recognizing that the three-power treaty would have no binding character on either France or Italy. Britain demands that such a clause be entered into the treaty, since if the other two powers strengthen their naval fleets, they will become a menace to British interests in the Mediterranean. In such a situation the "safeguard clause" would allow Great Britain immediately to begin the construction of naval armaments. This would also apply to the United States and Japan.

Thus, A. V. Alexander, First Lord of the admiralty, says: "It should of course be recognized that each of the parties to the three-power agreement will have to be covered by the terms of the treaty in such a way that they may adjust their position if the construction programs of other powers outside the agreement should make that necessary. For example, our reduced destroyer tonnage would be materially affected by an increase in submarine tonnage elsewhere. This is, unfortunately, unavoidable in the circumstances."

E. L. James, in the New York Times of April 12, says as follows on the safeguard clause: "It has been agreed that the safeguard clause shall not apply solely to Great Britain, but to all three powers...."

The entire conference was a sham. Its original program was defeated. It failed in its attempt at disarmament, and could not arrive at a five-power treaty. The alternative, the three-power treaty, is a belated attempt to "achieve" something out of the talkfest. But the three-power treaty is filled with more explosives than is suspected. The London Daily Herald, summing up the situation, says: "The gains of the conference are plain enough (!). But at the same time it would be folly to overvalue them. It has neither achieved disarmament nor assured peace."

The conference draws to a close with conditions about the same as before it began. The parity between the United States and Great Britain took place prior to the conference; Japan's ratio was fairly well established also before the conference. The only additions remained Italy and France, and they are now out of the conference proper. There has been three months of talkfest; war is in the air; preparations for it continue. The role of the imperialists needs to be exposed more than ever.

How American corporations made hay while the boom sun shone last year is further revealed by recent financial reports. Steel, oil, motors, and chemicals, all important war industries, were especially prosperous up to the time of the crash.

U. S. Steel and Standard Oil Get Huge Profits

United States Steel raked in the largest income it ever reported in peace time, paying $21.19 dividends on each of its 8,132,000 shares of common stock, as against $12.50 in 1928. Bethlehem Steel sent its "earnings" (read "unpaid earnings of its workers") up more than 100% over the previous year. It donated to each idle holder of a piece of common stock a neat $15.50 for what the Italians call "sweet doing nothing".

The Standard Oil companies, as usual, did nicely, thank you. The California unit paid dividends of $3.70 a share, while the Indiana company, the sturdiest of the family, raised the ante to $5.37. Though Vacuum Oil showed a drop of over $2,000, in net profit, its stockholders were none the poorer. By putting into practice the principle of "stabilized earnings" (for capitalists only) they were given nearly $21,000,000 in dividends instead of the previous year's $19,000,000.

"Public Service" Corporations Rake in the Dough

United Gas Improvement Co., which has subsidiaries in at least eight states, and operates the municipal gas work of Philadelphia on a private lease, is now negotiating to absorb the monster Public Service Corporation of New Jersey, controlling practically all the power, trolley, and bus service of that "commonwealth". Mid-West Utilities, presided over by one of the insullent insulls, nearly doubled its "net", but American Superpower increased its winnings no less than tenfold!

International Harvester did the largest volume of business in any twelve months in its history, due largely to an increase in its foreign trade, some of which went to Soviet Russia. Its common stock dividends went up from $5.58 to $6.65. Eastman Kodak Co., also "outstripped all previous earnings"—no wonder old George can afford to give away 50,000 cameras for advertising to twelve-year olds next summer! Radio Corporation of America, which last year swallowed the Victor Talking Machine Co., cranks, discs, and all, reports $182,137,000 gross business, compared with $155,933,00 for the two companies in the year before consolidation.

American Tobacco was another corporation which turned a "record year", increasing its total profits by 20% and rolling dividends on each share up to $13.17.

B. OF L. E. CONVENTION

A PROGRAM OF ACTION FOR THE ENGINEERS

By C. R. HEDLUND

On Monday morning, June 2nd, the Sixth Triennial Convention of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers opens in the city of Cleveland. There are many important tasks confronting this convention, which if correctly performed would improve the B. of L. E. tremendously.

Among the 21 Railroad Craft Organizations the B. of L. E. occupies a strategic position and if properly led with a progressive program would become a powerful factor in helping to solve the ever growing problems of the railroad workers.

However, in the last six years the B. of L. E. has been mismanaged and betrayed by its officials on a scale which challenges comparison in all labor history in this or any other country. During this period the organization, as well as its membership, have been swindled out of millions of dollars of its hard earned money. The officials under the leadership of the late Warren S. Stone, started out to organize one private corporation after another and proceeded to sell the worthless stock, running into millions of dollars, to the B. of L. E. members who were trained to think that their leaders, or rather misleaders, could do no wrong.

Floating Worthless Stock

After the officials had unloaded all the worthless stock they could on the membership, they then proceeded to float equally worthless bonds in the name of these worthless corporations and put on a campaign to palm them off on their victims. After the officials had obtained all the money they could by the sale of worthless stocks and bonds they helped themselves to the large funds which belonged to the various departments, such as insurance, pension, etc., and mortgaged the two office buildings which the organization owned in Cleveland, presumably, to get around the insurance laws in the state of Ohio. Mind you, they mortgaged the B. of L. E. buildings in order to get their hands on the B. of L. E. funds. These mortgages amounted to about $7,000,000 at the time of the last convention in 1927. Since that time these mortgages, which ran to the different insurance departments of the Brotherhood, have been lifted in the air and another first mortgage has been slapped on these same office buildings to secure another loan of $4,000,000 from a private source. So there is now a mortgage on the two office buildings amounting to approximately $11,000,000.

The Officials Loot the Treasury

But the process of looting had only begun. The officials needed more and more money, so they started to help themselves to the cash in the Cleveland bank and in its stead shoved in worthless paper, until the bank reached a condition where it was about to be closed by the bank examiner at the time of the 1927 convention. The officials then induced the convention to obligate the B. of L. E. for the necessary amount of cash to put into the bank in place of the worthless paper, and as a result the closing of the B. of L. E. bank was avoided.

But the B. of L. E. officials needed still more money. They had sold all the worthless stocks and bonds they could get rid of to the membership; they had helped themselves to the various funds of the organization, they had taken all the cash they could out of the B. of L. E. bank. What could they do next to get more money? They had not yet given real estate a trial. So they proceeded to get 30,000 acres of Florida real estate, also practically worthless, and a great campaign was started in every terminal throughout the country to sell real estate to the already overloaded victims, the B. of L. E. members. The fraud and deliberate lying which was used by the B. of L. E. officials and their real estate salesmen in their high pressure sales campaign to palm off worthless Florida real estate on its members will be recorded as one of the blackest spots in the wholesale betrayal of the B. of L. E. by its official bureaucrats.

But the sale of Florida real estate did not go over big. The members were not realizing any profits from their former investments in stocks and bonds, but the officials had to have still more money and the B. of L. E. and its membership constituted the only source from which the officials had any hopes of getting it. So new schemes had to be devised to pry more money loose from the membership. The idea of floating a $10,000,000 B. of L. E. bond issue was now proposed by the officials and their henchmen to the 1927 convention and this proposition was actually put over. But they succeeded in selling only a little over two million dollars worth of these bonds which were also worthless, and to stimulate the sale of these bonds, they were labeled "Loyalty Loan Certificates." The "Loyalty Loan" however, did not furnish the required amount of money needed by the officials, who by this time had become regular gluttons for "jack". More and still more money was needed and there was only one more way of getting it, and that was by arbitrary assessment of the membership. So a $5.00 special monthly assessment was levied on the members for 24 months as a starter, and to sweeten this assessment a little they gave it the name of "Loyalty Assessment". The word "Loyalty" and even the secret work were being used by the money gluttons to popularize the fraudulent Loan and Assessment.

The Real Estate Racket

It is with this background of experience that the B. of L. E. Convention convenes at Cleveland on June 2nd. However, the officials have done their utmost to keep the membership in the darkest kind of ignorance concerning these so-called "obligations" which the members are being called upon to pay. Gaglaws, obligations, secret work, censored magazines, threats, and even expulsions have been used by the officialdom to keep the membership suppressed and in line. It is hard to tell to what extent the intelligent and militant minority is organized and prepared to carry out a constructive program at the coming convention.

A Program for a Rank and File Union

The writer of this article circulated the recent St. Paul B. of L. E. union meeting with a convention program containing the following proposals, to wit:

Fire all the present Grand Officers and drive them from the B. of L. E. in disgrace; cut officials' salaries to the level of the wages received by the engineers on the best paid runs, not to exceed $350.00 per month plus necessary traveling expenses; election of all officials at each convention and no six year terms as at present; all officials, after serving two terms in office, to be drafted back on the job to run a locomotive for a period of at least one term before they are again eligible for election to office; establish a definite system of representation at conventions so that the Grand Officers cannot juggle the representation as at present; election of the editor of the Journal instead of appointment by the Grand Chief.

Repeal of the gaglaw section No. 84, page 73 of the statute, which prohibits the issuing of printed matter concerning the organization by a member; have a free speech clause inserted in the constitution; elimination of membership obligation together with ritualistic and secret work; have the convention take definite steps to amalgamate with the B. of L. E. & F.; have the new administration stand instructed not to spend another dollar of the duespayers' money for the personal benefit of the Grand Officers and other profit seekers who sunk their earnings in these mismanaged and fake corporations; also to have a law enacted which will provide that no salary increases of officers and delegates will become effective before being ratified by a referendum vote of the membership.

The Divisions and memberships in and around the Twin Cities and Minnesota are also being circularized with the above program in order to get some of these needed changes in the B. of L. E. enacted into law at the coming B. of L. E. convention.

Illinois Elections Ignore Worker's Needs

CHICAGO—On Tuesday, April 8, the state of Illinois held its primary election. A record has been established in a peaceful election in the city of Chicago, not even a single killing or kidnaping. How much stuffing of ballot boxes took place or voting by sovereign citizens "residing" on empty lots or the spacious quarters of a street vender's push cart, one may not know.

There was no lack of contest, however. During the present economic crisis and gloomy business prospects a political job may appear very enticing to any hard pressed merchant willing to serve the masters; and hence there were in cases as many as twelve contestants for one office, particularly within the "Grand Old Party". The offices to be nominated ran all the way from U. S. senator, representatives in Congress, the state legislature, county offices, judges of municipal courts and party committeemen. The Republican Party primary ballot was 3 feet long.

A Contest Between Groups

The hottest contest centered around the most cherished job—U.S. senator on the republican ballot, between Charles S. Deen the present incumbent and Ruth Hanna McCormick, daughter of the once notorious politician, Mark Hanna. The latter won in a landslide of over 200,000 plurality. She represented the typical viewpoint of middle western industrial magnates and made her main issues: no international entanglements and against adherence to the world court. Whatever that could mean to workers participating in the primary is still a puzzle. Otherwise the important campaign issues were "pure Republicanism" in the one camp and "democracy without entangling alliances" in the other. Here and there some sympathy was expressed for the distress of the farmers, but that cost as little as catering to the colored vote by McCormick through her support of De Priest, the colored congressman from Chicago. All candidates tried to be in favor of the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf. Each accused his opponents of shiftiness but only those could clinch their point who made best use of the accusation "entangling alliance with the city hall machine". In the midst of the campaign, the Chicago Tribune came lumbering forward with the "paramount" issue—wet or dry. Of course one may not forget the importance of this issue as considered by the official Communist Party in a platform plank of hybrid opportunism in the last presidential elections.

Labor Fakery Play Usual Game

Otherwise these elections and the preceding campaign produced not one word in regard to the immediate issue confronting the large population of industrial workers in the state—the issue of unemployment. Thus could the capitalist parties show their haughty contempt for the political backwardness of the American workers. But to those who are now beginning to learn, it also becomes a proof that capitalist parliaments cannot function in the interest of the workers. So-called labor candidates and "friends of labor" were not lacking, however, on both capitalist party tickets. The Illinois State Federation of Labor and the Chicago Federation of Labor ran the whole gamut of indorsing "friends" and punishing enemies in perfect harmony with the A. F. of L. policy. The actual working out of the indorsements and punishments is, of course, becoming an ever tougher task. A few reversals had to be made since it is now so difficult to distinguish the "friends" from the enemies.

Independent Political Action Raised in Federation

The Chicago Federation of Labor did not even propose to make any demands or requests upon its indorsed candidates in regard to unemployment relief. That could possibly lead beyond the policy of political neutrality. Yet one development is noteworthy. At its last meeting, just before the primary elections, the Federation discussed the report on the appalling conditions in the city public poorhouse institutions. There entered into it the dreaded

STALIN SILENT ON BLUMKIN; JACQUEMOTTE SPEAKS

In a recent number of the Red Flag, organ of the Belgian Communist Party, there appeared an account of a public meeting at which Jacquemotte, a Stalinist henchman, replying to the questions of one of our Opposition comrades concerning the assassination of Blumkin, made an apology for this assassination and declared point-blank that Blumkin was a counter-revolutionist who was struggling for the overthrow of the Soviet regime. If such a reply by Jacquemotte did not astound us, we would ask why Stalin does not reply to the question of the International Opposition.

Jacquemotte, by such filth, hopes perhaps to recover "his leading role" in the Communist Party of Belgium. This slander concerning Blumkin is accompanied in the same issue with a flaming headline over an article about a strike: "Police, Trotskyites, reformists against the workers." No further enlightenment concerning Blumkin is produced. It is clear that "objectively" our Belgian comrades are in league with the police, probably because the leadership of the movement escapes from those whose policies have resulted in the virtual liquidation of the Communist Party of Belgium.

Railroad Workers to Meet on 6-Hour Day

MINNEAPOLIS—The proposed mergers of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific roads has aroused the railroad workers to the necessity of action, if a great number of them are not to be placed permanently in the army of the unemployed.

The next meeting of railroad workers is to be a delegate conference to be held on Tuesday, April 22nd, 1930, 8 P. M. at Woodruff Hall, Prior and St. Anthony Aves., St. Paul, Minn. Each local union of railroad workers is called upon to send three delegates to discuss the six hour day and five day week.

The above meeting is being called by a provisional committee elected for this purpose at a meeting on April 3rd, which was attended by 125 railroad workers representing various crafts, including Switchmen, Engineers, Trainmen, Stationary Firemen, Conductors, Electricians, Carmen and Locomotive Firemen. This meeting was enthusiastic for further meetings and discussion to consider the problems of the railroad worker. Nearly 20 workers took the floor to discuss the six hour day and five day week and kindred subjects.

subject—partisan politics. There were still those among the delegates who thought that something could be accomplished through the old policy of rewards and punishments; but they were not listened to very attentively. The acclaim of the house was for those who spoke definitely for a break with the parties of the bosses and for a labor party. To the gullible who think of the labor party in terms of a solution even for the immediate needs, we must of necessity say: Take a good look at his majesty's labor party government of Great Britain and its relation to the unemployed army there. But the labor party as a step away from the support of the parties of the bosses is surely in a forward direction.—A.S.

Five Communists Framed

Youth Conference for May Day, called by the Young Communist League of New York refused to seat the delegates of the Youth Section of the Communist League of America (Opposition) on the ground that they were "renegades"...The idiosyncrasy of the Party leadership evidently knows no bounds. It leads to further isolation of the Communists from the labor movement, and lowers steadily the prestige of the Communists in the eyes of the workers. Among other things, by rejecting the delegates of the Left Opposition from official participation in the May Day demonstrations, the Party objectively plays the game of the bosses, who are indeed pleased to see the Communists forces divided.

It is imperative to unite all possible forces for May Day. The slogan of the United Front remains valid as the means to rally the workers and their organizations with their various economic and political views for a united and solid demonstration. The issues around which to unite the workers are many: 1. The solidarity of labor against capitalism. 2. A struggle on behalf of the unemployed, taking the form of demands for: work or compensation, the seven hour day and five day week, social insurance, abolition of the speed-up system, the unity of the employed and unemployed workers, the establishment of wide-scale credits to the Soviet Union by the U. S. government as a practical means to aid the unemployed at once, and recognition of the Soviet government by the United States. 3. A militant campaign for full civil liberties—unrestricted free speech, free press and assembly for the workers—now being ruthlessly taken in various ways from the Communists and other workers' groups by the capitalist class. 4. A broad campaign to mobilize the working class against the repressions of the workers and their organizations by the employing class and the government. 5. Mobilization of the progressive and Left wing movement for the organization of the unorganized masses into labor unions. 6. To rouse the masses for the Defense of the Soviet Union.

There are a few of the immediate issues around which to rally the workers on May Day. A prerequisite is the unity of all Communist elements to conduct a campaign along these lines.

The slogan of the official Communist Party for a mass political strike on May Day is without validity under the prevailing conditions. As promulgated now by the Communist Party, its only results will be to mislead the workers, particularly the Communist workers and sympathizers, about the true situation today. Its inevitable failure will only bring discredit to the slogan and to the Party. Phrase-mongering is the most dangerous game for revolutionaries.

In New York, reactionary organizations of World War Veterans and similar groups have secured Union Square for May Day and propose, with the full support of the Police Department, to prevent the workers from their accustomed use of Union Square for working class demonstrations on that day. Here is another direct offensive of the capitalists and the government to smash and limit the workers' and Communist movement.

May Day is Workers' Day; Union Square on May 1st, by usage and tradition, fought for and gained by years of determined organization and struggle, belongs to the organizations of the working class. The Communists and the Left wing must appeal to the masses of the workers against the insolent provocation of the reactionary forces, the militarists, the White Guardists—against the whole gang of anti-labor elements with the New York City government in the forefront. The Party cannot fight this battle alone. It must appeal to the masses. Upon the volume of support which the masses give to this appeal, clearly manifested beforehand, depends the question whether the Communists should accept the challenge to fight for the Square on May Day, or make a temporary retreat before stronger forces of the enemy. All efforts in the next days must be concentrated in going to the masses with this issue.

The Hoover government and the capitalist class continue to do everything in their power to hide the facts about mass unemployment; to lie about and distort the situation of prevailing misery; to cover up the failure of capitalism to solve the unemployment crisis as well as other ills of capitalism.

Reports are given in other columns of the Militant of the huge profits during the past year made by the numerous corporations throughout the country. Of course, the workers got, instead of profits, low wages, long hours, speed-up and then—joblessness. The census reports now being compiled by the United States government itself indicate that in round figures there are 7,000,000 unemployed workers in the United States. The panaceas of the bourgeois apologists and agents for unemployment have proved just nothing. Frances Perkins, the State Industrial Commissioner of New York, now hopes for a solution in the "next quarter century"! Other apologies for capitalism are equally valueless for the needs of the workers now without a job and the means of livelihood.

Vaster trade relations with the Soviet Union, extensive credits to the Soviet Union by the U. S. government, should be vigorously put forward by the workers, by the Communists, as practical measures to alleviate the unemployment situation in the United States and thereby also to aid the development of the Five Year Plan of the Soviet Union. Of course, no measures under capitalism can solve the unemployment problem which develops out of the system of capitalism. The basis for the complete elimination of unemployment can only be laid under a Workers' Government, a Soviet system. But it must be impressed upon the workers that broad economic relations with the Soviet government are one of the ways to aid the present situation, and that demands must be made upon the U. S. government accordingly. It is particularly unfortunate that the official Communist Party does not utilize this concrete proposal as a major slogan in the unemployment campaign.

In New York a small demonstration against the murder of the anti-fascist, Carlo Mazzola, took place in Union Square on April 12 under the auspices of the Socialists, at which anarchist representatives also spoke. Mazzola was killed by one of Whalen's policemen at an anti-fascist meeting in Cooper Union. The Communists were not permitted to participate officially in the memorial services and anti-fascist demonstration. For this the socialists deserve the severest condemnation for dividing the workers and refusing to unite all working classes forces against the fascists and their murderous acts. A United Front movement against Mussolini, against Fascism is capable of organization and development. Those serve Fascism who refuse to permit the unity of workers' forces and organizations in demonstrations, meetings and movements against Fascism. That is the manner in which the Socialists acted at the Union Square meeting. Honest anti-fascist workers who think the Socialist Party is the enemy of fascism should ask the question why the most militant fighters against it were excluded from the demonstration.

EASTON, Pa.—(FP)—Hulmeville Hosiery Co. has applied for an injunction against the South Langhorne local of the Hosiery Workers Union, to prevent picketing of the plant. About 65 workers are on strike, following the lockout of several workers.

LYNN, Mass.—(FP)—Union carpenters here have adopted the 5-day week, in an attempt to provide work for the unemployed. There is no change in the wage sale. The agreement between employers and the union expired March 31.

DISPATCHERS NEED SHORTER HOURS

CHICAGO—(FP)—Nystagmus may be the ailment that will help train dispatchers to a shorter workday and workweek. Nystagmus is not a welcome assistant but it insists nevertheless. It is the name for a pathological condition of the eye and is believed to afflict dispatchers because of their eyestrain as well as nervous strain of their exacting duties, made much more onerous by speeding up of trains and by substitution of the telephone for the rail telegraph in many offices.

Dispatchers belonging to the American Train Dispatchers Assn. are now being examined medically not only regarding their eyes but generally as the basis for new wage and hours presentations to be made in new negotiations with the rail bosses. Men at New York, Birmingham, Ala., and Omaha have been examined as sample lots and others are in line.

Wage boosts of 27 cents a day to $10.00 have been won by union dispatchers on the St. Louis-Southwestern.

WASHINGTON GOVERNOR PARDONS CROOKS, REFUSES WOBBLES

SEATTLE—(FP)—While Gov. Hartley declares he is not empowered to free the Centralia prisoners, Prosecutor Charles W. Greenough of Spokane charges that the state parole board acts "under orders of Gov. Hartley."

"Convicts are being paroled faster than they can be convicted because members of the board act under orders of the governor."

Advocates of the release of the eight Centralia prisoners are glad to see Hartley's alibi that the matter is "entirely in the hands of the Parole Board" punctured by such a "respectable" witness.

Atlanta Threatens Death to Communist Organizers

ATLANTA, Ga.—Charges involving execution or, "if the jury recommend to mercy", 5 to 20 years imprisonment, under a post-civil war statute regarding "inciting to insurrection", have been returned by the Atlanta grand jury against M.H. Powers, and Joe Carr, Communist organizers. They will be held without bail. At present they are out on $1,500 bail on charges of "unlawful assembly" and distribution of "insurrectionary literature", which involves a penalty from 5 to 20 years.

Their "offense" was holding Communist meetings of white workers and Negroes together, advising them to join forces in the struggle against boss oppression, and to defend themselves against lawless attacks by police and lynching by private citizens.

$50,000 MINIMUM BUDGET FOR YOUNG N. Y. BANKER

NEW YORK—(FP)—You can't save on $50,000 a year. That's the experience of a young New York banker, under 35, writing in Fortune. The Park Ave. apartment alone costs $7,000 a year, he writes, and house expenses are $650 a month. The nurse gets $120 a month, the cook $90, the maid $80. Theatres and night clubs take at least $1,400 a year, the doctor grabs $2,250, the wife must have $5,000 for clothes. The summer house expenses run to $5,185 for three months.

Other little expenses, including charity, run the total up to $48,475, the irreducible minimum. The young banker hopes, when his income runs to $75,000, to be able to save some money.

Leon
Trotsky

IN exile on an obscure Turkish island Trotsky writes the story of his fantastic life—his country boyhood, his revolutionary passion, his friendship and work with Lenin, his seething participation in the brooding plots that transformed Czarist into Communist Russia, his leadership of the Soviet Army, his opposition to Stalin, and his banishment.

Trotsky avoids theoretical discussion. He describes the events which and characterizes the men who brewed a mighty drama of world history in our own times—the transformation of somnolent Holy Russia into a country of experimentation, ethical and economic. Trotsky has a flair for narrative, a power in description, shrewd humor, even when the joke is on him.

Born in a remote village in Little Russia, he was arrested at nineteen as a revolutionary and spent two years in unspeakable Czarist prisons. He was exiled to Siberia, escaped, wandered through Switzerland into Paris and London, and then returned to Russia for the unsuccessful revolution of 1905. Prison again, exile again, an incredible escape by reindeer. The war came, Paris, expulsion to Spain, and forced deportation to New York, and then—the revolution! Power, tremendous power, as the directing head of an army. Intrigue, dissension, Lenin's death, and a conspiracy, and Trotsky began his third exile. At fifty, as he writes his autobiography, he is marooned on an island, on "a planet without a visa."

The Farmer-Labor Party and the Class

The following article represents chapter seven from the larger work of L. D. Trotsky entitled "Revolutionary Strategy and Tactics in the Imperialist Epoch", which, in turn, makes up the third section (yet to be printed in full in English) of the document "The Criticism of the Draft Program of the Comintern" presented to the Vth Congress by the Bolshevik-Leninist Opposition led by Trotsky. The document was suppressed by the Stalin-Bukharin regime. The first two sections were published in brochure form by the Militant and copies may be obtained through the Militant. Chapter eight of the section "Revolutionary Strategy in the Imperialist Epoch" was published in the April 5th, 1930 issue of the Militant under the title, "The Period of Right Centrist-Down-Sliding in the C.I."

After the period of the storm tide of 1923 began the period of a long-lasting ebb. In the language of strategy this means an ordered retreat, rearguard battles, strengthening of the position within the mass organizations, re-examination of one's own ranks and cleansing and sharpening of the theoretical and political weapons. But adoption of this attitude was characterized as liquidatory. As in general with this, as well as with the other ideas of the Bolshevik lexicon in late years, the very greatest abuse was practiced. No longer did they teach and train, but only sow dissension and confusion. Liquidationism signifies a renunciation of the revolution and endeavors to substitute the roads and methods of reformism for the road and methods of revolution. The policy of Lenin had nothing in common with liquidationism. Yet just as little did it have anything to do with an ignoring of the changes in the objective situation, or with the maintenance of the course of armed uprising with mere words, at a time when the revolution had already turned its back upon us, and a long-lasting road full of stubborn, systematic laborious work among the masses for the preparation of the Party for a new revolution lay before us.

The German Defeat of 1923

When a man ascends a stairs he needs one kind of motion, but when he descends it—another. Most dangerous is such a situation in which a man puts out the light, raises his foot to ascend when there are three downward steps before him. A crash, injuries and dislocations are unavoidable thereby. The leadership of the Comintern in 1924 did everything to extinguish a criticism of the experiences of the German October, like all criticisms in general. It repeated stubbornly: The workers are immediately approaching the revolution—the stairs lead upwards. Is it then astonishing that the directives of the Fifth Congress applied in the revolutionary ebb had to lead to heavy political crashes and dislocations?

In No. 5-6 of the Information Bulletin of the German Opposition, March 1, 1927, it says:

"The greatest mistake of the Lefts at the Frankfurt Congress in the Spring of 1924, when they took over the leadership, consisted in not speaking relentlessly enough to the Party of the heaviness of the defeat of 1923; in not drawing the necessary deductions, in not showing the Party, soberly and unembellished, the tendencies of the relative stabilization of capitalism and indicating a corresponding program for the impending period with its struggles and slogans. This would surely have been possible, just as well as a correct and absolutely necessary sharp underscoring of the individual program demands."

These lines showed us already at that time that a part of the German Left, who participated during the Fifth Congress in the struggle against our fictitious "liquidationism", seriously understood the lessons of 1924-25. That made possible a further approach on the foundation of principle.

The Bulgarian and Estonian Adventures

The main year of the turn was the year 1924. Nevertheless the recognition of this ensuing brusque turn ("stabilization") followed only a year and a half later. What is astonishing here, since the years 1924-25 were filled with Left adventures and putschist experiments? The Bulgarian terrorist adventure, like the tragic history of the Estonian armed uprising, form an outbreak of despair evoked by the false orientation. The fact that these attempts to force the historical process by means of a putsch remained without critical investigation, led to a relapse in Canton toward the end of 1927. In politics not even the smallest mistakes are made unpunished, much less the big ones. And the greatest mistake of them all is when the mistake is veiled, when it is sought to suppress a criticism and a correct Marxist estimate of the mistake in mechanical ways.

We write no history of the Comintern for the last five years. We bring here only a factual illumination of two strategic lines in the fundamental stages of this period and at the same time—an illumination of the seclusion from the world of the draft program, for which all these questions do not exist at all. We cannot therefore, give here a description, however general, of the inextricable situation into which the Parties of the Comintern, placed between the directives of the Fifth Congress on the one hand and political reality on the other, had to land constantly. Of course, not everywhere were the contradictions solved through such deadly convulsions as was the case in Bulgaria and Estonia in 1924.

Falsification and Fiction Replace Facts and Truth

Yet always and everywhere the Parties felt themselves bound, gave no echo to the demands of the masses, went about with eye-flaps and stumbled. In the purely Party propaganda and agitation, in the work in the trade unions, on the parliamentary tribune—everywhere the Communists had to drag the decisions of the Fifth Congress behind them like a chain. Every single Party, one more, the other less, became a victim of the false positions of departure. They chased after phantoms, ignored completely the real process, transformed revolutionary slogans into howling phrases, compromised themselves in the eyes of the masses and lost all the ground under their feet. To crown all this, the press of the Comintern was robbed of every possibility, then as well as now, to gather, to arrange and to publish the facts and figures on the work of the Communist Parties in the recent years. The leadership of the epigones, after the defeats, mistakes and lack of success, preferred to accomplish the retreat and the accounting with extinguished lights.

Finding itself in a great and growing contradiction with the real factors, the leadership had to cling ever more to fictitious factors. The Executive Committee of the Communist International lost the ground under its feet and strove constantly to disclose revolutionary forces and signs where there weren't any. In order to balance itself, it had to cling to rotten ropes.

The Illusions About the Peasantry

In the same measure that an obvious, growing swing to the Right was going on in the proletariat, there began in the Comintern the line of idealizing the peasantry, a wholly uncritical exaggeration of every symptom of its "break" with bourgeois society, an embellishment of every possible peasant pseudo-organization and a direct hochpappeling of "peasant" demagogues.

The task of a long and stubborn struggle of the proletarian vanguard against the bourgeois and peasant demagogy for influence upon the village elements most deprived of rights, was always more and more replaced by the hope for a direct and independent revolutionary role of the peasantry on a national as well as on an international scale.

In the course of the whole year of 1924, that is, the main year of the "stabilization", the Communist press was constantly publishing completely fantastic reports on the strength of the lately founded Peasants International. Dombal, the representative of the latter, declared that the Peasants International, six months after its formation, already unites within itself a few million readers.

Zinovieff on Raditch

There was enacted the scandalous incident of the leader of the Croatian "Peasants' Party", Raditch, who considered it advisable to show himself in Red Moscow in order thereby to strengthen his ministerial chances in White Belgrade. On July 9, 1924, Zinoviev, in his report before the Leningrad Party workers on the results of the Fifth Congress, told of a new "victory":

"At this moment an important turn is taking place within the peasantry. You have all surely heard already of the Croatian Peasants Party of Raditch. Raditch is now in Moscow. There is a real people's leader... Behind Raditch stands united the entire poor and middle peasantry of Croatia... Raditch has now decided in the name of his Party to join the Peasants International. We consider this event very important... The building of the Peasants International is an extraordinarily great event. Some comrades did not believe that a big organization would grow out of this... Now we are getting a great auxiliary machine—the peasantry..." (Pravda, July 28, 1924.)

And so forth and more of the same.

The LaFollette Maneuver

The leader LaFollette corresponded on the other side of the ocean to the "genuine people's leader", Raditch. The representative of the Comintern, Pepper, in order to set "the auxiliary machine"—the American farmers—into motion at an accelerated tempo, drew the young and weak American Communist Party into the senseless and shameless adventure of creating a "Farmer-Labor Party" around LaFollette so that American capitalism might be overthrown in the quickest way.

The glad tidings of the closeness of the revolution in the United States on the foundation of the farmers filled the speeches and articles of the official leaders of the Executive Committee of the Communist International at that time. In the sessions of the Fifth Congress, Kolarov reported:

"In the United States the small farmers have created a Farmer-Labor Party, which becomes ever more radicalized, comes closer to the Communists, and is being permeated by the idea of the creation of a workers' and peasants' government in the United States." (Pravda, July 6, 1924.)

So; neither more nor less.

From Nebraska came Green—one of the leaders of the LaFollette organizations—to the peasants' congress in Moscow. For some reason or other he "joined" in order, as is customary, to help along later on at a conference in St. Paul to strangle the Communist Party when it made the weak attempt to go over to the realization of the great plans of Pepper. The same Pepper who was councillor to Count Karolyi and who put on an extremely Left air at the Third Congress as a reformer of Marxism. The same Pepper who was one of those who butchered the revolution in Hungary.

Pravda of August 29, 1924 complained as follows:

"The American proletariat as a whole has not even risen to the consciousness of the necessity even of so conciliatory a Party as the English Labor Party is."

And about a month and a half before that, Zinoviev reported to the Leningrad Party workers:

"A few million farmers are being voluntarily or involuntarily pushed by the agrarian crisis all at once (!) to the working class." (Pravda, July 22, 1924.)

And Kolarov immediately added: "to a workers' and peasants' government."

The press spoke continuously about the impending building of a Farmer-Labor Party in the United States for the overthrow of capital, "on a not purely proletarian, but a class" foundation. What the "not proletarian, but class" character was supposed to mean, no sage either on this or the other side of the ocean could point out. In the long run it was only a Pepperized edition of the idea of a "joint workers' and peasants' Party" on which we will yet have occasion to speak in greater detail in connection with the lessons of the Chinese revolution. Here it is enough to establish that this reactionary idea of non-proletarian but class Parties arose entirely from the pseudo-Left policy of 1924, which, when it lost the ground from under its feet, clung to Raditch, LaFollette and the inflated figures of the Peasants International.

"We are at present witnesses,"—so proclaimed the academicians of commonplaces, Millutins—"of an extraordinarily important and significant example of the splitting away of the peasant masses from the bourgeoisie, the coming forth of the peasantry against capitalism and an ever stronger consolidation of the united front of the peasantry and the working class in the capitalist countries in struggle against the capitalist system." (Pravda, July 27, 1924.)

In the course of the whole year of 1924, the press of the Comintern did not tire of telling about the general "Leftward trend of the peasant masses", as though something independent could be excepted from this, in most cases only apparent, Leftward trend of the peasants in a period of the open Rightward trend of the workers, the strengthening of the social democracy and the consolidation of the bourgeoisie.

We meet the same mistake in political vision towards the end of 1927 and the beginning of 1928 with regard to China. After every great and deep crisis, in which the proletariat suffers a decisive defeat for a long time, the stirring still continues for a long time among the semi-proletarian masses in city and country, like the circles in the water when a stone has fallen in. So that when the leadership ascribes an independent significance to these circles and contrary to the process within the working class, points to them as a symptom of an approaching revolution, we know that this is an infallible sign that the leadership is once more going towards adventures, as with the Estonian or Bulgarian in 1924 or the Cantonese in 1927.

The Course Toward the Kuomintang

During the same period of ultra-Leftism, the Chinese Communist Party is driven for several years into the Kuo Min Tang, which is characterized by the Fifth Congress as a "friendly Party" (Pravda, July 25, 1924), without undertaking a serious attempt to investigate the class character of the latter. The idealizing of the "national revolutionary bourgeoisie" develops the greater. That is how the false Left course, with its eyes shut and burning with impatience, laid the foundation for the subsequent opportunism with regard to the East also. To give form to opportunism, Martinov was called upon, who was all the more a loyal councillor of the Chinese proletariat, having himself limped behind the petty bourgeoisie during the three Russian revolutions.

In the hunt after an artificial acceleration of the process not only Raditch, LaFollette, the mythical peasant millions of Dombal and even Pepper were clung to; a basically false perspective was also built up for England. The weaknesses of the English Communist Party gave birth at that time to the necessity of replacing it as quickly as possible by a more imposing factor. At that time arose the false estimate of the tendency of English trade unionism. Zinoviev gave us to understand that he counted upon the revolution finding an entrance, not through the narrow gateway of the British Communist Party, but through the broad gateway of the trade unions. The struggle of the Communist Party for the masses or-

Throughout the World of Labor

In the Soviet Union

First Flutterings of a New Course

The recent address of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union has two principal objects. It furnishes the directives in the collectivization campaign and for the atheist struggle. It will smash the mounting optimism of the official press which, each day, carried figures and percentages of the progress of the collectives. The letters from the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, printed in the Militant, have already established the nature of the reentrance of the Kulaks into the collectives by examples of the slaughter of live-stock and the statements of the Kulaks to the effect that the collectives are a refuge. But this criticism, which takes into consideration the realities of the class struggle, is not at all the act of bureaucrats, hungry for crushing figures.

A Rebirth for the Kulaks?

The address of the Central Committee comes out against the methods of violence employed against the peasant class, which, under the cover of increasing numbers, artificially accumulated class antagonisms. Does this address mark a change in the face of difficulties of which they cannot be ignorant? Does it mark an apparatus zig-zag from "Face to the Country", to "Liquidation of the Nep"? In any case, what can one expect from contradictory orders issued without an effective analysis and without a concrete study of the class phenomena which impose their inflexible laws? The close of the address shows a desire for conciliation with the better-off sections of the peasantry: the rule regarding non-admission of the Kulaks into the collectives should no longer be strictly applied. Henceforth members of families in which there are red partisans or soldiers in the Red Army can be admitted, provided that they vouch for the members of their families. The door opens wide. Taking into consideration the study of L.D. Trotsky, who showed that because of their inadequate technical base the collectives could become a secret point of the renaissance of the Kulaks, it can be asked whether this "turn" in the bureaucratic strategy does not make a step towards a Bucharinist course under a cover of the liquidation of the Nep. In addition the address forbids the closing down of markets and authorizes the members of the collectives to sell their products on the market.

The Changed Course Toward the Church

Besides this, the address forbids the closing down of churches except in cases wherein an overwhelming majority of the peasants actually desire it. If this were concerned only with a letting up in the mechanical struggle against religion this paragraph—however mild—could be sanctioned. It has as its purpose to put an end to the bureaucratic excesses which can align the backward elements of the peasantry against the regime. But published at the time of the infuriated offensive of the clergy of all religions against the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and against the Dictatorship of the Proletariat, it appears like an effect of the pressure of reactionaries on the revolutionary state of the workers and peasants. It is, besides, normal that the Centrist apparatus, which, through its mechanization, is deprived of the influx of revolutionaries from the masses, should be exposed to the influence of external public opinion whose tunes are played by the world bourgeoisie.

The Elections to the Factory Councils in Germany

Berlin March, 1930

The elections to the factory councils have begun. The results already known fully confirm our previous prognostications. In many shops where the Party put forward red lists for the first time, it met with appreciable success. But where it recorded dazzling victories last year, and in consequence it should at present realize the expectations and hopes of the workers, there does it suffer defeats which are sometimes disastrous. Let us take, for example, the case of the Berlin Transport Organizations where on the 15th of March the elections to the factory councils for 1930 took place. They were a heavy defeat for the Party. Against 10,797 votes in 1929 it obtained but 6,317, whereas the trade unions leaped from 5,934 (1929), to 10,146 votes.

The results of the elections to the factory councils in the red factory of Leuna, which has, with good reason, until now, passed for a stronghold of communism, are almost as catastrophic. Here the party dropped from 9,256 in 1929 to 4,763 votes, whereas the trade union list which had received 5,914 in 1929 attained 5,093, thus recording but a slight loss; the decrease in the number of workers evidenced itself almost exclusively by the decrease of Communist votes; whereas the fascist lists gained 500 votes.

These results are all the more alarming in that they refute in a very definite manner the theory of "unceasing revolutionary advances". But this is not all. The figures in these elections should not be considered alone; in relation to the figures of the syndicalist movement they characterize the fundamental processes which are taking place among the masses.

The Party Fails to Lead

Despite the rapidly increasing unemployment comprising more than three million workers, the number of trade-union adherents is constantly growing....

This turn does not at all signify that the evolution of the masses toward the Left (which we have already noted on several occasions) is now moving backwards. On the contrary, this turn proves once again, still more conclusively, that the degree of maturity of the leftward evolution is quite different from the appreciation of the role of the Party. The gathering of hundreds of thousands of workers around the trade unions characterizes the initial stage in the leftward development, the very first form of class-consciousness—the consciousness of the necessity for class organization.

If, during the past two years, when these processes become more and more distinct, the Party leadership had known how to follow a Bolshevik course, we would have today a mass Party, measured not by election figures but by its capacity for action. Instead of forming a strong Left wing in the trade unions, and gathering—without regard to the question of parties—the conscious elements into an organized minority on the basis of the class struggle, the leadership, by its lamentable oscillations, has led the Party into a state of extreme confusion.

Under these conditions the Leftward push, expressing itself through the influx into the trade unions, has resulted at the same time in a weakening of the Party and its capacity for action. Moreover, it is becoming more evident from day to day that the masses no longer have any confidence in the program of the socialist party. Dozens of Communist functionaries, determined opponents of social-democracy, have been expelled from the Party, but have refused to let themselves be pushed out of the trade unions, by obeying the Party which gave them childish and stupid orders.

The Left Is Assembling Its Forces

Up to the present, the Right wing only has benefitted from the growing dissatisfaction in the Party, but during the immediate past, significant symptoms have appeared: new oppositions are forming within the Party (especially in reaction to its trade union policies), which absolutely refuse to unite with the Right wing.

The first attempts of the real Left wing in the Party to reassemble once more, to free themselves from the traditions of the past and to adopt a new orientation on the trade union question, provoked commotions in the Right wing. In their daily Die Arbeiterpolitik of March 13th, they make a strong bid for a rapprochement with the supporters of the International Left Opposition who are still in the Party—the Wedding and the Palatine Oppositions. They give themselves up to the vain hope that some day there will be a common

The final developments will be a bitter pill for them. The Left which is regrouping itself once again, will in the future fight the Right as bitterly as it has in the past.

Strikes and Peasant Uprisings In Greece

Athens, March 12

The last two strikes of the gas and transport workers were caused by what we call the "third order" (end of year bonus) granted thus far at the beginning of each year and which certain enterprises wished to do away with, at one blow, although they represented an acquired right of the workers. The Venizelos government naturally took the part of the companies and placed at their disposal its police who were particularly brutal toward the strikers. But it was under this very same Venizelos government that this custom, now defended by the workers, was established a few years ago.

These strikes, which were not movements of a day, but lasted for a long time, were finally put down by the government and the companies, who subjected the workers to a regime of implacable terror. A large number of workers were imprisoned and deported and all the "leaders" were discharged.

The chief functionaries, sailors, officers in the navy and students in the upper classes of the polytechnic school took part in the repression. The students did not however take part of their own accord: they participated only under the threats of the school directors. This corps of strike-breakers soon found itself reinforced by a group of adherents to the yellow trade unions confederation who from the outset divested themselves of all signs of sympathy for the strikers.

The attitude of the government is neither new nor surprising to us. We had learned from its actions in a number of former strikes (the metal workers of Laurium, the workers of Elefsis, the transport workers of Piree). Thus, its reactionary role was exposed and its liberal mask torn away when it betrayed the workers at the August 1927 elections; where it clearly showed itself to be a capitalist government whose purpose was to stabilize the forces of production on the backs of the Greek proletariat.

Rationalization and Suppression

The carrying through of the projected plans in this field under the former ministry of Kafadaris (a bloc of all the bourgeois and democratic parties) could not be accomplished except through the most intensive exploitation of the workers. The heavy taxes bearing directly on the people, the successive measures directed against the workers (increase in productivity, maintenance of the twelve and fourteen hour day, frightful exploitation of women and children, reduction of wages, etc.), this was the course of capitalist stabilization.

Peasant uprisings broke out simultaneously in all parts of the country; they were extinguished by the same methods employed in the strikes (Aeropoli of Messina, Messaria of Crete, Langada in Macedonia, etc.).

In proportion as the stabilization widened, those enterprises which did not have a solid foundation, which were basing themselves on inflation, on hazardous speculations, or on fluctuations in the stock market, began to falter. It was in this manner that a certain number of important bankruptcies came about: banks (Bank of Thessaly, Anglo-American Express Company, etc.), corporations (Kyrkinis Wool, Alexopolis Soap and Oil), certain commercial enterprises such as the Palios Maritime Society.

Mass Unemployment Develops

In order to put an end to these bankruptcies which disturbed the economic situation in the country, the government adopted certain measures which increased still further the pressure on the working masses; it expunged from the order of the day in the Chamber the debate concerning the plan for social insurance, at the same time that it reduced the taxes on the corporations.

Paralleling the rationalization of industry by the union of a number of enterprises in single branches of production there was created mass unemployment, and to this permanent industrial unemployment there was added that resulting from the stopping of work in the tobacco manufacturing of Maceonia and the raisin production of Peloponnesia.

Thus the number of discontented workers and peasants increase without limit; the illusions which arose as a result of the access of the "liberal" government are vanishing; everyone seeks means for defending himself against the worsening exploitation.

The necessity for a strong Party which should have for its task the complete demasking of the government and the gathering of the workers and of crystallizing their discontent into a struggle having concrete objectives is today clearer than ever before.

The Adventurist Party Course

Such a Party cannot be other than the Communist Party of Greece. Unfortunately, there is actually in Greece no Communist Party capable of carrying through a Communist course. The small group which leads and still exists as the Party, is composed of loud-mouthed sectarian and petty-bourgeois elements who oscillate unceasingly between opportunism and ultra-Leftism but are always incapable of laying down a Communist course. Deluded by the vision of a "third period" of capitalism they call upon the workers, almost every day, through the central organ of the Party, to take part in demonstrations which collapse in ridicule and compromise the communist movement. They have provoked the trade union split and thereby have separated from themselves a considerable number of workers who today furnish the cohorts for the monarchist or democratic leaders. The enormous majority of Greek workers is actually outside the trade unions and forms a "human material" which the bourgeoisie know well how to utilize.

Our Opposition group has struggled against the trade union split; it is now striving for a unification of the trade unions and for the organization of the unorganized.

Spanish Opposition Endorse International Conference

We have been informed by the Communist Opposition of Spain on the project of an International Conference. Our Spanish comrades write:

"Already on several occasions we have clearly stated our position with reference to the necessity of a conference of the International Left Opposition. The immediate preparation of this conference is absolutely necessary. It must clearly fix our position, especially as the opposite of the splitting attitude of the Comintern, that is, it must clearly state our desire to establish unity and to revive Communist democracy within our organizations.

"The International Communist Opposition must work out its international platform immediately. The critical examination made by Trotsky of the Program of the Communist International should serve as a basis for our international platform. This platform should be the central point of the conference. We must clearly fix our estimation of the international political situation, of the trade union problems, of our position toward the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and of socialism in one country, etc.... We must not forget also to state our position toward the opportunists of the type of Paz and Urbahns. The Spanish Oppositionists, among whom there are no differences, believe it necessary to break immediately with all types of opportunists."

THE LESSONS OF CAPITULATIONS - - by Alfa

Necrological Reflections

In regard to the capitulation of Bucharin, Rykov, Tomskey there were many conjectures. Is it a shrewd manoeuvre on the part of the Rights, or else, is it a renewal of the Right-Centre bloc? These guesses in themselves are without much content. Maybe the Right Trinity dreams on the quiet about the approach of favorable conditions when it will once more raise its head; maybe, in view of the alarming economic symptoms, it is sorry for having been too hasty in repenting. It is quite possible, on the other hand, that the Stalinists consider it useful to retain the Rights near power, in case of a new turn. But not these considerations are of significance. It is politically important, that, in the very heat of the ultra-Left course, the bloc between the Centrists and the Rights was renewed, at the time that the repressions against the Lefts were not weakened but strengthened. Rykov, regardless of everything—is the chairman of the council of commissars, but Rakovsky cures his diseased heart at Barnaul with frosts of 40 degrees. Tomskey and Rykov—are on the Politburo, Bucharin on the Central Committee, but Sokolovsky, B. Mdivani, Kavtaradze—are in jail, Uglanov—is the Labor Commissar, but Blumkin is shot (yes, Blumkin is shot!). These facts are politically decisive—appraising the Left course as a whole.

However, the capitulation of all the Right leaders after the capitulation of some of the Left is a fact of no little importance in itself. The significance of these ritualistic capitulations for the fate of the Party will become clear, if we look at them not from the angle of subjective intrigues, but objective symptoms. One lesson, one conclusion flows before any other from the twists and turns of the last six years: the stubborn, systematic, tireless, suffocation of the Party.

The "Leaders" Renounce Themselves

The Party is the selection of ideas. It remains a Party only so long as the voluntary tie of ideas lies at its basis. But what meaning can ideas and principles retain, if the leaders of the Party alternately renounce themselves, and the impersonal idea-less apparatus not only asserts its infallibility, once and for all, but even declares openly to the Party: "Us you can remove only through civil war!" (Stalin in 1927.)

We remind once more: Zinoviev—the formal "leader" of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Comintern (1923-25). Zinoviev—in the Opposition repents his false struggle against Trotskyism (1926-27). Zinoviev renounces the Opposition and once more declares war against "counter-revolutionary" Trotskyism (1928-29). Bucharin in 1922—a "Trotskyist"; in 1923-26—hand in hand with Zinoviev; in 1926-28—the theoretical leader of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Comintern, the inspirer of the Right-Center course. In 1928-29—the theoretician of the Right Opposition. In 1929 Bucharin repents his errors and renounces the very views that inspired him during the whole period of struggle with "Trotskyism".

If we take Stalin from the point of view of his ideas, we find that in different periods he covered himself with the ideas of Zinoviev, Kamenev and Bucharin, at present he covers himself with fragments of the Opposition ideas, not having any of his own. But just as "truth is the result of a court verdict" (Schedrin), a reputation is the result of the apparatus manipulations...only for a certain time.

The automatization of the Party life has reached its highest limits. The apparatus does not demand the recognition of any kind of principles—it demands the recognition of its infallibility. The extortion of repenting documents does not have as its task the affirmation of a given sum of ideas. The purpose of the extortion is to instill in the Parties that any kind of counteraction or resistance, any kind of complaint, even a whisper against the apparatus, even a note in the diary, (Kamenev!) bring about only repressions or humiliation of one's ideas. "Self-criticism" serves the same purpose from another side, for it means that the Party members are obliged to criticize the same things that the apparatus "criticizes".

The Capitulations by the Right

The Party is the selection of ideas. The Party is the revolutionary tempering of characters. The Party is the shield of the class, for it is made up of the most convinced, the strongest and the most steadfast. The unification of these elements occurs gradually, under the constant checking up on events. The live texture of the Party is therefore a very complicated and sensitive texture. The Party must not be kept under a vise, just as you cannot keep a human hand under a vise: the blood circulation is interfered with, and the texture dies away.

The process of the dying away of the Party texture occurs before our eyes with the growing material pressure of the Party bureaucracy. The alternating capitulations of all the "leaders" of the Party, in groups and singly, before the absolutely idea-less apparatus, shows an unheard-of power of pressure, that stage of it when the blood-circulation of ideas in the Party ceases almost completely.

The circumstances of the repentance of the Rights are particularly striking—with the transparency of the apparatus cynicism.

Unexpectedly and without preparation humanity finds out that three of the most eminent leaders of the Party and Soviet Republic—the leader of the Comintern, the head of the government and the leader of the trade unions—have been in sharp opposition to the central committee for nearly two years, and that they consider the official policy as detrimental. How is it that this did not come to the surface? The fate of the revolution was concerned! Where were the disputed questions considered and decided? The minutes of the Central Committee are printed for the knowledge of the Party. But it so happens that the apparatus leads a double life. The questions are decided behind the scenes, and on the official scene pretended argument and voting are enacted according to previously prepared procedure. With this the Party is fed. And what is more, during the sharp opposition of the three members of the Politbureau, it was officially declared, and primarily by the general secretary, Stalin, that the rumors and talk about disagreements in the Central Committee and about a Right deviation in the Politbureau, are but revolting calumnies of the "Trotskyists". Afterward, and in a belated fashion, it is ascertained that under "calumny" one must understand that correct and exceptionally important facts were hidden from the Party.

How the Capitulations are Obtained

The open agitation against Bucharin started about a month or two before his capitulation. But the name of Rykov, as one of the leaders of the Right deviation, was mentioned aloud only on the eve of the November plenum of the Central Committee. With particular mercilessness, however, Pravda started to drag about the name of Rykov only after his capitulation, expressing the suspicion that the repentance of the Right leaders is "insincere". In other words, the central organ of the Party considers quite possible, that a person placed by the Party in the most responsible position in the government, is capable of deceiving the Party and the masses in questions involving the fate of the Party and country. The suspicion is hurled in such a tone as if it was a quite simple and ordinary occurrence. Nevertheless, it is a question of political deceit, cynical unprincipledness and betrayal of ideas on the part of central committee members, who even today, when these lines are written, stand at the head of the Soviet government, or are on the staff of its most important organs.

In passing, and already at the conclusion, the Party learns that for a year and a half the head of the government and the head of the trade unions "have been playing with the fate of the Party and revolution" (literally)—"speculated on a catastrophe" (literally!)—all this somewhere in the bureaucratic underground. The help of the Party, it appears, was not at all required to repulse their criminal "game"...How else could the press keep quiet? Nevertheless the press did keep quiet. The Party was lulled and deceived. The Right deviation appeared to be personified in the figure of...Frumkin. Publicly Rykov and Stalin fought equally against Frumkin and Shatunski, and this hypocrisy was called the struggle against the Right deviation. Whether Frumkin fought against himself—we do not know. At one time we even thought that, according to a decision of the Central Control Commission, Frumkin was sentenced beyond redemption, so that there could always be on hand a ready object for the needs of a struggle against the Right deviation. But these hypotheses were not verified.

Only after Rykov had capitulated—which would make it appear that any further struggle is rendered unnecessary—only from that moment Rykov and with him the whole trinity, were subjected to particularly unrestrained public abuse, before the Party, the population of the country and the whole of humanity in general. The Party was not at all needed for the struggle against the "conspiracy" of Rykov, Bucharin and Tomskey. The Party was assured that there is no struggle at all. But after the Rights were defeated behind the scenes, the Party was shown three political skeletons: see, this is how the general secretariat deals with and will deal with all those who get in its way.

And Radek Yelps, "Me, Too."

The method of dealing with the Right leaders is a new stage in the process of the Bonapartist transformation of the Party regime: on the stage they occupy themselves with fighting exercises against Frumkin, and afterwards, unexpectedly, the skeleton of Rykov is shown. The automatism of the struggle and the contempt for the Party are here given expression hitherto unknown.

The picture of the Party regime becomes clearer in view of the circumstances that Rykov, Tomskey and Bucharin capitulated a day after the Radeks and Smirnovs considered it necessary to capitulate "in the interests of a struggle against the Rights". On the return from exile to Moscow, Radek wailed at the stations that soon the two parts of the Central Committee will be arresting each other, and that it is therefore necessary to hurriedly aid the Center, that is, Stalin in the struggle against the Right, that is, Bucharin, Rykov and Tomskey. But no sooner did Radek finish writing the third or fourth repenting clause, then the stern leaders of the Right of the Central Committee hurried to declare that they, too, burn with the desire to help the Center in the struggle against all deviations, particularly against the Right. Thus, the encircling of Frumkin seemed to be assured one hundred percent. Smirnov and Boguslavski, who were a bit late found all the places in the raid taken. But here, as if for spite, Frumkin himself repented. The Right wing became completely transcendental.

In spite of the tragedy of the whole situation, it cannot be denied that the Left capitulators bring into it an element of buffoonery. Hurrying to join the apparatus in a struggle against the Right danger, the capitulators of the Left lead a struggle exclusively on the Left, that is, against...Trotskyism. And it is for this purpose that Yaroslavsky recognized them as "the best elements" of the Opposition. Yaroslavsky should know where are the better, and where the worse!

Zinoviev and Kamenev "Repent" Once Again

It is clear that Zinoviev could not but make use of such an explosion in the bureaucratic tangle, in order to remind everyone, that he, thank god, is alive, and as a capitulator of the first order, so to say, an aristocrat in the family of deserters, he should have all the privileges in the struggle against deviations, and before all, it is understood, against "counter-revolutionary Trotskyism".

Properly speaking, the need of a new and such a fiery repentance of Zinoviev ("conclusively fused with the Party") may appear puzzling at first: it would seem this man has already repented and could let others get in line. But in reality it is not so. The first repentance lacked the necessary enthusiasm. The lack of this element that is so hard to catch, became particularly clear to Yaroslavsky, since the Opposition published the minutes of negotiations for a struggle against Stalin, carried on between Kamenev and Bucharin, with Sokolnikov as the intermediary. Kamenev kept these minutes for the sake of Zinoviev who still remained at Kaluga for a time after his first repentance. While negotiating with Bucharin, Kamenev and Zinoviev, upon meeting Oppositionists, would sigh deeply about the split in the Opposition, complain of the sharp attacks by Trotsky, and express the hope for common work in the future. When all this was incidentally revealed, these elders of the capitulationist clan took on a morose silence. Kamenev declared that he would write a book on Lenin, for he saw that he could not bake a pudding with Stalin. But at the very moment that the general secretariat waved the scalp of the repentant Rykov over the Party, Zinoviev, very opportunely, thought of his own scalp and repented for the second time, and this time with such mighty enthusiasm, that it should have touched even the tempered heart of Molotov himself.

But in vain. In Stalin's report to the agrarian-Marxists, the "Trotsky-Zinoviev" and even "Zinoviev-Trotsky" opposition figured more than once. A careful reader could not but notice it. The fact is that among the bureaucracy the opposition was always called "Trotskyite"—so as to underline Zinoviev's lack of independent ideas. Why is it now, after Zinoviev's numerous capitulations, when he has succeeded to "conclusively fuse with the Party"—why and what for is the talk about the Zinoviev opposition now raised? Accidentally? Oh, no, there may be accidents in the five year plan, but not in the apparatus maneuvers. The design became clearer yet in the utterances of the obliging Kaganovitch. This latter, in one of his recent jubilee speeches, spoke about the opposition of Zinoviev and Kamenev, as if we had been living in 1926. The general political sense of this reference to the long-silenced struggle was clear, even without special comment. The Stalinist apparatus "hinted" to Zinoviev and Kamenev: do not think, please, that we will let you raise your heads. The leaders of the apparatus "hinted" to their underhand men: Under no circumstances must you let these equivocal repentors raise their heads! No more and no less.

Stalin's Equilibrium is Shaky

The equilibrium of the present one-man apparatus leadership rests on an extremely artificial and constrained system of theoretical fictions, historical legends and the actual seduction of the Party. This system requires the further tightening of the screws and by no means their loosening. For this system even Zinoviev is dangerous. Every one of his puffed articles in Pravda puts the international upstart, Molotov, alarmingly on guard.

Now we find out the reason that prompted the apparatus marshals to remind Zinoviev and Kamenev that they should drop forever their "senseless dreams". It seems that Zinoviev attempted to imply, during his oral repentance, that the Opposition was not wrong in everything, as the struggle of the Rights proves. And Kamenev admitted (in the diary) that Trotsky was right when he warned him and Zinoviev, that capitulation is the road not to the Party, but to political death. Kamenev always showed more inclination and ability to make ends meet than Zinoviev. But as Lenin said in his Testament: "it is no accident" that Kamenev was with Zinoviev. "It is no accident" that he went with him through all the stages of degradation of ideas in order to come to the simple conclusion that was outlined to him before: this road leads only to political death. Whatever it is, both had to repent anew, this time with enthusiasm, which, by the way, did not protect them from the public slap in the face by Kaganovitch—the Amsterdamer.

The Danger of Bonapartism

More than once we had occasion to explain that the Party regime does not take shape of itself, but is a function of policy, which, in its turn, carries through the interests, and reflects the pressure, of classes. The bureaucratization of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, beginning in 1922, continued parallel to the growth of the economic strength and political influence of the petty bourgeoisie, basing itself on the N. E. P. and parallel to the stabilization of the bourgeois regimes in Europe and the whole world, as a result of the successive defeats of the proletariat. But the Party regime is not merely a passive reflection of processes of a deeper order. The Party is a live force of history, particularly a ruling party, under a regime of a revolutionary dictatorship. Bureaucratism does not have an immaterial character. Its bearer is the large solidified bureaucracy with a whole world of interests,

BOOK REVIEW

Karl Marx, the Man

KARL MARX: Biographical Memoirs, By Wilhelm Liebknecht, 181 pages. Chas. H. Kerr and Co., Chicago.

The great figures who have helped to shape the course of history and to mould human thought are always the object of insatiable curiosity to living men. This is particularly true of those who leave a heritage of ideas on which the minds of men are fed. Light on the personalities of the great doers of the past stimulates interest in their work and aids in an understanding of it. Hence the great popularity and the great value of biography.

In this little volume devoted to memories of Karl Marx, the elder Liebknecht brings the founder of the Communist movement nearer to the proletariat as a man and father. Incomplete and inadequate as these sketches are, in consideration of the magnitude of the subject, they have a double merit. They come from one who lived in almost daily contact with Marx for nearly twelve years of his most fruitful activity; and one who, in a lifetime of struggle bore the proud name of "Soldier of the Revolution". Thus he speaks with an exceptional authority.

This is not a treatise on his doctrines. Liebknecht in the book under review, confines himself to a series of reminiscences regarding him as he revealed himself at work and play, the circle of his intimates, in the bosom of his family—in short, Marx the man, whom the world, seeing him from afar, did not know. He draws, if not a full portrait, at least an outline of that great figure which grows in immensity as the world moves to its remoulding on his ideas. And what a man emerges from that outline!

Marx forged the incomparable weapons of the workers' emancipation struggle in a lifetime of the most assiduous and painstaking inquiry and labor. Guesswork had no part in his philosophy; ignorance, especially in one filling the role of leadership, was anathema. Politics, to Marx was a study and the business of a proletarian to know, to understand. "How wild Marx could become when speaking of those hollow skulls who arrange matters for themselves with a few cant phrases." Reading these words of Liebknecht's one can imagine the lion rising from his grave to storm against those who transform his science into a system of catch-words devoid of reality and alien to his method.

Scientific Truth Was Marx's Guide

Marx was affected not a particle by the superficial judgment of the majority at the moment. Scientific truth was his guiding line. And, rejected in his own day while scamps won the applause and favor of the world, he solaced himself with the self-confident motto of Dante: "Follow your course and let the people talk." He was concerned only to establish the wisdom and verity of that course and that, thereby, it might become the course of humanity's future.

From his evaluation of politics as a science came his contemptuous disregard of "agreements" on a false foundation and his intransigence in questions of principle—a quality which marked the course of Lenin when his bolsheviks were but a handful against the world and which now marks the leadership of Trotsky in the struggle to reform the disrupted ranks of the proletarian vanguard. It was on this point that Liebknecht himself came into conflict with his teacher—not once but twice. The first time, in the days of his London exile, it led to an estrangement there, and the second time—some twenty years later, on a much larger scale—it led to Marx's trumpet blasts against the Gotha Program—a compromise knecht on this decisive question was surely his greatest shortcoming—a shortcoming he did not recognize, for he attempts to justify it in his book about Marx. But history has already answered this question in accents, which all revolutionaries must hear. On the welter of confusion which besets the Communist movement of the world, intransigence must be their motto no less than it was the motto of Marx and Lenin.

Marx knew his value, but the legends spread by his enemies about envy, spite, conceit and vanity—all this, says the author who worked under his direct guidance for more than a decade—is pure fantasy. He simply insisted on scientific exactitude in the doctrines of the proletariat. Marx could tolerate no blunting of their weapons, whether from ignorance or any other cause. Unworthy personal considerations were not even within his comprehension, to say nothing of their actuating him. "Marx was the most generous and just of men, when it came to acknowledging the merits of others. For envy and jealousy as well as for conceit, he was too great. Only the false greatness, the artificial fame inflated by incompetence and vulgarity, he regarded with a deadly hatred—as he did everything false and adulterated."

He was no man of mush, as Liebknecht draws him, but a doughty fighter and an irreconcilable hater of the false, the superficial, the pretentious. Windbags were an abomination to this man, whose words always stood for facts and deeds. "Woe to him who indulged in phrases. There he was inexorable. 'Phrase-monger' was in his mouth the sharpest censure—and whom ever he once had recognized as a 'phrase-monger' he ignored forever. To think logically and to express your thoughts clearly—this he impressed on us 'young fellows' on every occasion and forced us to study."

Marx in Exile at London

In this book, Wilhelm Liebknecht paints an unforgettable picture of the group of exiles who gathered around Marx in London in the years 1850 to 1862. During that period he was almost daily in the company of the great teacher, and his reminiscences are a treasure to the present-day disciples of Marx who seek to know the man behind the doctrine. In these pages the legendary figure is brought near, made real, alive and human. We are drawn into the march of the author's charming narrative and move in that immortal company.

The first genius of the proletariat, dead these 47 years, rises and walks before us. We see Marx as Liebknecht saw him thru his days and nights of systematic and unrelenting labor on his monumental works; we watch his furious concentration on a game of chess and his child-like exasperation when he fails to win; we see him a play-mate of his children and a plaything in their hands; we walk with the group of family and friends on a holiday to Hampstead Heath, feast with them from the picnic basket and slake our thirst with them in unforbidden British beer; we are with the lion at the grave-side of his son and see him broken and humbled in the dust of grief.

The Marx that Liebknecht describes was a pure-hearted lover of children—his own and of all. The sight of a helpless child in misery tore his great heart with pity. "Time and again he would suddenly tear himself away from us on wandering through districts of poverty in order to stroke the hair of some child in rags or to slip a penny or half-penny into its little hand. He mistrusted beggars. But when a beggar or beggar women with a whimpering child accosted Marx, then he was lost without fail. . . . He could not withstand the imploring eyes of a child."

In Marx's day as now, society bestowed its honors and rewards on charlatans, cheats and swindlers; persecutions, hardship and poverty is the coin with which it paid those who served it truly. Such was the lot of Marx. He who held up to society the picture of its future and charted the way towards it worked with humiliating want and privation as daily companions. In his ability to endure all this, and to carry on his work and hold to his course in spite of it, he has set a stern example to all those who follow his path. For years, even when the worst of this was past, the pound sterling he received every week for his articles in Horace Greeley's "New York Tribune" was his only certain source of income.

"On 'Capital' he was at work forty years—and he did work! Only a Marx can work so. And I am not exaggerating when I say: The worst paid laborer in Germany has received more wages in forty years than Marx did for a salary."

The economic hardships suffered by Marx and his family were "not a solitary case of want, such as anybody may meet with, especially in a foreign country where points of recourse are scarce; the misery of exile lasted for years in its most acute form for Marx and his family."

Marx the Teacher

For the exiles grouped around him in London Marx was a teacher who forced them to respect knowledge as indispensable in a revolutionist and to labor to acquire it. In such an atmosphere his first disciples were trained. While the superficial revolutionaries, like many who have come after them, were substituting wishes for knowledge and reality, intoxicating themselves with phrases about the revolution which was to start "tomorrow," Liebknecht tells of the pupils of Marx "sitting in the British Museum and trying to educate ourselves and to prepare arms and ammunition for the battles of the future."

This was Marx's way to train the leaders of the proletariat and make them fit for their occupations. "To learn! To learn! This was the categorical imperative he frequently enough loudly shouted to us, but it also was expressed by his example, yea, by the sole aspect of this forever strenuously working mind."

These are golden words for the guidance and inspiration of the young Communists—and not only for the young ones—who are enlisting in the great battle for restoration of Marxism under the banner of the Opposition. Phrase-mongering ignorance has had its evil day in the ranks of the workers vanguard. Disorganization and defeat are the fruit of it. Those who aspire to re-form the disrupted movement will be successful only insofar as they master the basic truths of Marxism and learn how to apply them as a guide to action. This knowledge will not fall from heaven; it will be acquired only by those who have the mind and the will to study, as Marx required of his first disciples. Wilhelm Liebknecht's little volume of reminiscences will be an aid and stimulus in this direction. It ought to have a place on the bookshelf of every revolutionary worker.—J. P. C.

Harvester Profits Soar; Lay off Men

CHICAGO—In the face of record profits disclosed in the annual report of the International Harvester Co., the farm machinery trust is laying off men by hundreds in its various plants, according to union reports. The 1929 velvet of Alexander Legge's corporation, the presidency of which he resigned to administer farm relief for Hoover, was $36,779,998. This unprecedented net profit was just about as large as the entire gross profit in 1927.

At the Milwaukee division of the harvester half of the men have been laid off and in some departments he employment is in a still worse state. The crankshaft department has only 16 out of 46 men left and in the piston and sleeve department just three men are working in place of the former shifts of 48. The trust refused requests from the workers that the work be spread on a 8-hour day, 5-day week basis. The men still on payroll are being worked 9 hours a day and Saturdays.

Total assets of Legge's trust rose from $346,120,486 at the beginning of 1929 to $348,078,322 at the beginning of this year.

NEWARK JOBLESS HAUNT NEWSPAPER OFFICE TO SCAN WANT ADS

NEWARK, N. J.—(FP)—Mobbs of ragged and hungry men, sometimes as many as 1,500 of them, crowd the street around the office of the Newark Evening News, day after day. They gather at dawn and wait, clutching pennies in their hands, to purchase the first edition and search the help-wanted columns for possible jobs.

Shortly before noon, when the first papers are carried from the building and offered for sale, the mob presses in and fights for papers. Many who haven't even 2 cents to buy a paper crowd around their more fortunate brothers to read over their shoulders.

The News, in a full page message in Editor and Publisher, addressed to potential advertisers says: "Always plenty of work and money to spend in Newark. Periodical Hard Times Are Practically Unknown. An industrial Status such as this accounts for the perennial condition of prosperity with which Newark is blessed."

The Lessons of Capitulations

In this way, like many other secondary and superstructural factors, the Party regime—in known and very wide limits—acquires an independent role. Moreover it becomes the center of all deviations, errors, dangers, contradictions and mistakes. It now becomes that link in the general chain, through the medium of which it is possible to get to its other links. Maybe it is still more correct to say, that the Party regime became that Gordian knot which the Party must disentangle at all cost, so that there may be no chance for Bonapartism to cut it with a sword.

* It is understood that Kaganovitch in his time went through the whole policy of Stalin to the Right. In 1926 the Stalinites condemned the Profintern to liquidation, through its unification with the Amsterdam Trade Union International. Every reference of the Profintern was eliminated from the constitution of the Soviet trade unions. Getting scared of the Opposition, Stalin retreated at the very last moment. Kaganovitch succeeded, however, to read a report in Charkov, in which he defended the entry into Amsterdam with arguments that would do honor to any social-democrat. But no sooner did the book with the speeches see the light of day, then retreat was sounded from Moscow. Kaganovitch then declared in the press that...the stenographer understood him wrongly and that he did not at all have intentions of entering Amsterdam, but burdened with work he had no chance to edit his speech. Since then Kaganovitch got the additional name: the Amsterdamer.

EXPOSE REVOLTING CONDITIONS IN CANNERIES

NEW YORK—Conditions in fruit and vegetable canneries in New York state are ghastly and revolting, it is revealed in the report of a thorough investigation conducted last summer by the Consumers League of New York. The report was read at the League's annual meeting.

Conditions since an official state investigation in 1911 are virtually unchanged. The industry largely is carried on by overworked women and girls, working in unsanitary and unheated shacks, for from $10 to $12 a week. Illegal overtime is common and housing conditions are wretched, the league reports. As a result of the overwork, the women are too fatigued to make proper selection of the food, and much is canned that should not be eaten. More than 5,000 women do seasonal work in New York canneries.

I, before me, a Notary in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Martin Abern, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Business Manager of the Militant and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management, etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 411, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor and business managers are: Publisher: Communist League of America (Opposition) 25 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. Editor: None.

Managing Editor: Max Shachtman, 25 Third Ave. New York, N. Y. Business Manager: Martin Abern, 25 Third Avenue, New York City.

2. That the owner is: Communist League of America (Opposition), 25 Third Avenue, N. Y. C. Martin Abern, 25 Third Avenue, N. Y. C. J. P. Cannon, 25 Third Avenue, N. Y. C. Max Shachtman, 25 Third Ave. N. Y. C. Maurice Spector, 25 Third Avenue, N. Y. C. Arne Swaback, 25 Third Ave. N. Y. C.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities, in a capacity other than of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

Martin Abern, Business Manager.

LETTERS FROM THE MILITANTS

THE ESTHONIAN PRESS HEWS TO PARTY LINE—THE RESULTS

Dear Comrades:

One foreign language Communist paper that does not need constant coaxing and reminding by the Party to keep straight on the "Line", is the Estonian weekly, Uus Ilm. This paper, in fact, tries its utmost to keep away ahead of the fixed line, by multiplying all the exaggerations of its editor—the Daily Worker, in the hope of putting its front beyond any question of possible "disloyalty".

When the Daily Worker reported after the 6th of March demonstrations that a "hundred thousand workers demonstrated in Union Square", and "two were killed" (in Germany), the Uus Ilm came out and printed in large type over its front page: "200,000 workers fight police; four killed in Union Square". Believe it or not—there it stood, black on white, for the tomfoolery and misguidance of the Estonian workers who still read the sheet. And, remember that the last statement was made seven days after the demonstration—14th of March, when all accounts, including the number of dead (?) were supposed to be checked up and gone over!

Such insane exaggerations and misstatements, that have systematically appeared on the pages of Uus Ilm for the last two years, and particularly for the last six months, ever since the Party strong-arm squad forcibly took the paper and plant over from the alleged Lovestoneites, have brought the Communist movement among the Estonian workers in this country near to its ruin. The paper which one time, in the early days of the Party, appeared twice-weekly, and boasted of nearly a thousand readers, has shrunk—thanks to the strict Party-line—to a mere weekly bulletin (and a poor one at that), with, according to the last secretary-treasurer, only 130 paid subscribers; and it sinks lower with every issue.

Workers' Clubs Disbanding

The "Workers Clubs" (headed by the Party) are breaking up all over the country. From Chicago it is reported that the last two "reds", who have been the readers of Uus Ilm for the last 22 years, since its establishment, have joined the recently organized nationalistic "liberal society". In Detroit, where about 150 known Estonians live, and where two years ago a relatively strong Communist group existed, only one Party member is left, who writes in Uus Ilm that all the rest have drifted away into the great unknown, and asks—what is he going to do about it? From Hamilton, Canada, another worker writes that where formerly powerful Communist groups existed, namely in Winnipeg, Lethbridge and Calgary, none could be found now. The small Boston group, consisting of petty-bourgeois elements, has gone with the Lovestoneites, while Philadelphia is completely out of the picture, so far as Communist activity among Estonian workers is concerned.

The Uus Ilm with its strict "Party-line" does not seem to be interested in mass work in deeds—although words know no bounds—but appears to be primarily concerned with its immediate business ends at home, such as running the restaurant, having regular dance parties, etc.

When the writer of these lines called the attention of the Editorial Board to the fact, that nationalistic and patriotic organizations are springing up everywhere, where formerly the Communists had their strongholds, and that immediate steps should be taken to counter that, the loyalists, with their self-acquired reputation of being the "old guards," answered in the columns of Uus Ilm with seeming satisfaction, "...let them do it...we live in the third period...now we know who they are!..."

Stalinism Wrecks Estonian Movement Also

The Estonian Communist movement in this country is gradually but surely sinking into oblivion. It degenerates because of its isolated bureaucratic policies and its attempt to keep with and ahead of the Party "Line." Workers who have stood with the movement for years, are now talking with their feet: they drift into inactivity and to certain fascist societies. More patient comrades are repeatedly asking: Why is Trotsky in exile? Why was Rakowsky replaced by Bessedowsky? Why did Stalin shoot Blumkin? etc. Failing to get any answer at all, they become suspicious, disillusioned, and disappear from the ranks of the Communists.

Those few new members that were recruited in the recent membership drive are sure to stay out also, as they wrote their names on the dotted line as a personal favor toward their friends, without paying down even the initiation fee. The majority of them are ignorant, indifferent or so to say—"set" in their ideas, and would not listen to the argument that Communism does not mean dividing up all the money in the banks, and that Karl Marx is not the man who sells clothes on the installment plan.

The weekly has not done anything in the line of class-education in the past two or three years, and does not intend to. All the more important articles start and end with the familiar but much abused slogans—for satisfying the Party—that have no meaning to the average worker. The rest of the text is taken up by lies and slander against "renegades" (whoever they are) translations from the Daily Worker, some silly novel and plenty of steamship ads. No wonder if such a "Line" finally leads into the great abyss!

However, the disillusioned Estonian workers, and for that matter workers in every other language group as well, should not lose their hope and initiative, but join with the Communist League of America (Opposition), which is at present the only true standard bearer of Leninism in America, that will light the path of Communism in the dark alleys of confusion.

LOVESTONE SPEAKS HIS PIECE

Dear Comrades:

Lovestone is in a penitent mood these days, as I noted at a recent meeting of the Lovestoneites that I attended. The machinations for which he has won such deserving notoriety when in the Party, have left their mark on his political reputation. The honest workers who follow him cannot but feel some element of distrust toward the Lovestoneite leadership. Consequently the speeches of Lovestone overflow with repentant sentiments for the sins of the past.

"I, too, was an expert in writing such resolutions," remarked Lovestone in the course of a recent speech on economic events in the Soviet Union. He was speaking of the complete ignorance which existed among the leaders of the Party on the five-year plan in the early days of its application. But this ignorance was no barrier for producing resolutions in wholesale quantities praising the five-year plan. There were some words of regret for the resolution demanding the removal of Bucharin passed at the last convention. It is a good feeling to know one's hands are clean, said Lovestone.

Unprincipledness is an inseparable attribute of Right opportunism. All the condemnations of former unprincipledness will not change the situation in any way. To remove this unprincipledness it would be necessary to extirpate its roots. The opportunist idea behind all of Lovestone's maneuvers was that the national tasks of the Party could be torn from their international background. In view of this it was necessary to pretend loyalty to the Comintern in order to be left unmolested to execute the national task as one pleased. The theory of national socialism is the basis for the opportunism of the Right.

"It is not at all a question of individuals," said Lovestone, "but it was Rykov who introduced the five-year plan. However, the trouble started when the slogan 'Five-year plan in four or bust' was raised, or in other words, the 'Trotskyfication' of the five year plan. Just as there is the saying that Germany lost the war but won the peace, so Trotsky lost the Party but won the Party line." But here there develops something unexpected. Lovestone quoted from L. D. Trotsky's article, "The New Course in the Economy of the Soviet Union" printed in the Militant, March 15, 1930, in which Stalin's adventurist line is criticized. Lovestone designated the article as a monumental document. Mind you, he stated, Trotsky the Left of the Left, the god of the Left, Trotsky, attacks ultra-Leftism. Lovestone expressed the greatest amazement. Then he wound up by explaining, "This is unprincipledness!"

On the whole it was most amusing. It is not to be expected that the Right could be capable of understanding in the least degree the nature of a genuine Left line.

As if in mockery of himself Lovestone concluded his speech by emphasizing among other things the necessity for principledness.

Among the questions asked there were three which hit the mark. They were: why did Stalin borrow Trotsky's platform; what is the class basis of Stalin; what compels Stalin to continually zig-zag? To which Lovestone gave no satisfactory reasons.

AMERICAN CAPITALIST DEVELOPMENT

New York

Dear Comrades:

The New York Sun of April 11, contained an article on the growth of American exports, which lends considerable light on the new role of the United States as the leader of world economy. The item traces the development of exports for three periods of 100 years each. It traces the development of the United States from its colonial period to its present position of the highest developed capitalist country in the world.

In 1730, the approximate value of American exports was $7,000,000. By 1830, it had increased ten times, to the amount of $71,671,000. Today, one hundred years later, the exports amount to 5,157,000,000, over seventy times the exports of 1930.

An interesting change has also taken place in the character of the exports. In 1730, during the colonial period, the exports consisted mainly of foodstuffs, horses, tobacco, fish, etc. Today there is a complete reversal in the character of the exports which indicate the huge development of the United States as the leading industrial country in the world. Cotton is the leading export, just as it has been for the last hundred years. But its lead is seriously threatened by exportation of machinery. There follows in regular order the export of petroleum, automobiles, foods, iron and steel, copper, etc. Such is a picture of the huge development of American capitalism.

But such tremendous development took and continues to take place only through the intense exploitation of the working masses. The immense wealth indicated in the export growth lends additional light to the concentration of this wealth in the hands of the capitalist class, while the masses become daily more impoverished. This huge development of American capitalism takes place at the expense of the working masses.

ganized in the trade unions was replaced by the hope for the swift possible utilization of the ready apparatus of the trade unions for the purposes of the revolution. Out of this false position sprang also the later policy of the Anglo-Russian Committee, which, after the defeat in China, dealt us the second heaviest blow, a blow against the Soviet Union as well as against the English working class.

The Party and the Proletarian Revolution

Already in the Lessons of October written in the summer of 1923, the idea of an accelerated road—an accelerated road through friendship with Purcell and Cook, as a further development of this idea—is rejected as follows:

"Without the Party, independently of the Party, in an evasion of the Party, through a substitute for the Party, the proletarian revolution can never triumph. This is the principal lesson of the last decade. It is true that the English trade unions can become a powerful lever for the proletarian revolution. They can, for example, under certain conditions and at a definite period, even replace the workers' Soviets. But they can never play such a role without the Communist Party and certainly not against it, but only under the condition that Communist influence in the trade unions becomes decisive. For this lesson and conclusion—in relation to the role and significance of the Party for the proletarian revolution—we have had to pay too dearly to be able to renounce it lightly or even to have it weakened." (Trotsky, Volume 3, page 9.)

The same problem is dealt with in even greater detail in the book, Whither England? This book, from its very first page, is devoted to the presentation of the idea that even the British revolution cannot avoid the gate of Communism, and that with a correct, courageous and intransigent policy which steers clear of all illusions with regard to circuitous routes, the English Communist Party can grow by leaps and bounds and mature so as to be equal in the course of a few years to the tasks before it.

The Left illusions of 1924 were forced up with the aid of Right yeast leaven. So as to be able to conceal the significance of the mistakes and defeats of 1923 from others as well as from oneself, the progress of a Right swing that was going forward in the proletariat had to be denied and the revolutionary processes within the other classes optimistically exaggerated. That was the beginning of the down-sliding from the proletariat to the Centrist, that is, to the petty bourgeois line which, in the course of the further developing stabilization, had to free itself from its ultra-Left shell and reveal itself as a coarse conciliatory line, in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, in China, in England, in Germany, as well as everywhere else.

SPRINKLER FITTERS TAKE 5-DAY WEEK

MILWAUKEE—(FP)—Local 183 of the plumbers, known as the Milwaukee Sprinkler Fitters Union, signed a five-year agreement with the bosses. The daily rate is $11, an increase of $1, but the weekly wage is $55 just as before.

This is the first union in any Milwaukee mechanical trade to win the 5-day week.

International Labor Day

May Day, 1930 is before us. The mobilization of the working class to show the solidarity of labor before the ruling class is an elemental task for all class-conscious and revolutionary workers. It is the duty of every worker to participate in the meetings and demonstrations of the workers on that day. All forces must unite to present a common, broad, militant front before the common enemy—the capitalist class of this country.

Outstanding on May Day, 1930, is the 13th year of the existence of the Soviet Republic, the first Workers Republic of the world, the fortress of the international proletarian revolution. The defense of its heritage, its victories, the fight for its preservation, is the first major task of the workers of all lands.

In the United States, mass unemployment is the gaunt spectre haunting the lives of million of workingmen and women. Labor on May Day needs to demonstrate and demand from the ruling capitalist class either work or compensation for the unemployed. Immediate fighting tasks for the American working masses are the struggle for the seven hour day and the five day week; for social insurance at the expense of the bosses and government; for the fight against the deadly speed-up system.

The masses of American workers are unorganized into any labor organization. Before the militants, the Left wing, the Communists, is the common responsibility to engage actively for the organization of the unorganized into fighting labor unions. The capitalist class in the United States is still on the offensive, endeavoring to smash all organizations of the working class. The united resistance of the progressive and Left wing of the labor movement is needed to resist the capitalist offensive and to prepare the forces of the workers in due time themselves to take the offensive against the bosses and the capitalist government.

A duty of the American masses is to demand the recognition of the Soviet Union by the United States government and especially to demand that the United States shall extend long-term credits to the Soviet Union, which, at one and the same time aid partially to relieve the unemployed situation in the United States and the economic development of the Soviet Union.

The common struggle for the abolition of capitalist society and the establishment of workers rule, for a society without exploitation of one class over another remains as before. On May Day, 1930, let the workers join in solidarity against the capitalist system and resolve to carry on a fight for its overthrow.

I. L. P. «Turns Left»

The Birmingham conference of the I. L. P. has just passed by under the leadership of the Left wing led by Maxton. What is of the greatest significance is the formal decision not only to endorse the opposition to the MacDonald-controlled Parliamentary Labor Party, but to instruct the 30 members following Maxton to establish themselves as a separate group in the House of Commons with the purpose of organized opposition to the MacDonald regime. This in itself will not, of course, lead to the fall of the Labor government, since the 59 liberals will make up for the loss. But the Birmingham decisions are of immense significance as indicative of the trend developing in the ranks of the I. L. P. which include many revolutionary, if temporarily confused militants. An article giving a more detailed analysis of the significance of the conference appears next week.

MAY DAY IN NEW YORK

With the Militant Workers - Against Whalen and the Legionaries!
ALL WORKERS OUT TO RUTGERS SQUARE ON THE FIRST OF MAY

The pure democracy of Walker and Whalen has spoken and the right to the streets on May Day has been granted equally to all citizens of good conduct! Here the American Legion, the Russian White Guards and the thousands of police armed to the teeth to protect and assist the reactionary forces—all on Union Square. There the militant workers of New York, with the Communists in the van—at Rutgers Square, with permission to march along a democratically prescribed route to Union Square after it had been "cleared" of the Legion and its Russian thugs-in-law. Elsewhere the respectable "socialists", who gather in the dark in quiet halls to condemn the un-democratic Communists and demand the removal of Whalen so that he may be replaced by another good democrat who will club only Communists: not "innocent citizens and bystanders" as well.

No more democratic arrangement could be expected from the guardians of American capitalist liberty. The socialists are given full rights to spew their mean venom upon the revolutionary movement. The black hundreds of the American Legion and their Russian co-blackguards are generously handed the Square which is traditionally the meeting place of the militant workers. The police are given the liberal right to use their clubs and tear gas bombs against workers who demonstrate their solidarity on May Day. The militant workers are given the right to be threatened by police club and machine gun if they don't behave on the streets like Sunday school boys. The Communist leaders Foster, Minor, Amter, Raymond and Lester are given the right to rest in democratic prison for demonstrating on the free streets.

Capitalists on the Offensive

The capitalist class in New York, the wisest in the country, has shown its power. It is not on the defensive! It is on the offensive! It knows the possibilities given the revolutionary movement in the unemployment situation, and it is curbing it from the outset. It granted Union Square to the Communists on March 6th, and then showed its power by the savage, unprecedently brutal, manner in which it broke up the demonstration. As pious lovers of democracy, it did not refuse the Communist Party a permit for Union Square on May Day. No! It merely organized its band of toughs in the American Legion, allotted 10,000 well-armed police to help them, and installed them in Union Square.

It calculated on the weakness of the revolutionary movement to contest the holding of the Square with the armed Legionaries, White Guards and police. They would have reckoned in vain had the leaders of the official Communist Party succeeded in mobilizing such a mass movement of workers as would enable them to challenge the usurpers of our May Day meeting place. But the irresponsible, false policies of this leadership have compromised the chances for such a success in advance.

The Communist Party has decided to retreat from its original plan to start its demonstration in Union Square and contest for place with the Legion. It will, instead, hold its demonstration in Rutgers Square. The step is a correct one. It was indicated by us previously in the Militant and under the circumstances was not to be avoided. The isolation to which the leaders of the Party have doomed the membership made the Union Square contest difficult. But the fact that it has been a retreat has not been acknowledged; and that is necessary. The workers must learn to distinguish a retreat from an advance. Those who tell the workers that a retreat is not really a retreat but a victory, are criminally misleading them and preventing them from judging their own future. Upon the Party leaders and the Daily Worker fall the guilt of this light-minded mis-education.

The alleged "majority group" (the Lovestone Right wing) is overjoyed at the retreat. They speculated upon it and the hopes that the blunders of the Stalinist leaders would lead to a crushing defeat in Union Square for the Party and a justification for the cowardly policy of perma-ent retreat which is the present line of Lovestone and Company. In the past, Lovestone went along with, and initiated, every criminal adventure for which his whole regime in the Party was noted. Today he has developed under the tutelage of that master of falling backward, Brandler, to the policy of criminal and permanent retreat.

The Militant, on the contrary, declared in its last issue: "The Party cannot fight this battle alone. It must appeal to the masses. Upon the volume of support which the masses give to this appeal, clearly manifested beforehand, depends the question whether the Communists should accept the challenge to fight for the Square on May Day, or make a temporary retreat before stronger forces of the enemy. All efforts in the next days must be concentrated in going to the masses with this issue."

The Party leaders failed to do this. They made the retreat inevitable with their narrow policy. But for Lovestone, retreat is a constant inevitability. May Day will show: Upon the strength of the Rutgers Square demonstration, upon the numbers which have responded to the call, upon the tempo of workers assembled, still depends the question of whether Mr. Whalen and his Legionaries shall be allowed to usurp the workers center in Union Square unchallenged.

Organize Labor's Resistance

The New York May Day demonstration is the most important one in the country. It is confronted with a growing offensive of the capitalist class and it must strengthen the resistance of the workers. It is the enemy that is on the offensive; the workers are on the "offensive" only in the fantastic proclamations of the Daily Worker. It is the enemy that dared to carry through the scandalous trial of the five Communists, with a denial of jury trial, of bail, of defense witnesses, in Star Chamber, and with the imposition of brutal, maximum sentences. It is the enemy that dared for the first time in years to take over Union Square with its Legionaries. For the first time in history the White Guard rats are out of their holes and offering to join the Legionaries to fight Communism in America.

The workers must answer at the May Day meeting. But the Party leaders make a well-organized and concerted answer difficult. Their slogan of the "general political strike" under present circumstances is unrefined stupidity, guaranteed only to discredit this valuable slogan. The workers must rally to Rutgers Square, around the demands for work or compensation, for the 7 hour day and five day week, for social insurance, for extensive credits to the Soviet Union as a measure of alleviating unemployment misery, for the defense of the arrested Communist leaders.

The workers must give voice to their solidarity and demand a fighting united front against unemployment, the main problem of the American working class today. The Party members must press upon the bureaucratic layer that stifles Party democracy and initiative, and compel a united front of all revolutionary elements. The Communist Opposition is in solidarity with the May Day demonstration and will be found in its ranks. A solid mass of workers, capable of acting intelligently and militantly, will be our reply to the provocative, Cossack attacks of Whalen and his paymasters.

ON MAY DAY—ALL NEW YORK MILITANTS TO RUTGERS SQUARE.

UNEMPLOYMENT UNRELIEVED

The situation remains dismal for the millions of unemployed workers in the United States, who are occupied with the discouraging task of seeking non-existent jobs. Neither Spring nor Hoover have brought the awaited acceleration of employment. The report on industrial activity for the month of March, issued by Francis J. Jones, director general of the United States Employment Service of the Department of Labor, Washington, has to admit continued wide-spread unemployment and depression in the outstanding trades, manufactures and industries. The report in part, states:

"...There was no great improvement in industrial activity during March...The iron and steel industry has not reached normal operations and unemployment continued among the workers..

"Curtailed schedules continued in the boot and shoe industry, particularly in the New England States, where a large number of workers were employed on a part-time basis, with quite a number idle..."

Nor is the picture a prettier one for the cotton textile workers.

"The cotton-textile industry remained unchanged, with a large volume of textile mill laborers working part-time and many unemployed..."

Pittsburg reports for the steel trades, expressed both publicly and privately, are gloomy. As per New York Times report, they "have a strongly conservative tinge". As we have stated before, the economic reaction is world-wide and is taking its immense toll everywhere through added joblessness and misery for the workers. The reports from Germany are that the steel market has grown more inactive, both in ingot steel and in the rolling mills. The steel trust is about to discharge 5,000 workmen and the Siemens & Halske company, 2,000, according to Berlin dispatches.

Φ

LOWELL, Mass.—All union bricklayers in Lowell are on strike for the 40-hour week with a compensatory wage increase from $1.50 to $1.65 an hour. Employers would not grant the increase.

The Policy of Bluff in the N. T. W. U.

Instead of sticking to the facts of the present condition of the National Textile Workers Union, Clarence Miller, the "third period" secretary of that organization, in a recent statement issued to the Federated Press makes the usual bombastic account that has become the style in all unions and other organizations controlled by the Stalinized leadership of the Communist Party.

Anyone who has the least knowledge of the past activities of the N. T. W. U. can readily notice the Munchausen remarks made in behalf of the union by the incompetent Miller. It is in line with the present policy of the Party to disregard the true conditions and to broadcast those things which look good in print.

After reading the statement in question, the unacquainted reader gains the impression that the N. T. W. U. is many times more powerful than it actually is. It starts off by announcing that since the union convention last December, half a million leaflets have been distributed. Of course, if the organization had distributed that many pieces of working class literature to the hundreds of thousands of unorganized textile workers of this country it would be quite an achievement. However, it is far from the truth.

The Southern Membership and Organizers

The imaginative Miller adds that at the present time the N. T. W. has 4,000 dues paying members in the Southern districts of the union. This also is exactly the opposite from the facts of the case. From the time that the Gastonia strike started, practically none of the Southern textile workers who joined the union has paid any dues. Especially is this true in the Gastonia section where the strike made it impossible for them to do so, due to the lack of funds. When the strike was ended, not only did the workers find it impossible to pay dues, but they practically were unable to hold any union meetings whatsoever, due to the terrorist Committees of One Hundred organized by the mill owners.

Up until several months ago, the national office of the N. T. W. U. had no record whatsoever as to how many Southern textile workers signed application blanks in the union. Actually the N.T.W. had practically no Southern dues paying members several months ago, or at the present time, when Miller issues his colorful statement to the Federated Press which, while it may make nice reading, is just hokum.

Miller also stated that the N.T.W.U. at the present time has 40 full time organizers covering 15 districts, including 16 in the South. Without going into detail as to the rest of the country, it is sufficient to remark that in the South, where the chance for real organization work is bright, organizers have been withdrawn from the field, so that at the present, only a skeleton of the union remains, giving almost a clear field to the United Textile Workers Union, with its policy of betrayal.

The possibilities for the growth of the N. T. W. U. are good, but only by following a correct policy. To issue statements such as Miller's, undermines the workers whom the union is appealing to. Will the official Communist Party continue its bluff policy in the N. T. W. U., as it also does in other unions which it controls, or start a real organization campaign?

The continuation of the former policy will mean the withering away of the N.T.W. The latter policy will result in participating in the day by day struggles of the textile workers and the building of the organization. The issue is clear and a decision must be reached. It is up to the rank and file members to demand the adoption of the second line of action. —FRANK BROMLEY

SAN DIEGO, Calif.—Several San Diego locals including the Culinary Alliance report to the Federated Trades and Labor Council that 50% of their members are jobless. Machinists reported that the navy is using enlisted men for work formerly done by shore workers, alleging lack of funds.

Max Shachtman, editor of the Militant, has just returned from Europe, after spending a number of weeks with comrade L. D. Trotsky in Prinkipo, attending the unification conference of the German Left Opposition, and the International Conference of the Opposition in Paris. In coming issues of the Militant, beginning with next week we will print a number of articles by Shachtman on the international conference, the prospects of the Opposition in Europe, especially in France and Germany, on the visit to comrade Trotsky, when many questions were discussed which are of interest and importance not only to the revolutionary movement as a whole but for the American movement in particular. Watch for these articles and insure getting the Militant regularly by subscribing for it now.

BLUMKIN ISSUE WILL NOT DOWN

In Bulletin No. 8 of the committee of the 9th district (France) we read the following:

Blumkin Affair: In a few words, Meche described what Blumkin had been—a militant Bolshevik who, until the 24th of December, the date of his death, held a responsible position in the U. S. S. R. About the 15th of December, after having paid a visit to Trotsky, he brought back a letter from the latter, a letter which was intercepted by the G. P. U. It is believed that Blumkin was thereupon condemned to death and executed. These are rumors which are neither confirmed nor denied by the Communist Party press. Meche believes that it is the role of the International Red Aid (in the United States the International Labor Defense—Ed.) to institute an inquiry for the exact facts. Rouquin objects that Meche puts the question in a political manner. As far as he is concerned, it is not at all the role of the I.R.A. to make the inquiry, but that of the Opposition; that afterwards, if the rumors are well founded, perhaps the I. R. A. will have something to say.

The Bulletin adds that discussion on the question will continue, for it has not been settled, and it seems to have deeply interested the rank and file militants.

Those of our comrades from the Opposition—or sympathizers—who are active in the I. R. A. should take advantage of the 50 days between now and the National Congress of the I. R. A., to ask at the meetings of the basic units questions which should be linked with the deportation of militant Communists to Siberia and the murder of Blumkin. LA VERITE

Ford Makes Profits on Men

DETROIT—(FP)—The balance sheet of the Ford Motor Co., just made public, discloses that the company made nearly $82,000,000 during 1929. This contrasted with a deficit of $72,000,000 during 1928. Thus, a net gain of $154,000,000 was registered during the past year.

This huge increase was in large part sweated from the thousands who work for Ford. During 1929 speedup and wage cutting became notorious at the Rouge. So much so that workers would go to the Rouge only as a last resort. It took the present depression to drive them there in thousands. Only workers who have never been in Detroit have a good word for Henry.

The speedup which accompanied the 5-day week was so successful that Ford admitted himself well pleased with results. Workers, who were promised a wage increase commensurate with their increase in production, were not at all pleased with results—they got wage cuts instead of increases.

Ford Cuts Wages

The wage cuts took place in the following manner: Workers are promised a periodical raise when they go to work. Up until the beginning of last year these increases took place rather regularly. Then the company not only stopped granting the increases but began cutting high wage men by "transferring" them to another department. Thus, $7.20 workers found themselves getting $6 and $6.80 a day. Whatever grumbling they might have on that, was quickly stifled when they saw the thousands clamoring for jobs when Henry had the Associated Press advertise for 30,000 men for him. The almost incredible jump in unemployment which took place in October last finally "put them in their places."

Besides that, the company has broadened its policy of letting out parts contracts to outside firms—that is, to sweat shops. In this way thousands of high wage workers have been laid off and the company is getting the beneficial results of $3 a day labor while getting none of the odium which attaches to so frank exploitation.

By such methods did Ford pile up his millions last year.

$25 MINIMUM FOR N. Y. GIRL

NEW YORK—Confronted with the problem of finding living quarters for many girl workers who come to New York City expecting to find jobs and live alone on their wages, the Welfare Council has issued the following warning: "Stay away from New York unless you have an assured income of at least $25 a week. This allows only $8 for rent, $10.50 for food, $3.85 for clothing, $1.25 for carfare, $1.40 for recreation and nothing for laundry, medical care or emergencies.

WINNIPEG—(FP)—The biennial convention of the Canadian shopmen organized in the American Federation of Labor meets in Winnipeg June 2.

NEW ORLEANS—Union railroad trainmen have protested the confirmation of Yellow Dog Parker to the supreme bench. The Polly of bluff in the National ext Union

POLICE CHARGE INTO CROWD OF JOBLESS

CLEVELAND—(FP)—Four workers were hurt as mounted police charged a crowd of unemployed when a speaker allowed a red kerchief to fly in the breeze for a second. The unemployed were gathered in the Public Square to listen to the report of a committee which had demanded aid for the unemployed from the Community fund. The police were waiting for the slightest provocation to charge the crowd.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.—(FP)—Despite business men's promises to Hoover, wage reductions of 20% have been put into effect at the Royal and Arctic Mills of B. B. and R. Knight.

SAN FRANCISCO—1,200 union taxi drivers are asking a wage increase of $4 to $5 a day and a 9-hour day to replace the 10-hour shift.

PITTSBURGH CAR MEN STAND PAT FOR MORE PAY

PITTSBURGH—(FP)—By a vote of 1,819 to 112, union street car men are standing pat on their demand for a 5 cent increase on 2-men cars and a 15 cents boost for 1-man car operators. The increases would mean 75 cents an hour on the larger cars and 90 cents on the smaller. The union is also seeking six days' work with seven days pay.

FURNITURE WORKERS GET 49 CENT WAGE

WASHINGTON—Average hourly wages of furniture workers in this country last autumn were 49 cents, and the average full-time week's work was 51.9 hours, according to the report of a study made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

ALBANY, N. Y.—Employment in representative New York factories continued to decrease in March. Every month since October has shown a decrease in employment compared with the preceding month.

CHICAGO—The bakers union has signed up five hitherto non-union shops in Chicago.

JOBLESS TOLD TO LEAVE DETROIT

DETROIT—(FP)—The automobile industry has been inflated to such an extent that only a "migration of labor" will seriously affect unemployment here, says a report issued by the Union Trust Co. The review tries to be optimistic in its outlook for Detroit but has to admit that the only grounds for its optimism, "did not occur in any branch of industry or trade, but were financial in nature."

The report concludes, "Indications do not point to a complete solution of the unemployment situation in the immediate future."

As though to give added emphasis to this comment reports are current here that the Hudson Motor Car Co. has laid off 8,000 men. At the end of last week 2,000 were laid off, it is known. Workers say that an additional 6,000 were laid off this week-end.

Workers from the Ternstedt Mfg. Co., a General Motors subsidiary, have furnished the following revealing table:

Spring 1929	Spring 1930
6-day week	4-day week
Two Shifts	One Shift
9 hours	8 hours
Night and Day	Reduced force on days

"Nothing Doing"

Former workers who applied for jobs at this company were told that "there won't be anything doing for at least a month."

Downtown department stores have also been forced to retrench on their already severely reduced staffs. Two shifts are being installed—one from 9-1, the other from 1-5. This will bring salaries of counter girls and checkers down to about $5-6 per week. Salesgirls may be able to squeeze out $10-12 on the new schedule.

Welfare department officials admit 20,000 families dependent on the department during March—an increase of 6,000 over February.

Figures assembled by the Union Trust Co. indicate February, 1930 automobile production as 33% below that of February, 1929. Building permits have declined 70% below normal.

The local situation has become so acute that the city council admitted the existence of unemployment by adding five councilmen to an unemployment committee of eminent Detroiters. There is no labor representation on the committee. Workers expect no help from that quarter—committees have been committing since last October but idleness increases and hunger is ever more harsh. The workers want action.

BANKERS MOVE PHILA. HOSIERY CO. SOUTH TO GET SCAB LABOR

PHILADELPHIA—Over 350 union hosiery workers will be jobless here when the Cadet Knitting Co. recently purchased by southern bankers, moves its plant to Columbia, Tenn. At the new location the plant will operate non-union.

The purchaser is Caldwell & Co., Investment Bankers, Nashville. At the present time they are operating an open shop plant at Decatur, Ala., where workers are forced to sign yellow dog contracts. Products from both the Alabama and the Tennessee plant will be finish-processed in Philadelphia.

BOSTON—Over 4,500 workers in Massachusetts factories were added to the unemployed army in March, according to state department of labor figures. A decrease of 15% in hosiery workers' employment was caused by mills which shut down entirely "for reorganization". In 19 of 25 cities canvassed only half the plants employed 50% or more of the workers full time.

The Autobiography of Leon Trotsky

MY LIFE, by Leon Trotsky. Chas Scribner's Son. 600 pages. On Sale by the Militant for $5.00 per copy.

The profoundest contribution the average bourgeois thinker has made to analyzing the struggle between the principal currents in the modern revolutionary movement which have clashed most violently in the Soviet republic has been that it is a struggle between Trotsky and Stalin "for power". Particularly is this the conception of the petty bourgeois and his intellectual off-spring, that hopeless section of modern society which constantly seeks salvation from the hammer and anvil by the intervention of some great man who has no relation to the classes and stands above them. It may be added that this idea has not failed to find nourishment in the hideous propaganda against the Russian Marxists conducted for almost seven years now by the ruling apparatus, especially in the whispering campaign of the earlier periods of the fight in which slanders were circulated against Trotsky that nobody—at least in those days—dared to say or write publicly.

Such a notion is not a new one. It did not arise for the first time in connection with the fight of the Opposition against the backsliding apparatus. Similar profound struggles have been explained in this way by philistines and small minds: one need but refer to the seas of ink expended in showing that the First International was wrecked on the reef of personal antagonism and place-seeking between Marx and Bakunin. The same shabby criterion will undoubtedly be applied in future social battles where outstanding personalities or outstanding mediocrities occupy a large place on the canvas of events. And that is so perhaps because there cannot yet be established, in the welter of ideas that make up social thought, a law against stupidity and ignorance.

The Role of the Individual in History

This does not mean to deny, but rather to affirm, that individuals play an enormous role and often a decisive one in the development or retardation of historical processes. It is on the reverse side of the philistine's blind adoration for all-sufficiency and omnipotence of "great men" that he frequently marks his mystic awe before the course of social forces which he does not understand and is incapable of influencing or guiding forward—an inability which he sometimes erects into a universal law. Man does not make history out of the whole cloth, said Marx; but nevertheless he makes it. And great men make great history. They are produced by social convulsions and conflicts and in turn they influence their production. Therein lies the inter-connection between the conflict and harmony of outstanding men and outstanding events, of individuals and the social struggle. And therein lies the great value, the permanent significance of comrade Trotsky's autobiography. It is as much a vital contribution to the conflict and harmonies we have mentioned as it is their product. It could only be written as a result of a social war on a huge scale. In itself it is a battle fought—and won.

That it is, as the reviewers everywhere have remarked, a work of extraordinary literary qualities, (it is one of the greatest literary works of our time), that it is uncommonly absorbing reading aside from all other considerations, that the book has a brilliant arresting style, an unusual power of narrative, that warm sense of humor, the wealth of imagery and color which has placed him in the front ranks of the modern writers—all this only enhances its worth, but does not determine it.

The Making of a Revolutionist

A review of a book is obviously not the book. In this case it can only be a quite insufficient comment on some of its most interesting sections, a comment which grays before the vividness of its subject.

Trotsky's life has of course been intimately bound up with the development of the most important event of our age, the Russian proletarian revolution, since the end of the last century. Fifty years of age, by far the greater part of his life been unchangingly devoted to the accomplishment and furtherance of the proletarian revolution and its aims.

The breath-taking variety of the circumstances under which he has pursued this life-work makes his book read like a romance of adventure. At the age of 18, he had already plunged up to his ears in the earliest revolutionary organizations, in Odessa, where he immediately occupied an active and prominent place. At 19, following a czarist raid, he was given his first taste of prison life. From prison he was sent into his first Siberian exile, the first of three, from two of which he escaped, and from the last of which he was deported to Turkey by the usurpers who are so cruelly squandering the glorious heritage of the Russian revolution.

In his first exile abroad he made the acquaintance of the leaders of the then united Russian social democracy, also in exile: Lenin, Plechanov, Martov, Deutsch, Zussulitch and others. He had come before a crucial moment in the history of the Russian movement, the split between the majority (Bolsheviks) and the minority (Mensheviks), a split that involved his first break with Lenin which the record-forgers have so monstrously exaggerated and misrepresented in recent times. On the eve of the 1905 revolution, he was back again in St. Petersburg under an assumed name, and when the uprising occurred, he was named the president of the Petersburg Soviet of Workers Deputies after the unmissed disappearance of its first chairman, the democratic lawyer, Khrustalyov. The leader and spokesman of this dawn of the more lasting revolution to come more than a decade later, he was arrested after its defeat together with the other deputies and following a sensational trial, exiled once more to the Siberian wastes, only to escape abroad again.

Trotsky's Activity in Exile

For years in the teeming life of the emigrated and exiled Russian social democracy, he was head over heels absorbed in the struggles of the two principal factions (Bolsheviks and Mensheviks), denounced now by the one, now by the other, but at all times energetically laboring to assemble an armory for the inevitable second Russian revolution. True internationalist, he did not confine his activities to the Russian movement. He was found at the international congress, at conventions of the then imposing German social democracy, in Austria, in the Balkans, making life-long political and personal acquaintanceships in one place, as with Rakovsky, or venomous and implacable foes in another—Trotsky is hardly noted for any gentleness or hypocritical softness in his relations with political opponents!

After the fearful collapse of the Second International under the earthquake of the imperialist war, the fighter is again in the front ranks, raking the German social traitors with the same ferocity as the French "Defenders of the Fatherland", and condemned alike not only by them but also by their warring masters: in contumacious by the German Junkers and by expulsion from France. Expulsion also from Spain. Then a voyage to the new world—his only trip to the United States. In this country, an editor of the Russian Marxist journal, Nevy Mir, and a foundation layer—with emigrated Russians, with Lore, with Fraina and others—of the movement which took form in the Socialist Propaganda League, and later formed one of the elements that organized the necessary split of the corrupt Socialist Party and formed the Communist movement in America. En route back to Russia with the first news of the Kornilov revolution, he is interned in a Canadian concentration camp, deported, and then the arrival in Petrograd to be, with Lenin, the organizer and leader of the great victory. The Truth Confronts the Stalinist Liars

His activities in and after the revolution itself, in the best years of the young dictatorship and of the Communist International are rich and indelible, and not all the oceans of mud, not all the befogging clouds of official propaganda can succeed in concealing them now for any length of time or for any substantial amount of people. History was too deeply engraved in that period to be recarved today or erased by filling the tracings with the permanent putty of official fraud factories. The simple re-telling of the events which really took place are sufficient to bring out the original precision of those carvings in highest relief. The few hundred pages of the book are a mortal blow to the whole new school of what, for lack of a more appropriate designation, is called the Stalinist historian, bought and paid for to write history as it never happened for the purpose of weaving a monstrously inexact legend about the equally monstrous figure of Stalin. It is as though all the labors of these dark figures were brought together into one misshapen form and crushed under the concentrated truth of Trotsky's book. It is in this connection that Trotsky runs to questions that have frequently been posed by revolutionary workers: To precisely what extent is the struggle between the Marxist wing and the bureaucratic apparatus a "personal" struggle, one of "individuals"; and why is it that the Opposition, the leaders and foremost fighters for the revolution, was defeated in the Party which was in the best sense of the word its own? The answer is not too difficult to find.

A period of social convulsions and surge, a period of revolutionary advance, brings into the foreground the great individuals of the advancing class. But for a period of stagnation, or for a period of reaction, men of colorless talents are required—not a period of counter-revolution, it is clear, for that also requires men who are in a certain sense great men, but of a period of peaceful reaction, so to speak.

In a conversation with Trotsky, his friend Skylansky said: "You know, it is amazing how, during this last period, the mean, the self-satisfied mediocrity is pushing itself into every sphere. And all of it finds in Stalin its leader. Where does it all come from?"

"This is the reaction after the great social and psychological strain of the first years of revolution," Trotsky replied. "A victorious counter-revolution may develop its great men. But its first stage, the Thermidor, demands mediocrities who can't see farther than their noses. Their strength lies in their political blindness, like the mill-horse that thinks that he is moving up when really he is only pushing down the belt-wheel. A horse that sees is incapable of doing the work."

How Mediocrity Likes a Little Arise

The period of reaction that set in in Russia after the tragic defeats of the revolutions in Germany and Bulgaria in 1923 and the subsequent retardation of the revolutionary movement in Europe—the only real salvation for an isolated Russian Socialist state—"produced" its Stalin with the same inexorable force that it "required" the organizational beheading of the revolutionary section of the Party. It "required" the campaign against the pestiferous Trotskyists and their internal din and bustle, their "sectarian" insistence upon the "permanent revolution", their contempt for the sweet lulling music of socialism in one country, their constant prodding of the soft and self-contented, the revolutionist of yesterday who had become a "solid" Soviet citizen, who had "made" the revolution in the sweat of his brow and was anxious to settle down quietly to enjoy the fruits of it without being interrupted by the clamorous requirements of the international revolution. Only a period of social and political reaction could—to continue with inadequate "personal" similes and analogies—accomplish the monstrous historical perversions, these sleight-of-hand tricks by which a Lenin and a Trotsky are changed for a Stalin or a Molotov, the rebel English miner for a Purcell, the Chinese coolie for a Chiang Kai Shek, the Russian factory workers for the office bureaucrat, the poor peasant for the smug kulak who will "grow into socialism". No other answer to the two questions, which are one question, can find a place in the mosaic of recent events.

The Stalinist Intrigue against the Bolshevik Revolutionists

But for such an enormous displacement of things, for such a turning of values upon their head, a most intricate and elaborate mechanism is needed, for processes in social life are not entirely realized by themselves. It is with an examination of the mechanics of the change, and not only with its dynamics, that a good section of the biography is occupied. With an uncommon meticulousness and respect for facts, Trotsky traces every intrigue against the revolutionary wing of the Party, and against himself, in particular, as its most notable exponent. He takes all the otherwise unrelated figures of the time, all the events, all the disconnected threads of men and things, and puts them together in their proper place. The result is a completely woven fabric, distinct in every intertwining of its cords, that enables the reader to understand and follow that horrible enormity that has been the beginning and end of wisdom in the official Communist movement since Lenin died: the campaign against a so-called Trotskyism. Not every lie can be replied to: that would require a Britannica; but the new ones and the old ones served up with a new sauce which are important or characteristic are destroyed with a surgical efficiency and completeness. It is much less a defense than an attack. It takes the men and less than men who are in today's high places. It tells us who they are, how and why they got there. We are startled by things we formerly only suspected or never knew. We learn for the first time for instance that scores upon scores of those self-labelled "Old Bolsheviks", who we had been taught for years, had been "loyal disciples of Lenin and Bolshevism" for anywhere from 20 to 30 years—the while Trotsky was a scoundrelly Menshevik, conciliator or what you will—were in cold reality (before the revolution, and some afterwards as well!) not only in the camp of Menshevism, but even further to the right. Between 1905 and 1917, many of these two-for-a-penny "Old Bolsheviks" were at best revolutionary democrats, or else had quit the movement entirely and retired to a quiet bourgeois life. We begin here to learn something about these sturdy "Old Bolsheviks" like Gussev who left the movement for ten years in the hard days of the reaction and turned up in 1925 in the United States to teach us that the essence of Bolshevism in this country consisted in the cabled manufacture of Lovestone, Pepper and Ruthenberg as the consecrated Leninistic leaders of the American Party. Trotsky mentions many others like Gussev to one extent or another, Yaroslavsky, Ordjonikize, Petrovsky of the Ukraine for instance, and their heroic deeds of the past. Had Trotsky been guilty at any time of half of their colossal blunders and conceptions that had not even a hat-tipping acquaintance with Marxism, Stalin would undoubtedly have dared to exile him in 1924 instead of waiting four years longer! It is precisely such people who find a place in the present period; in the first five years of the revolution the movement went forward without ever suspecting their existence—it never mattered.

A Great Political Document

Of them all, naturally, Stalin emerges the worst. The full length portrait Trotsky draws of him is a murderous one—for Stalin. No man can live long as a political figure of any consequence with so deadly an epitaph written for him, one may say, in advance. In regard to the history of the campaign against "Trotskyism", the facts, events and persons involved, the book stands as a challenge to every serious revolutionist. It is no platitude, but a profound truth, to say that he who dares read it, enemy though he may be at the commencement, must end by being, at the very least, tremendously influenced by Trotsky's point of view. We hope that every rebel worker, and particularly every worker in the official Communist Party, will accept the challenge.

The conclusion of the book—where Trotsky so splendidly castigates the democratic illusionists of the whole world on the subject of his application to the right of asylum—shows him at once oblivious to any "personal tragedy" and quietly confident of the future. Anybody who has been fortunate enough to be with him even for a few days on the deserted islet of Prinkipo and seen him at work with the same energy, devotion and self-assurance that marked him when he led the victorious Red Army, will know immediately that what he says about the future is not pretty literature but a natural conviction, the certainty that the course of events, interrupted and diverted from their proper line of march though they may be for the moment, must eventually vindicate the foreseings and foretellings of revolutionary Marxism. The work of the Communist Opposition is a contribution to this vindication. The autobiography of comrade Trotsky is another. It is a battle fought—and won.

«PURE AND TRANSPARENT AS CRYSTAL»

By ALFA

Mysterious things are happening in the headquarters of the Communist International. The Apparatus has grown so powerful that it does not feel any longer embarrassed to perform its secret "functions" in the open. Articles and documents are being published that obviously have some very special—one may say, occult, meaning. In these articles the priests of the first rank speak a language which can only be understood by the priests of the second rank. To those of the third circle, the occult meanings of their language is unintelligible, and ordinary mortals can only guess what it is all about.

Number 1 (1930) of the magazine Bolshevik—the principal cook-shop of bureaucratic mysticism and mystification, contains three speeches of Stalin, which he made in May, 1929, at the Praesidium of the Comintern and its Committees.

The editors of the magazine have painstakingly emphasized, in the case of each speech, that it "is being published for the first time". But they have not explained for what reason these old—and alas, very poor speeches are set up in type at all. The speeches belong to the period when Lovestone, being still a member of the Praesidium of the Comintern, was competing with Foster for the position of priest of the first rank. The description of their competition, given in the speech, is not without a certain cynical precision. Here is how realistically Stalin has pictured the fight between these two clans for the right to represent in the United States the last revelations of Leninism.

The Race Between Lovestone and Foster

"The Foster group, wanting to demonstrate its loyalty to the Russian Party, declares itself 'Stalinist'. Very well! We, the Lovestoneites, will go farther than the Foster group, and we will demand that comrade Bucharin be recalled from the Communist International. Let the Fosterites try to beat that! We will show those people in Moscow how we Americans can play the market! The Foster group, wanting to demonstrate its intimacy with the Communist International, demands that the decision of the Communist International about the removal of Pepper be carried out. Very well! We, the Lovestoneites, will go further, and expel comrade Pepper from the Party. Let the Fosterites try to beat that! We will show those people in Moscow how we Americans can play the market." (The Bolshevik, 1930, No. 1 page 10.)

To value these lines adequately, one must remember that the talk is not about brokers, after all, but about two factions, one of which had been leading the American party for several years, and had put through the renowned campaign against Trotskyism. The other has subsequently been placed at the head of the American party in order to fulfill the tasks of the "third period".

Why Does Stalin Publish These Speeches Now?

One can not help asking: What purpose does Stalin pursue in publishing these speeches today, many months after they were spoken, and thus publicly placing on Foster, who is holding so high the banner of Stalinism, on the same level with Lovestone who was expelled from the Communist International? The mystery is great. Such an unexpected publication of speeches, made in the most secret conferences, would be simply incomprehensible, if one did not assume some new machinations behind the scenes, about which the priests of the first degree consider it timely to forewarn the priests of the second.

But can one be permitted to make such a disrespectful assumption? From other remarks in the speech of Stalin it would appear not. The general theme of the speech is—although you might not believe it—revolutionary morals. Yes, yes. No joking. Here is what the gifted orator has to say about it.

"Either we are Leninists, and our relations with each other, as well as the relation between the different sections and the Communist International, must be built on mutual confidence, must be pure and transparent as crystal, and then there must be no room in our relations for rotten diplomatical tricks... Or else we are not Leninists, and then..."

...and then, of course, everything is permitted: intrigues, falsity, dark hints, vile slanders, murder from ambush.

However, in so far as Stalin is a Leninist, he is, according to his own attestation "pure and transparent as crystal". To what extent this is true of him has been, as is well known, once and forever testified by Lenin himself in describing his character as disloyal. What then is the meaning of this unexpected publication of an old speech? For there must be a meaning.

Was it done only in order to completely discredit the expelled Lovestone? Suppose we admit that. What then about Foster? Why does the pure and transparent moralist cast mud at the same time on the present leader of this Party?

Let us read further!

The Mud upon the Crystal

"To characterize the way in which pure Communist morals are being distorted and covered with mud in the process of factional struggle, we could refer to such facts as, for instance, my conversation with comrades Foster and Lovestone... I am talking about the conversation which took place at the time of the Sixth Congress. It is characteristic that in correspondence with his friends comrade Foster alludes to this conversation as something mysterious, something that should not be mentioned aloud... Where does this mysticism come from? And what is it for, dear comrades? What could there be mysterious about my conversation with comrades Foster and Lovestone? To hear these comrades, one might think that I was talking to them about things which I would be ashamed to tell you about. But this is absurd, dear comrades. And what is all this mysticism for? Is it so difficult to understand that I have nothing to hide from comrades? Is it difficult to understand that I am always, at any moment, ready to relate to the comrades all the contents of my conversation with Foster and Lovestone from the beginning to the end". (Page 11, emphasis ours.)

Thus Foster is accused of no more and no less a crime than "distorting" and "covering with mud the Communist morals". But Foster is the head of the Communist Party in the United States! Foster is a member of the Praesidium of the Communist International. How are we to understand this?

We do not demand that every Communist, even though he belong to the breed of the leaders, should be necessarily "pure and transparent as crystal". That would be a too high, indeed a superhuman criterion. But still, between "crystal" and "mud" there are many intervening gradations. How shall a simple mortal explain to himself the fact that a player of the market, Lovestone, has been replaced by Foster, who covers with mud "the pure Communist morals". And why—this is the point of the question—does the pure-and-transparent-as-crystal leader of leaders, find it necessary to disclose this hidden disgrace so many months after the muddy Foster has replaced the gambler, Lovestone, at the wheel of government?

Arriving at a Decision

At least we learn from these speeches—what, to tell the truth, we did not doubt before—that Foster won his victory, not at all against Stalin but on the contrary, with the help of some conversation with Stalin behind the scenes. "Where does this mysticism come from, and what for, dear comrades." Precisely: where from and what for? Is it so difficult to understand that Stalin has nothing to hide from the comrades? Is it so difficult to understand that Stalin is "ready at any moment to relate to the comrades all and everything from the beginning to the end"—all, decidedly all?

In spite of our bewilderment, we can not resist the temptation of a hypothesis: Isn't this a... just a first step towards overthrowing Foster? It seems impossible otherwise to understand the necessity of slandering a recently appointed leader, mixing him with mud. Nor is the situation simplified by the following words in Stalin's speech:

"Where is the solution?" he asks himself, and answers: "Comrade Foster suggested one plausible solution. According to his proposition it is necessary to transfer the leadership to the minority (i. e., the Foster group). Can this solution be accepted? No, it can not be accepted. The delegation of the E.C. C.I. made a mistake when it sharply dissociated itself with the majority group (the Lovestone group) and did not at the same time dissociate itself with the minority groups. The proposition of comrade Foster with all its consequences falls of its own weight." (Page 12.)

It seems that in May 1929, Stalin flatly refused Foster the right to inherit Lovestone's place. Was it quite flat, though, his refusal? At that time it was understood that Foster had still to show proofs of his "loyalty".

Foster Proves His Loyalty

Stalin was accusing Foster, as if incidentally, of having been ready, in the interests of factional struggle with Lovestone, to use the "hidden Trotskyists". That was, in May 1929, the chief accusation. The task of Stalin's sermon, then, was not to discredit but to intimidate Foster. And it was wholly successful. Foster produced in abundance all the demanded proofs of loyalty. In his struggle against the Left Opposition he outdid himself. And in consequence, after a private conversation with Stalin in Moscow, Foster receives into his own hands the American "apparatus" and... from being a minority became a majority. During this operation while Foster was successfully "covering with mud" Communist morals, Stalin kept silent. But now, when Foster has completely received into his hands the destinies of official Communism in the United States, Stalin publishes his previous sermon with a mysterious note: "Published for the first time".

The matter is complicated still more by the following quite unexpected attack: "Foster and Bittelman"—the orator here becomes indignant—"do not see anything improper in declaring themselves 'Stalinists' in order to demonstrate their loyalty to the Russian Communist Party. But this is really indecent, dear comrades. Do you not know that there are not (!), and there must not be (!) any 'Stalinists'? Why should such indecencies be permitted from a minority?" (page 9)

It appears that to declare oneself a Stalinist is really indecent. Who would have thought so? In the same number of the Bolshevik, another "crystal", smaller in size, but no less transparent—Kuusinen—proves in 20 closely set pages that to be a Stalinist is the first, and as a matter of fact, the only duty of every official seriously interested in his own fate. The article of the incomparable hero of the Finnish revolution of 1918, is even entitled: "Stalin and the Bolshevisation of the Party".

Kuusinen Mumbles «Amen»

With his usual brilliancy, the author proves that all its successes in China, England and other countries, the Communist International owes to Stalin—all its defeats to someone else. On his part, Stalin praises Kuusinen highly in his speech. But we have to believe that all this is just a mere accident, which has nothing to do with the case. If Kuusinen in January 1930 declares himself a Stalinist to the length of 20 pages, it is his private business. But when in May 1929, Foster made similar announcements, he was trying to play on a rise of the market, and it was "really indecent, dear comrades".

Can it be that all this taken together is just a sad misunderstanding? It seems that we shall have to believe so, because—"Comrades, the Communist International is not a stock market, after all. The Communist International is the Holy of Holies of the working class. You must not confuse the Comintern with the Stock Exchange." Such are the incomparable, purely-Stalinist formulae. They are taken from the same speech.

But nevertheless we hold to our conviction—that everything in the world has its cause, and everything in politics its purpose. Is it possible to assume that this speech is "being published for the first time" only in order to prove once more the political incorruptibility of Stalin?

What Next for Foster?

Taken by itself such an assumption is not absolutely incredible in the present "third period"—a period characterized above all by its monstrous, arch-American, shamefully-indecent advertisement of the personalities of the super-leadership. Still it is difficult to imagine that the reputations of the as yet undeposed leaders of the second rank might be dragged in the mud without any evident necessity—just casually besmirched in passing. If this is really so, it means that a new phase of the Bonapartist degeneration of the bureaucratic regime has arrived—a phase in which even the nearest associates are regarded in the same light as the "mob".

But we think that the nub of the matter is not only there. All the precedents—and there are more than few—point to the conclusion that in Stalin's faction the Foster stock is going down. Why? We do not know. We know only that it is not for reasons of principle. In that field it is doubtful whether Foster is inclined to cause any difficulties. What is the matter then? The mystery has not yet emerged from the keeping of the priests of the first two ranks. But why not ask the author of the speeches about it? He is the one who has no taste for mysteries. "Is it so difficult to understand, that (he) has nothing to hide from the comrades? Is it so difficult to understand that (he) is always ready, at any moment to tell the comrades, from beginning to end—everything, everything" ... except, perhaps, how and why he murdered Blumkin? (We intend to have an answer to that question too.)

...But Foster, it seems, ought to be getting ready for a change of life—unless, indeed, the publication of this article should save him.

* * *

P. S. Pravda on March 7th brings the news that Stalin's speeches on the American question are published in the form of a pamphlet. The first edition is 100,000 copies. We were right. The matter is much more "profound" than it could have seemed to an outsider. However, such an unexpected circulation of such insane speeches (except for cynical casuistries there is nothing in them)—does not offer any key to the mystery. 100,000! Then it was really meant for the masses. But what will the masses make out of this sudden commentary on the sudden career of Foster? Is this new edition merely designed to show Foster that the boss is not joking? Or is this apocalyptic circulation only a by-product of the efficiency of the administrators as in the case of collectivization? It certainly becomes more and more difficult to find your way among the zig-zag of the general line. —A.

POLICE HELP AUTO PLANT SUBDUED NEGRO WORKERS

MEMPHIS, Tenn.—(FP)—Two hundred Negro workers, at the gates of the Murray Wood Products Co. to protest against the abusiveness of white foremen and the brutality of company detectives, were forcibly dispersed and the mill placed under guard.

Police clubbed one young Negro unconscious recently for arguing with another employee and on another occasion detectives hired by the company called for police aid because a Negro truck driver objected to being cursed by a white foreman.

Murray Wood Products Co., manufacturers of auto bodies, does not believe in wasting money on wages. Unskilled men are started in at 20-25 cents an hour, but even this apparently is not low enough to suit Murray, which has been operating in Memphis for nearly a year. A large number of colored women have been brought in to do men's work at half the pay. For a nominal 10-hour day which in practice extends to 12, 13 and even 14 hours, they get $1.25 plus a bonus. A bonus however doesn't amount to more than $1 or $2 a week for women or $3-4 for men.

THE CRISIS OF ITALIAN FASCISM (FAENZA AND) MILAN

This much is certain—the economic crisis in Italy is growing more acute every day. The phases of this worsening are not the common manifestations of the crisis of capitalism to which the influence of foreign capital or some displacement in the international constellation of the "state of industry" might bring temporary relief, artificially reviving this or that branch of production. On the contrary this intensification of the crisis assumes the form of a reckoning to which we once applied the term, "the balance sheet of the blood and misery of the Italian proletariat".

Besides this sanguinary adjustment of the balance of class forces, fascism is faced with problems that a mortal crisis impose on the capitalist regime of every country. The fascist solution of these problems is to guide industrial development along the lines commanded by the lenders of capital who have come to the support of the Italian industry in difficulties, through the action of the world exchanges, because their interests demand it, or rather because the contradictions between the rival imperialist groups force such a course on them.

Agriculture, on the other hand, which has been orientated towards the alleged possibilities of Italian independence from foreign exports, has reached the limits of its natural resources and is moving in a closed circle—a condition from which the state-subsidized financiers and big land-owners derive all the advantages, leaving the losses to be borne by the middle and impoverished strata of the "rural population".

The Economic Stages of Fascist Development

Elsewhere capitalism has been able to solve economic problems by virtue of the important factors of colonial possessions or the possibility of expanding the apparatus of production. In Italy, where these factors are lacking, capitalism can find no way out other than by the increasingly intensified exploitation of the working class. After the initial triumph of capitalism over the workers' agitation of 1922, came the second stage of the capitalist offensive preceded by the consolidation of the bourgeois power (march on Rome) which marked the capitalist success against the agitation of 1924-25. Following the second stage came a third, opened by the strengthening of the political domination of capitalism by means of the exceptional laws which violently strangled the working class in 1927.

This latest phase has now ended with the presentation of the balance sheet of fascist economic policy from 1922 to 1929. One must add that this economic policy has not even the merit of originality: it is a caricature of the economic policy inaugurated and defended by the "anti-fascists". It is Nitti who is the recognized engineer of the "anti-Fascist concentration". The only difference lies in the fact that Mussolini accompanied this policy with his system of violence and terror while the anti-fascist would have applied the less expensive and surer method of democratic deception of manoeuvring with the middle classes and backward section of the proletariat, limiting repression to the proletarian vanguard.

Nitti or Mussolini?

That it has been Mussolini and not Nitti who for seven years has represented the Italian bourgeoisie is due solely to the fact that only terrorism could ward off the revolutionary menace to capitalism. This does not prevent capitalism now, however (thanks to the results obtained by seven years of terror and the plight to which the Communist movement has been reduced by Centrism) from believing itself capable of successfully intervening in the working class movement by attempting to substitute Nitti for Mussolini, or to engineer a combination of Nitti and Mussolini.

After the first victory of capitalism, there was a second and then a third. At the very moment when Italian capitalism is obliged to present its economic balance, the classic proletarian belt has had to be tightened to its last notch. But after this balance, what is the outlook for capitalist economy? A radical change is impossible. This is implied not only in our general thesis of the mortal crisis of capitalism, but also in view of the actual and specific conditions of Italian economy which can live only by the intervention of foreign capitalism and the bloody attack on the living standards and wages of the workers.

Let one of these two conditions (the intervention by repeated spurts of foreign capital) begin to fail, and where will Italian capitalism turn? The answer to this question is obvious—the re-inforced oppression of the working class, at the very time when the inevitable sharpening of antagonisms will furnish the propitious condition for a movement of organized resistance to fascism and the bourgeoisie.

The "Concentrationist" (Anti-Fascist) Aim for a Social-Democratic Government

In good time we outlived the terms of this problem—and were continually repulsed by the Centrists who have turned not their first and not their last hand-spring. We tried to show that the essential factors in the manoeuvring of fascist policy (Vatican, plebiscite, tentative overtures to the concentration) and the internal dissensions of the fascist party were to be found in the economic reasons which forecast in the near future a new offensive on the miserable wages of the Italian workers.

And the news recently made public clearly shows this capitalist offensive against which transpired the episodes of resistance in Pouilles, Sulmona, Turin, Faenza and Milan. The "Concentration" (anti-fascist) press which is anxious to prove to the bourgeoisie the futility and dangers of fascism, and the benefits and advantages of a social-democratic government, tried to point out that these incidents, which followed each other in rapid succession, were without any inner connection. But the "Concentration" deceives itself when it pretends that the substitution of an anti-fascist for a fascist governing personnel can take place as a pacific transfer of power from one hand to another. In actual fact, however, the "Concentration" for whom this perspective is bound up with its direct and indirect relations with the foreign powers, and the forces of Anglo-American imperialism, understands perfectly that the perspective which would permit its accession to power is very different.

The Proletarian Insurrection Only Can Defeat Fascism

The struggle against fascism can only be settled by a proletarian insurrection; it is therefore in the proletarian camp that it is necessary for the "Concentration" to conquer such positions so that, in the course of the insurrection, it could intervene to direct the proletarian movement from its revolutionary development and into the channel of the conservation of the capitalist regime. This explains why a considerable element of the Centrist anti-fascist ideology of the Italian Communist Party has found its way into the "Concentration" (popular revolution, constituent assembly, Labriolism of the latest cut). The fact, moreover, that many of the political views of the Left Communists have been fraudulently adopted by Centrism—for domestic requirements in the struggle against us—can only increase the confusion. Far from acting as a stimulus to the struggle, Centrism is an element of disintegration, leading the workers to doubt the correctness of a proletarian policy instead of getting them to realize that what they ought to doubt, by unmasking its artificial shifts of scenery—is Centrism itself.

The evolution of the "Concentration", owing to the necessity of deceiving the proletariat and that of Centrism from the need of fighting the Left—these are the political barriers between which the movements of resistance and rebellion against Italian fascism, are condemned to oscillate. They are the political barriers upon which the events of Pouilles, Sulmona, Turin, Faenza and Milan supervened. One thing is sure: either the workers will succeed in smashing these barriers, or their movements will follow an extremely bloody and painful course, permitting Italian capitalism to register new successes.

The two most recent movements, the character of which we must closely analyze are those of Faenza and Milan.

The Outbreaks at Faenza—a Signal of the Future

At Faenza the collisions occurred at two different times. In the first, Donati, who had reached the breaking-point of endurance, killed a few of the most notorious fascists. Thereupon the fascists immediately mobilized their forces; their objective was not, however, as on many other occasions, to wreak general devastation, but to cover the ground with corpses by means of floggings. During this fascist mobilization, a family in the suburb of Santa-Lucia, offered up heroic resistance and some of their assailants were killed. These two incidents bear not the character of an explosion of individual hatred, but of an encounter which fits in with events, which elsewhere too, preceded and followed it. These peasants aimed to make a breach in the apparatus of brutal repression—worsening of the living conditions of the workers. By their sacrifices, they demonstrated that only violence could make this breach.

It is interesting to observe what was the reaction of the defensive mechanism of fascism, and why it did not have recourse to the usual form of reprisals. The present plan of Fascism is to "individualize" the reprisals on the peasants who resist and are already at the disposal of the Special Tribunal. It is consequently because Fascism understands that, if mobilization and carnage in any given locality may still be possible—the conditions now exist (verified by the simultaneous character of the recent anti-fascist incidents) which could transform an expedition into one or several districts into a revolutionary movement.

Faenza showed that the possibility of enduring fascist persecutions has now reached its extreme limit; that against these persecutions violent and aimed resistance is developing; and that the apparatus of repression, instead of pursuing the familiar tactic of collective reprisals, is hesitating, and from fear of the growing unrest, is "individualizing" its reprisals.

The Economic Causes of the Milan Movement

At Milan, the motives which occasioned the manifestations of Sesto and Miani-Silvestri, rise more or less directly from the economic situation.

It is a familiar fact that capitalism, before or in the course of an offensive for wage reductions, embarks on dismissals. To effect these staff reductions, in connection with the reduced possibility of the sale of commodities, the employers have decided on wholesale let-outs. The workers set themselves in motion to prevent this plan of the bosses from being put into effect with a struggle—the scope of the movement and the conduct of the dispute again proved that fascism did not resort to the system of wholesale violence and destruction out of fear of the consequences that would follow a fresh massacre. The federal secretary of the Milan Fascist Organization, speaking of the workers' movements of Miani-Silvestri, tried to prove that the workers were not guilty of the manifestations attributed to them. The old Fascist tactic would have been to mobilize the apparatus of repression against the "adversaries of the regime".

Italy is gripped in the frame-work of an economic policy which has no other possibility of development than a new offensive against the standards of the workers, the safety valve of capitalism in the sharpening economic crisis. What are the conditions which could enable the proletarian movement to uproot and crush the capitalist dictatorship?

The Proletariat Must Lead the Struggle Against Fascism

We have always protested against the pretended analogy between the fascist and Tsarist dictatorship. In Italy you have a dictatorship of capitalism; in Russia you had a government of the class which preceded the bourgeoisie in its historic role and which one cannot confound with the bourgeoisie at all. For this reason, in Russia the break-down of the Tsarist machine could result from a workers' and peasants' movement, and also from the conflict and friction between capitalism and the feudal classes. In Italy on the other hand, the overthrow of the fascist apparatus can only be brought about by proletarian movements. If these movements do not develop, if they are not gathered together and coordinated, the enemy apparatus will maintain its repressive force. This very aspect of fascism as a representative of the interests of capitalism, and the specific conditions and social relations in Italy, where the proletarian revolution is on the order of the day, bring into relief the regime in Poland or the Baltic countries, differences between the Italian regime and

In view of the weakness of its political position, Centrism would like to maintain its prestige by procuring the following species of "revolutionary theorem" to the masses: "the more perfect the operation of the repressive apparatus of capitalism, the more is the political path we choose correct." This curious childishness, applied to the Italian situation, would mean that the road of the revolution is one that proceeds not through the weakening of fascism, but through its consolidation until the happy day when capitalism can appeal to all its imposing fascist and social-democratic forces, and set in motion all the forces at its disposal in the present situation of balance of class forces. On that day the machine-guns of the proletarian vanguard will be recognized by the enemy as in the right.

For Marxists, however, the road of the revolution runs through the consolidated blocs of all the leading forces of capital, fascist and social-democratic; to the point where their control disintegrates and the proletariat can advance and conquer.

Policy of Centrism Has Been Ruinous

Practically speaking, the crumbling of the enemy forces depends on two essential factors: the economic situation and the activity of the proletariat through the channel of its Party. In the present Italian situation, the element of "economic crisis" exists—what is lacking is the activity and capacity of the proletariat. In place of a real capacity for struggle by the Party, we have in reality the political obstacles which have been mentioned—the action of the social-democracy and the ruinous effects of Centrism on Communist policy.

As regards the social-democracy, the experience of the Italian proletariat these last ten years speaks for itself.

As for the Centrists, in their analysis of the Sulmona and Faenza events, they put themselves to needless trouble when they try to infer from a distribution of leaflets etc. the existence of an organization able to lead the movement.

In the present situation, where organization is illegal, the elements permitting of the establishment of an organized force or of a force capable of creating an organization, when the situation will permit, are those who show the capacity of a Party to politically envisage events, and assuring the confidence of the mass in the Party, a confidence capable of assuring leadership and development to the movements that arise.

Influence of Stalinized Communist Party at Minimum

Faenza, Sulmona and Milan show clearly that the influence of the Party as an organizing factor in the masses has been reduced to its minimum. If individual militants in the Party fight very actively in the movement, that is not enough to replace the enormous loss of prestige of the Party as an organization. This loss flows from the international mistakes of the movement, and particularly from the fact that those who ought to be leading the revolution in Italy are at the same time helping to exercise their repression on the revolutionary vanguard in Russia.

There are numerous indications that many elements of the Party are opposed to the disastrous tactic of Centrism and are evolving in the direction of our group. The Centrist bureaucrats are greatly mistaken if they believe that plenty of money and plenty of lies can perpetuate their leadership. The latter arises not from our "will" but because there are revolutionary reasons and requirements, as recent events prove.

The fact that Sulmona and Faenza preceded Milan, the fact that the manifestations of violence were of a much clearer character in the former than in Milan, raises the question of the relative influence of workers and peasants in the development of the situation.

The Policy of the Left Unites the Masses for Struggle

The well-known thesis of the Left is that the sole path to liberation lies in the unification of the workers' and peasants' movements under the leadership of the proletariat. This central position is again brought into full relief by the assassination of Gorton. But the fact that it is the peasants' movements which have been the most violent by comparison with the feeble movements in Turin and Milan, shows in itself the seriousness of the situation.

The development of the revolution in Russia also taught us a lesson on this head. If the beginnings of the revolution were embraced in the workers' movements of 1905 and the magistral policy of the Bol-

A New Science of the International Communist Opposition.

By MAURICE SPECTOR

Opposition, called by Vladimir the field of his, can never in a Marxist sense be a substitute for the principle. The political line is long considering between the Russian Opposition and the German Opposition. It is a matter of course that the abrupt turn in the course of history is futile. The Russian Opposition in Europe is passing through a process of differentiation which leads to a stronger selection and higher level on the basis of organic unity. The theoretical and tactical confusion revealed in certain groups by the Sino-Russian conflict was a necessary warning. The world situation (Young Plan, London Conference, Locarno Plan, Indian ferment, World-unemployment etc.) may at any time subject the Opposition to a crucial test. The "Third Period" stundities of the official Comintern make it all the more incumbent on the Communist to give Bolshevik leadership.

The compass by which the revolutionary vanguard steers through the waters of events, striking the necessary balance between enthusiasm and objectivity—is the analysis of class relations in dynamic development. This is the method of Marxism, and for decisive reasons—the rich experiences of three revolutions, ceaseless preoccupation with theoretical fundamentals, pre-eminence of its leadership—it finds its finest living expression today in the Russian Opposition. Because as against the Thermidorian Right and bureaucratic Centrist factions, its basic line is still that of the Party under Lenin—the Russian Opposition is the Left. The Russian Opposition is the contemporary embodiment of Bolshevism hardened for decades in the struggle against opportunism as the main danger inside the labor movement, but also against "otsovism" against every form of ultra-Left adventurism. The Russian Opposition represents the spiritual heritage of October and the first four congresses of the Third International. The three issues which L.D. Trotsky proposed as the touchstone of adherence to the Left—Anglo-Russian Committee, Chinese Revolution and Soviet Economy (national socialism)—are no more "merely" tactical differences than the divisions of Bolshevism and Menshevism over the character of the 1905 revolution. They go to the root of the Communist program. They involve questions of the estimate of the epoch, the character of the Russian revolution, the role of the vanguard, the significance of the soviets, the national and agrarian problems.

It is clear that between the Marxist Left that is the Russian Opposition and the "Left" groupings in the Comintern before 1924, there is a yawning gulf. Conjointly with Lenin, in the period of the Second Congress, Trotsky demolished the sectarian abstractions of Gorter and Pankovsk, the theoreticians of the German Communist Labor Party (K. A. P. D.). Conjointly with Lenin, Trotsky at the Third Congress no less vigorously engaged the ultra-Left adventurism (the "Offensive Theory") of the eminent "Leninists" Bela Kun, Maslow and Thalheimer. The severe correction proved such a shock to Thalheimer that he lost his balance and ultimately staggered into the camp of the extreme Right, while Maslow declared a permanent vendetta against the Third Congress as the work of the Mephisto Trotsky who had seduced the innocent Maslowite Lenin.

These reminiscences of the Second and particularly the Third Congresses, unfortunately possess more than purely historical interest. They have a direct bearing on the subsequent fate of the Leninbund. For years a whispering and press campaign was carried on among the Left-inclined workers of Hamburg, Berlin, the Ruhr and elsewhere to depict Trotsky as the Right Danger and Zinoviev and Bucharin as the patron-saints of the Left! This gross disorientation of the German Left, the obstinate Opposition to the Third Congress, the failure correctly to distinguish the tendencies in the Russian Party, were bound up with the ideological perversions of Maslow. The blunders of the Leninbund, the Urbahns theory of the so-called "hybrid" state, its fallacious analysis of the Thermidor, its bankruptcy in the Russo-Chinese issue, its oscillation between Brandier and Korch, all show that the ghost of Maslow has not yet been laid and the evil of Zinoviev lives after him.

Maslow's method of approach to the problems of the Russian and international revolution was essentially eclectic. It was the method of the editorial writer who upon being asked to compose an article on Chinese Metaphysics read up the Encyclopedia Britannica under China and Metaphysics and combined his information. Maslow learned that Lenin's slogan in the revolution of 1905 was the democratic dictatorship (bourgeois democracy) and that there were two revolutions in 1917. He therefore instructed his associates that if the world revolution did not come to the assistance of Russia, the Bolsheviks would have "to retreat to the positions of 1905", that is, the bourgeois revolution. This fundamentally Menshevik theory is the prop of Urbahn's conception of "Thermidor". If Kamenev and Zinoviev would have had their way in 1917, the Bolsheviks would never, of course, have advanced beyond "the positions of 1905"—and there would have been an end to the revolution. The proletarian revolution is not followed by the bourgeois revolution, the proletarian dictatorship can be liquidated only by a Bonapartist or Fascist dictatorship. To conceive of a Thermidor as the threshold of bourgeois democracy in Russia in the epoch of imperialism, and civil war the epoch of the essential decay of bourgeois democracy is a grotesque misreading of history... In conversation with the writer comrade Urbahn's once confessed that he had learned "a great deal" from Maslow. In retrospect, it would have been better if he had learned less and forgotten more.

III

The concrete issue of the Defense of the Soviet Union brought with it more than just a settlement of accounts with the Leninbund leadership. It urgently raised the problem of the unification of the whole International Opposition, which was far from homogeneous in its origins, its traditions and ideology. Here the mature leadership of the Russian Opposition proved indispensable, and it exerted the pressure of its natural prestige in favor of ideological clarity and against a bloc of motley opposition tendencies. Already on his arrival in Constantinople, Trotsky uncompromisingly put an end to all speculations on an unprincipled bloc with the Brandier Right. In equally decisive fashion, he rejected the contraband of "neo-syndicalism" of the Revolution Proletarian (Monatte-Loriot) group. Concurrently, he sharply dissociated the Russian Opposition from fraternity with those for whom the Opposition entailed no obligations of mundane political activity, for whom Opposition had become stagnation, routine and a refuge from Party discipline.

But of supreme importance in the ideological fusion of the International Left is the question of the Permanent Revolution, which comrade Trotsky has placed on the order of the day for discussion. The Opposition must be absolutely clear on the significance of this question. Those who reject the epigone-manufactured legend of "Trotskyism" must realize that the Permanent Revolution is the concentrated anti-thesis of the revisionist program of national socialism, the bloc of four classes, the theory of stages (colonial revolution), Workers and Peasants Parties, the peaceful cohabitation of socialism and capitalism the kulak growth into socialism (Bucharin). Why is it necessary to bring the Permanent Revolution up now, laments Radek, justifying his capitulation. During the period of the first four Congresses of the International it was not necessary to discuss the theory of the Permanent Revolution because its substance was the strategy of the International. It is the revision of Leninism by the epigones that brings the Permanent Revolution into relief as the essence of Bolshevism. It is the attempt of the epigones who before Lenin's April Theses had not advanced beyond the position of the bourgeois revolution, and who would now inflict the international working class with their reactionary theory—that has raised the question. It is the experiences of the Chinese Revolution that have raised the question.

The recently published theses on the Permanent Revolution are the re-affirmation in the present period of the April Theses of Lenin in all their implications. They link up the national with the international, the democratic with the socialist, the agrarian with the proletarian revolutions. They re-affirm that the emancipation of the peasantry can only come from the leadership of the proletariat. They repudiate the idea of two-class parties and maintain the necessity of the independent leadership of the Communist Party.

The misrepresentations and distortions of the theory of the Permanent Revolution—which is Marxist to the bone—was made possible by the domination of the Party and Comintern apparatus by the Right-Center Bloc under the pressure of alien class elements, the growing influence of the Kulak, Nepman and Bureaucrat.

IV

The American Opposition sees in the establishment of an International Bureau of the Opposition, an International Bulletin and Conference—a tremendously significant step forward in the struggle for the revolutionary line and the winning of the Comintern from the opportunist-Blanquist zig-zag of the internationally organized Stalin faction.

The American Opposition was formed under conditions that permitted no illusions of swift victory—or capitulation. It was organized after the Sixth Congress, that is, after the rupture of the bloc with Zinoviev and the capitulation of the Zinovievists. Our group in America attracted militants who realized the consequences of the step they were taking—who saw the main stream of the Russian Opposition in the Moscow Opposition of 1924. We are a "Trotsky" Opposition, if we may say so without misunderstanding. We repudiate all admixtures of Zinovievism and Maslowism, the theories of Souvarine and those of the Smirnov-Sapronovs. In our Platform we justly recognize L.D. Trotsky as the foremost living teacher and leader of Bolshevism, the foremost representative of the legacy of Marx and Lenin.

With the Russian Opposition we are in complete accord that the Rakovsky declaration was no gesture of capitulation but a necessary demonstration of the united front with the Party. In the same sense do we regard the declaration of October 16, 1926 of the Party loyalty of the Opposition—to which Urbahn's takes so much exception.

The situation in the American Communist movement has been immensely clarified since the Sixth Congress, and the greatest contribution in this direction has been made by the militants who formed the Left Opposition. None of the former Party groupings are any longer what they once were. Never was the Lovestone group such an undisguised and outspoken Right wing. Never was the unprincipled swamp-like character of the Foster faction more apparent. Never was there the clear and outspoken conscious Left wing that the American Opposition constitutes today. The limits of the old unprincipled factionalism and intrigue had their rise in the Zinoviev-Bucharin and Stalin regimes. The American Opposition has in the short space of its existence achieved a great revolutionary educational work for the movement that will sooner or later bear its fruit. For this the American Opposition recognizes its historic debt to the Russian Opposition.

MEXICAN WHITE TERROR CONTINUES

Taking advantage of the organizational weakness and demoralization in the ranks of the Mexican Communist movement, the government of the native bourgeoisie at Wall Street's service continues its series of repressions against the Communist and the labor movement in general through a series of arrests of the leaders on trumped up charges and the regular smashing of labor organizations.
